That when any State shall by suitable legislation make provision adequately to enforce the provisions of this act and all regulations promulgated thereunder, the Secretary of Agriculture may so certify, and then and thereafter said State may take over the enforcement of said act and the regulations made in aid of said act. The said State may and shall, so long as it shall enforce the said act and regulations made in pursuance thereof, be reimbursed from said funds for the costs of said enforcement to that extent said services would have cost had the service been performed by the Federal Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota in behalf of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I hope the bill will not become a law. This country was once very much divided on the question of the rights which were reserved by the States under the Constitution, and as to just what powers a State did have and what powers were delegated by the bill of rights and the Constitutional Convention to the various States of the Union and what rights the States had given away under the Constitution. I understand from newspaper reports that the President of the United States a few days ago made a speech in which he took up this very important question, and I compliment him even at this late date on being a convert to the idea of State rights.

But that is not all that is involved in the pending bill by any means. Senators talk about bombs in Chicago and heap fire on the head of Hale Thompson. A good deal is said, too, about anarchy. But the common people of the country are getting mighty tired of the Senate and House exercising what have come to be called their aristocratic powers, dominating and controlling and dictating to the people of the country everything they may or may not do, what they shall eat, what they shall drink, when they shall go to bed, when they shall get up, when they shall go fishing, when they shall go hunting, whether they shall have a picnic or not; and, if they have a picnic, what they must have at the picnic, and so forth. It seems to me that Senators and Congressmen, when they get to Washington, absolutely forget that they have any poor people at home; and some of them, I think, forget that they have anybody at home at all.

How much further are we going? What do Senators expect from the people, who know that certain privileges are being exercised by every official of the United States Government, that certain privileges are indulged in by Senators and Congressmen, by the judges who try the criminals, by the solicitors who prosecute them, by the officers who are supposed to be enforcing the law, and yet are denied the common people? Do Senators think those people will forever be satisfied with knowing that they—the ones at home—working in industry, working in the field, and making a living in this country and feeding the world, too, are the only people who are to be denied and deprived of privileges under the laws which their Senators and Congressmen here enact?

Talk about Mussolini; talk about other governments; you are forcing the people to anarchy and to lawlessness just as fast as you can force them. Senators may laugh at that statement if they want to, but to-day in this country men are sitting on juries who are finding not guilty of crime people whom they know are guilty. They are finding them not guilty because they know that the solicitor who prosecuted the case does the same thing for which they are trying the defendant, and because they know that the judge sitting on the bench is guilty of the same crime that the man in the dock is being tried for.

They sit there on juries and bring in such verdicts, and they are as good men as you are or as I am, as high-toned citizens, men who pay their taxes, do their part, do not dodge a draft law by claiming some exemption, as Senators and Representatives may do. When it comes time to fight, they do not claim that they are too young; they do not claim that they are fathers of two or three tots at home and can not leave them; but they walk up like men and volunteer; they take their guns on their shoulders and they fight in defense of their country. Those men render verdicts of not guilty in such cases because they know that those being tried are the only people that those laws are intended to affect and do affect.

I warn you, and I warn you in all seriousness of such a situation. I go among that class of people; I eat at the table with that class of people; I spend nights in the homes of that class of people; I make speeches to that class of people when I go to their meetings in their halls, sometimes in private behind closed doors and sometimes with open doors. I warn you, Senators, that the people are getting tired of being hamstrung and hog tied.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield with pleasure, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I infer from what the Senator from South Carolina has stated that it is his opinion—and I am in accord with him—that the enactment of such laws as the prohibition law and other laws seeking to restrain personal liberty and to regulate the conduct of individuals is bringing about disrespect for all law and authority.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts expresses it exactly and in a very few words.

When I was a boy the people of my section thought the President of the United States was somebody great. They do not think so now. They thought a Cabinet officer was a little something like one of the apostles who went around with their king. I remember in my boyhood days when Judge Kershaw, Judge Wallace, and men of that character came to my little town of Newberry. The crowd would be standing out on the courthouse square talking, when somebody would say, "Here comes the judge." Every man would step back, take his hat off, and when the judge would pass the old soldiers maybe would say, "Good morning, General," while the younger men like myself would say, "Good morning, Judge." Now when a judge comes by it is, "Hello, Dick," "Hello Jim," "What time are you going to open court, Henry?" The people do not have the respect for the President and his Cabinet and for the Senate and the other House of Congress that they once had. Why is it? It is because this House and the House across the way have deprived them of the God-given privileges that they were born with when they were children.

It used to be when Senator Butler or Senator Hampton would come home and walk up the streets of Columbia or when people would come up here to see Senators and Representatives they thought they were big men. They do not think it to-day. Do not fool yourselves. They do not think it because of your little actions, because of the contemptibleness in trying to deprive every man of every privilege that God gave him on this earth. Senators sit here and keep it up day after day and expect the common people of this country, the American voters, to continue to put up with it and stand by. Gentlemen of the Senate, if you keep it up, just as certain as there is a God sitting on His throne in heaven, respect for law will be gone; respect for order will be gone. The people among themselves will agree that they do not propose continuously to be imposed on in any such way. The result will be that jurors will agree before they ever go into the courthouse that they will not render a verdict against accused persons for committing crimes or violations of law when they know that the men higher up are equally guilty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Guilty of the same crime.

Mr. BLEASE. Guilty of the same crime.

We had an instance in my own State—I do not like to talk about home folks, but I can. A judge—I will not call his name; it would hardly be right, but I would not much mind doing it; he is not on my side of the political fence. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. He must be a Republican.

Mr. BLEASE. That judge instructed a jury in the courthouse; he delivered a long charge. When he finished the jury went out, stayed about five minutes, and came in with a verdict of "not guilty," though everybody knew the defendant was guilty. That afternoon court, as we express it down home, "broke" a little earlier than it was expected. The foreman of the jury lived in a town just above the judge's town, and he asked the judge to ride home with him. They got out about 15 or 20 miles from where the court was being held, along in the shank of the afternoon.

Those men—the foreman of the jury and the judge—had been trained together from boyhood. The foreman of the jury knew the country thoroughly; he knew there was a very nice cool spring near the road a short distance out. He turned out to the side of the road, stopped, and said, "Judge, I do not know about you, but I am going to take a drink." He reached down, opened his satchel, and took out a bottle of South Carolina mountains' most perfect corn. [Laughter.] The judge said, "I believe I will join you," and he did. They both took a drink. When he closed his satchel and put it back in the automobile, he said, "Judge"—he called him by name—"do you know why we acquitted that man in the Greenwood courthouse just about two hours ago?" The judge replied, "No; that verdict was quite a surprise to me." He said, "We acquitted him because we knew that you and I and every other man on that jury do the same thing that we just now did and what you were trying him for doing."

That is the condition we are putting this country in; there is no doubt about it. I practiced criminal law for 40 years, ever since I reached my majority, and I have defended all kinds of people. There are some who say it is wrong to take a case if the lawyer knows the man is guilty. I never thought so; I thought it was the lawyer's duty to see that the accused received substantial justice in a fair and proper manner—not to hide or conceal the crime, but to see that the accused had a fair and impartial trial by a fair jury. But the laws which are being enacted in this country to-day are bringing about such a condition that it will soon be impossible to secure a fair jury.

I am reminded of a story I once heard, and I presume Senators have heard it; I imagine it has been told as to every State, but it was told on Judge Hudson, one of the greatest jurists South Carolina ever produced. He was trying a fellow for stealing a hog.

The 12 men on the jury went out and found the accused not guilty. Subsequently, Judge Hudson said to the foreman of the jury, "Bill, that was a very strange verdict to me; you all must have known that fellow stole that hog." The foreman looked at him, laughed, and said, "Judge, that is so; but you know that seven of us were over at George's house the other night at a barbecue and we helped him eat that same hog." [Laughter.] That actually happened and can be proven by older men than am I in my State to-day.

Mr. President, I merely mention these two trifling incidents to show what the Congress of the United States is doing and to beg the Senate to stop. Oh, you may say, "I will be reelected; the conditions referred to by the Senator from South Carolina have nothing to do with the case, not a thing in the world." Yes, Mr. President; I have known men to be elected who went back home and in reality were beaten. I have known men to be elected who knew when they took their seats that if the decision had been left to an honest vote of the people they never would have been heard of; but somebody stole enough votes to put them across because they had money or influence. I know that to be true. So I want the Senate to stop and think a little bit.

I have a cartoon here which I should like to give my friend from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. It depicts a tramp going toward the South; flying over the top of his head is a flock of birds, and under the bottom is the legend "Migratory birds"—and the migratory birds include, of course, that beautiful tramp. [Laughter.] That cartoon reminds me of this bill. I stuck it here on the wall this morning, but I reckon it was against the rules, for somebody went over and took it down, to which I have raised no objection. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I want to analyze this bill a little. What I have said was in the way of generalities, but I wish to say, before I start on the bill, that I do believe there are Senators and Representatives who yet believe in giving the people some rights, some little privileges, anyway.

Just because we are getting old is no reason for taking away the privileges of everybody else; just because we do not want to drink is no reason why we should not let anybody else have a drink. Be liberal, be wholehearted, be free-minded, and give the individual some little privileges; some little rights. Let us go back home and talk to our folks about some of these bills we are trying to pass. Let us ask them what they think about them. Go back and ask the cotton-mill boys down in the South what they think about the fact that they can not go fishing unless they have got some trifling little sniper snooping around to watch them and to try to get a chance to run them into court. Then what do they do in many instances? They do not take them into court. They say, "Give me $2.50—your fine will be $5, but give me $2.50, and say no more about it." That is the kind of laws we are making.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A little more graft.

Mr. BLEASE. A little more graft, as my friend from Massachusetts well suggests. One of these little snipers which it was proposed to provide for in this bill might go out and catch some little fellow shooting, perhaps innocently. He would say to the one found shooting, "I will tell you what I will do"—I know that it is done in connection with the liquor business and there is no reason why they will not do it in the bird business. I have known some rather good men who sell "blind-tiger" liquor, and I have asked them how in the world they kept out of jail. "Well," they say, "We pay the law." They do not call them constables; they call it "the law" down in my country. Sometimes, when the officers are going out to search, one fellow sits around; he is on to the job; he goes to the phone and says, "That you, Bill?" "Yes." "The boys have laid out a program out here. They are going to be up at Barnwell Street first; then they are going across to Market Street; then they are going down on Jervey Street; they will get to your place just about so and so; look out." So about the time they are to get there Bill has got everything hid.

I am stating a fact now; I know it to be true. Bill has got everything hid and put away. The constables all come in, and the informer, the fellow who is getting the money, goes with them. They search everywhere; they find nothing; the constables all leave while Bill and two or three customers stay in the place. Just about the time the last constable goes out the door, Bill reaches down, sets his little stuff up, and says, "Boys, have another one; it is on the law"; and they all laugh. That is what is going on in this country and what is going on in the city of Washington; I know it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. I always yield with pleasure to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator doubtless is aware of the fact that General Andrews stated not long ago, when he was connected with the Prohibition Service, that bootlegging was absolutely coextensive with the entire United States. So I am sure the Senator does not intend to create the impression that there is anything merely local or sectional about the conditions that he is depicting.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I thank my friend for the suggestion; but I am talking about all these fool laws about fishing and hunting and taking a little drink. That is about all I will say right now; but the people are getting tired of all that kind of laws—more tired of it than you think they are.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just once more?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina further yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. Does not the Senator's memory also go back to the time in the South—because I was born and bred in a southern community—when it was considered almost a scandalous thing for any reference to be made to politics in the pulpit?

Mr. BLEASE. I never heard of that until I went to running for governor, and then the preachers all went to preaching against me. As my friend from Massachusetts suggests, I had the fellow who sits in the pew on my side; but that is a fact. When I first announced for governor I think about 9 out of every 10 preachers in the whole State would close their Bibles and take their text on BLEASE. I appreciated it. The night after I was inaugurated, and made a speech out on the statehouse steps, I told them I appreciated their praying like they did; that a good many of them had told me they were praying for the best man to win, and I was sure their prayers had come true. Next morning I went into the governor's office, so I had no fault to find with their prayers; but my friend from Maryland is right. I never heard of preachers taking part in politics out in my State until I was a grown man. I do not blame them for taking a part in politics, however. They have got to raise money. They can not live and educate their children on nothing, and they have got to get up something to interest the people with, and why not preach on somebody's politics?

Mr. President, here is this amendment splitting jurisdiction. If a State shall do so-and-so, why, then, the State will take control; but if the State does not do so-and-so, then we, the Federal Government, are going to take control. Why? I make the prediction right here this afternoon that if the enforcement of the prohibition law were left to the honor of the governor of each State of this Nation, you would come nearer having prohibition to-day than you have. I resented it when I was governor, and I never would allow one of my State men to go with a Federal officer to enforce a law for four years and over. If I were the Governor of South Carolina to-night, I would not let a single man under me mix into any raid or any arrest with which the Federal Government had anything to do, because I was not there sworn to uphold the laws of the United States except in so far as they applied to my own State government.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just once more?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina further yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUCE. What the Senator is saying suggests to my mind naturally enough, of course, the fact that in Maryland we have positively refused, from the time of the enactment of the Volstead law, to pass any State prohibition enforcement law. The consequence is that while I often read of corrupt collusion between State and county police officers and prohibition agents, no such scandal, not in one single solitary instance, has been known in the State in which I live.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that. I am not surprised at that State wanting a man like Ritchie for governor. If he has that much good, common horse sense, he does not need much other kind to be President of the United States.

This amendment is an effort to force a State to pass a law to keep the great United States Government from sending into it spies such as they used to shoot in the olden times. Why, I know the time when if a man calling himself a gentleman—of course he was not—had been out with a party of friends, and they had had something to drink, or killed a bird, or played a little social game of cards, and he had gone off and told it, he would have been condemned and blacklisted in decent company forever. You people in Congress up here have made it an honor, however. If a man is invited to a Senator's home, or invited to some friend's home, and perchance there should be a little wine or champagne served, and he goes out, like the contemptible cur that he is, and says that that wine was served at this table, this private home, he is honored; he is held up as a law-enforcing officer of the United States. The man that owns the home ought to shoot him like he would a mad dog trying to bite his baby on the front doorstep. [Laughter.]

That is how much I think of this kind of law, publicly expressed; and I hope it will be publicly printed, because I am not afraid of the people that I represent on this floor. I should be glad to go back home and make this same speech on the stump in every county in my State, because we love liberty; and, as I said here the other day, I repeat to-day, we have in the State of South Carolina the purest unmixed American blood in the American Union. There is no nigger marrying in my country. There is no marrying to Japs, and Chinamen, and other mixed breeds. We do not allow it. We have a law against it; and if the law does not take effect, disappearances from home sometimes take effect.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The only people that need reforming are the preachers, I judge.

Mr. BLEASE. Well, no. I think in my State we have a pretty good crowd of preachers.

Mr. President, this bill deprives a man of the right to a trial by jury. Read the sections of it and see. The Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of every State in this Union guarantee to every man the right of a trial by jury. It is considered a sacred right; and yet here is a bill, under the guise of a migratory bird bill, that takes away that right.

I do not see why these people who live away out in the West always want to be hopping on what we people down in the South do. What business is it of theirs? Why do you not let us alone? You make out that sectionalism is dead. It is just as bitter in the hearts of some people to-day as it was the day that Lee went to Appomattox Courthouse and met Grant and told him the war was over. He did not surrender. The South never has surrendered. You brought all the world to fight us from every nation on God's earth; you paid for them out of the Treasury, and you are paying millions of dollars now to the chaps that they left after them; but there is as much hatred of the South in the North to-day, I am sorry to say, as there ever was; and I hate to see it. I did not believe it when I first came to the Senate, but it crops out here every day. There are men in the Senate and men in this city and men in this Nation who hate the South to-day just as much as they hated the South the day the Civil War was over. Do not tell me it is not true, for I have tried to see it the other way. I have tried to make friends the other way.

You come in here and take a Cape Cod Canal up here, and appropriate millions and millions of dollars to be wasted on a canal that never will be worth anything to this country. You have a Columbia River Basin project out here, for which you want about $250,000,000. You have all kinds of other bills; but you let the South want something for a navy yard, you let the South want something for reclamation, you let the South want something for some other purposes, and you are told, "No." Economy comes in, and then you talk about loving us. If you love us, let us alone. We are not asking you to give us anything. We do not want any of your charity. We just want you to let us alone. If you want migratory bird bills and other things of that kind out in your country, have them; but my people are getting tired of them—very tired.

Why should a man be deprived of the right of trial by jury? Why should you go to work here and put in a bill that provides that if a man is caught shooting, violating this law, you are going to take him before a United States commissioner and let him fine him between $25 and $500? It is a ridiculous proposition; absolutely ridiculous! Who is going to settle on whether he shall pay $25 or whether he shall pay $500? I will tell you who is going to settle on it—the man who makes the arrest. He is going to make a bargain with that fellow before he ever gets to the commissioner. Whether it is the truth or not, he will say to him, "I will see the commissioner. I will have him make your fine a little bit, so-and-so. You give me so-and-so." That is what it amounts to.

If you want to be honest in your bill, and you are going to pass it, if nothing else will do you but to pass it, pass it, but put the truth in it. Say that if a man is tried, if a man is indicted for violating this law, he shall be taken before a regular court, where he is entitled to go. If he wants to plead guilty, let him get up in the courthouse before a judge whose authority is constituted by the State constitution or the United States Constitution, if he be a Federal judge, and let that judge decide what shall be a proper punishment.

Why let some little United States commissioner that does not happen to like some man's child, maybe, or does not like the man, because his boy violates this law, put on him an outrageous fine to humiliate the poor man, such a heavy fine that he knows that he can not pay it, and put his child in jail?

Why, Senators, I think the most of you surely can not be thinking seriously about this bill. I think you just like the Senator from South Dakota; I think you just see the interest he has in this bill, and I think you are just voting for it to please him, some of you. I wish I could take you through my State for about a week and let one of you get up and read this bill to my people, and then make your speech on it, without my saying a word, and just ask them what they think about it. You would find quite a different opinion from what you find among yourselves up here, when you are endeavoring to take everything in this world from the people of this country.

Now let us read a little bit of this bill. We have plenty of time.

Whether they kill the bill or not does not worry me. I just want my people to know I was not crazy enough to vote for such a thing as this. I read further from the bill:

SEC. 8. That the jurisdiction of the State, both civil and criminal, over persons upon areas acquired under this act shall not be affected or changed by reason of their acquisition and administration by the United States as migratory bird reservations, except so far as the punishment of offenses against the United States is concerned.

"Changed by reason of their acquisition and administration by the United States." Why, then, go on in the bill and make the exception "except so far as the punishment of offenses is concerned"? If you are going to make it even on one score, let us make it even on all. If you are going to put it under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, then why do you want to say that it shall not be the same in case of punishment? I can tell you why, Mr. President. It is because those who have charge of this bill have an idea that the judges appointed from the White House—I may have used the wrong word in saying "appointed." I might have said "designated" from the White House, possibly appointed from Wall Street at the dictate of the money interests of this country, the railroads and the bankers and some others, who generally name their man and send his name down to the White House, and the White House sends his name here. That is about all they have to do with it. I should have said judges designated from that point; that those judges, being in the control of the United States Government, will be more harsh and deal more severely with people who happen to violate this law than a State judge, who lives among them, knows their condition, and knows the circumstances, and who knows the people with whom he is dealing. I can see no other reason why there is a desire to put that provision in the bill. Then there is this:

That nothing in this act is intended to interfere with the operation of the game laws of the several States applying to migratory game birds in so far as they do not permit what is forbidden by Federal law.

That is a wonderful section. I would like to know how the United States Congress can pass any other kind of a law. I would like to know by what authority they have a right to say what the punishment in a State court shall be—in so far as they do not permit—

That is, the State law—

what is forbidden by Federal law.

There is another power given in this bill which I think this country is getting tired of, and it comes right in this section. When the United States Government was formed, Congress was established to make laws. What have we done? We have sat down here and delegated that power, until we can not make an appropriation without getting somebody else's consent. If there is a bill pending, and some matter comes up and a Senator would like to have an amendment put into the bill to appropriate a certain amount of money for a certain purpose, he is ruled out on a point of order, because some little sap-headed, big-headed Yankee has not approved of it. That is what I am getting tired of. Yet in this bill there is the same thing, and it is set out plainly here that that is the purpose. Its proponents do not even try to hide it or conceal it.

Are we to pass this, and continually pass such bills? As one, I want to warn the people of this country that if they keep on allowing things to go as they are going in this Congress it will not be long before the common man will not be anything in this country except a servant and a slave of somebody.

The Bureau of the Budget has far more power than Congress has. You even go so far as to say that certain boards shall pass laws, not only pass laws but fix the punishment that is to be inflicted for a violation of the law. Ignorance of the law is no excuse. There is not a lawyer in the United States of America, Chief Justice Taft not excepted, who knows what laws are on the statute books of this country to-day, and I will leave to the Chief Justice himself to say whether I am right or not.

Yet you pass a law and let some little board, as this bill proposes to do for the Agricultural Department, pass rules and regulations under the law, and then go out into the country districts and say to the boys and girls of the country, "We will try you and we will convict you," and if he says, "I never heard of this law," they will say, "Ignorance of the law is no excuse." There are Senators on this floor right now whom I might ask about certain statute laws and I venture to say they never heard of them or read them, and I know there are many that they could ask me about with the same result. You are piling them up all the time, robbing the people, absolutely stealing, as Robert Y. Hayne once said on the floor of the Senate, stealing the powers and the rights of the people of the States.

Down in my country there is a bank robbing the people, and I have tried my best to get the Senate to see about it. I want to talk about that bank a little bit, and this is a good time.

I understand the Treasury Department discovered so much rottenness down there that they will not even let the chairman of the committee call a meeting. I asked a friend of mine over here when the Committee on Banking and Currency was going to have a meeting, and he said that they have not had a meeting for a long time and he does not know when the chairman is going to call a meeting. I had printed in the RECORD an article from a paper showing that the bank in Columbia had charged off more than $2,000,000 loaned on worthless land, which was put on the block and sold and the Government had to buy it in. I suggest that Senators get yesterday's RECORD, and there they will see the figures showing that the bank marked off as a total loss about $2,000,000. That is gone. They actually loaned money to a man down there and took a mortgage on a big road. That is the truth. He went to the bank and told them he wanted to borrow some money, and they sent an inspector down there, and the inspector went back and informed them that it was all right. When they went to foreclose the mortgage they had about a half of a big road about a mile long included in the acreage on which they loaned the money.

That is the kind of a government we have down there, and when I come to the Senate and ask them to pass a resolution to go down there and investigate the condition of that bank, to investigate whether there is any rottenness in it or not, headquarters speaks. And who is headquarters? Andrew W. Mellon! If I had made as much money out of selling liquor as he has made, I would not want to oppress my people. I would have oppressed them enough. Mellon sits back and says, "NORBECK, don't move." The Senator from South Dakota refuses to call his committee together, and the bank in Columbia continues to go on in this robbery and pilfering of the Federal Government. But a bill can be brought in to say to my people down there, "We rob you through the United States Government; we let this fellow running the Columbia bank rob you; and we will smile at that. That is what we want to do. You southerners ought to be robbed. That is all you are entitled to. You are poor, and we want to keep you poor. That is what is the matter. But we are not going to let you have any privileges. We will let your little boy go hunting, but if he happens to kill a migratory bird we will punish him."

There are plenty of people in this country who do not know what a migratory bird is. I doubt if there is a man on the floor of the Senate, the Senator from South Dakota included, who can stand up right now and repeat what is in the treaty as to what migratory birds are or who migratory birds are. Yet ignorance of the law is no excuse. The poor little devil who violates the law must go to jail because his daddy can not raise $500, and the United States commissioner does not like him.

That is the kind of government we are living under. I do not know whether Hoover could do any worse than that. I know one thing. We have to put up with things under this Government, but we would not put up with Mr. Hoover's "black chocolates," I will tell you that.

If he should try to do with his "black chocolates" some of the things that Coolidge's people with nigger hearts and white blood do, they would not get very far in South Carolina with it.

What else is there is this beautiful bill? I read:

That no person shall knowingly disturb, injure, or destroy any notice, signboard, fence, building, ditch, dam, dike, embankment, flume, spillway, or other improvement or property of the United States on any area acquired under this act or cut, burn, or destroy any timber, grass, or other natural growth, on said area or on any area of the United States, which heretofore has been or which hereafter may be set apart or reserved for the use of the Department of Agriculture as a game refuge or as a preserve or reservation and breeding ground for native birds, under any law, proclamation, or Executive order, or occupy or use any part thereof, or enter thereon for any purpose, except in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Senators, why not say "except in accordance with the laws passed by the Congress of the United States"? Why do they say "except in accordance with regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture?" When did the Constitution of this country provide that Congress should delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to make laws and regulations that the Senate is supposed to make? When did we reach the point where we delegated our power, instead of sitting here ourselves and saying what the laws of this country shall be? We are delegating that right to the Department of Agriculture. You might say that the Secretary of Agriculture is a great man. I do not know whether he is or not. I have never seen him. But the incumbent will not always be the Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. Hoover might appoint one of his "black chocolates" in order to do away with the race segregation in his Cabinet when he gets in. I do reserve one thing for him. I hope that just before the Kansas City convention goes to make his nomination, they will not circulate the report that Hoover has negro blood in him, in order to fool the southern negro delegates to vote for him on the next ballot. I guess you all know to what I am referring. It was done once.

If that Secretary of Agriculture should be changed, you do not know who the Secretary might possibly be; and why should you pass a bill saying that he shall make the laws, he shall make the regulations, he shall do the things that are to be done under this bill? That should not be in this bill. This measure in its present shape and its amended shape has no right to be placed on our statute books—but nothing in this act or in any regulation thereunder shall be construed to prevent a person from entering upon any area acquired under this act for the purpose of fishing in accordance with the law of the State in which such area is located: Provided, That such person complies with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture covering such area.

That is what I object to. Why not say, "Provided such person does not violate the law of the United States Government"? You just simply say to a man, "You go down into South Carolina, or into Georgia, or into any other State you please, make any kind of a regulation you want to make—it does not make any difference what you make, you make the regulations—and then you take the money and you hire just as many contemptible little fellows as you can get and send them around over the country spying on these people, running them into the courts, running them before a commissioner." And yet you make no provision in this bill for the publication of those regulations, and the very people who violate them—not only them but you yourselves—possibly will not know what regulations the Secretary of Agriculture has made or under what rule he has his hand on you until you are arrested and dragged into the courts.

Further on in the bill it is provided:

That for the purposes of this act migratory birds are those defined as such by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded August 16, 1906.

When I get through I would like to have the author of the bill—and I am not joking about it, either—if he does not know, which I have no idea he does, send for the books and read just exactly what migratory game birds are thus defined by the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. In order that the people of the country may know what a game bird is I called attention to a cartoon which I sent to the Senator from South Dakota which puts the tramp down as a migratory bird. I would like to know if he includes that "bird" in his bill. I would like to know just exactly what he does want included and exactly what people he is after under the bill as at present written.

Other sections of the bill are just as bad. Listen to this beautiful provision:

And then he may take such bird or nest or eggs thereof, respectively, only in accordance with the Federal law and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture adopted and approved.

Think of that! Not according to the laws of the United States Government, not according to the laws of the State government, but he "may take such bird or nest or eggs, respectively, only in accordance with the Federal law and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture."

What does that do? It gives this same Secretary of Agriculture more power than the Congress of the United States has, because in this body it takes a majority vote to pass a bill, and then it has to go from this body to the House, or if it originates in the House it has to come from there to the Senate. The House has to put its approval on the bill by a majority vote. Then the bill has to go to the President of the United States, and if he sees fit to veto it and it comes back to the Senate and the House it takes a two-thirds vote of Congress to pass that bill over the veto. Yet here is a bill just about to be passed, and which I suppose will be passed by this body, saying to the Secretary of Agriculture that he may make any law he pleases, he may make any regulation he pleases, he may provide punishment, and when any one of those regulations is violated the boy, the girl, the man, or the woman who violates his rules and regulations shall be fined not less than $25 nor more than $500.

That is more power, I repeat, than either House of Congress or the President has. The very purpose in having two Houses of Congress was to let one be a check on the other, so that if the Senate should hastily do something the House, in its more mature deliberation, might correct the wrong, or vice versa. Then the framers of the Constitution went further and said "We do not propose to let delegates from the States make a law. Congress can not make a law. No," they said, "we will not allow it." They said that the President of the United States, sometimes elected by the people, and sometimes by political tricksters, must place his approval on the bill before it can become a law. And yet here to-day, in April, 1928, the Senate is about to become the father of a law which transfers and gives more authority to the Secretary of Agriculture than is given to the House of Representatives and the Senate combined.

We are about to pass over it as lightly as we recently passed over a bill giving many million dollars for the purchase of the Cape Cod Canal, and just as the other day we came mighty near to authorizing an appropriation of $300,000,000 for the Columbia Basin project. But when the people in the Mississippi Valley come up and want some money, we are told, "I am going to veto it if you do not do so-and-so." There is no veto for money going to the East. There is no veto for money going out into certain sections of the country represented by certain Senators, but if it is to go into another section of the country there is held up a threatened veto, a threat to Congress "if you do thus and so you will have to override a veto."

Why these discriminations? A Senator of these United States, according to my conception, is not here to represent his State alone. If he is, he should resign and go back to his home State and run for the State legislature. A man in the United States Senate, it seems to me, ought to come as a representative of all the people of the country. I have voted for measures which came from the other side of the aisle and been very severely criticized in my home State for it. Some of my best friends have written letters of protest to me and some of the newspapers have had some very harsh things to say because I voted a certain way on certain measures. I voted that way because I believed it was for the best interests of the Nation even though it might not have been for the best interests of my own little State. I do not vote for any measure because it comes from the Republican side or the Democratic side, and I do not vote for it because it is introduced by a friend of mine or a man who is not a friend of mine. I vote for it or against it as I believe it to be for the best interests of the Nation.

Do we get laws enacted in that way? I think not. I have seen Senators come here at the very first of the session and introduce their bills quickly because they wanted to get them started through. Those bills never come out of the committee. They are never reported back to the Senate. There are bills in committees now on which the chairmen have been asked repeatedly to act. Some of those bills were introduced during the first three days of the session and yet we can not get a report on them. Why is that? Some Senators get up here and introduce a bill and somebody will whisper, "That bill is too late; they will never reach it." The next day the bill will be reported back favorably from the committee, and unanimous consent is asked for its immediate consideration, and in less than 48 hours after it is introduced it is passed. Why that discrimination?

A good many of the people of the country do not know of these things, but they are liable to know of them some day. They do not have anybody to go back home and tell them about those things. Of course, the newspapers do not worry themselves about telling anything with reference to those who oppose them. They do not worry about telling anything except about the man who sets them up to good cigars or a good drink of liquor, or something of that kind, then he gets a good write up all the time. His name is continuously in the papers. But if he happens to be not one of the favorites it does not matter what he may say or do. I am not speaking personally in that connection, because I do not want them to praise me. The newspapers in my State sent me here by abusing me, and if they should come out and praise me now I am afraid my home folks would think I had sold out, so I want them to keep on "cussing" me.

But I have seen other Senators get their bills through in the way I have just stated. Why is that? It is the money power, just as the money power is controlling the press in certain sections of the country to-day in connection with the presidential race. They are bought. They are hirelings of the interests, just as much so as the blackest nigger that shines a shoe in a barber shop in my State.

They are working for the same interests and the same pay that the laborer works for, but against the interests of the country unless those interests be dictated by the money interests. We have had some men send emissaries over the country to see how certain candidates would stand for President and who they would nominate. We have a very large money interest in the country to-day that does not care whether Smith or Hoover is nominated. They want to see them both nominated. They want the Democrats to nominate Smith and the Republicans to nominate Hoover. Then they can sit back and laugh. They will have two horses in the race from two different stables owned by the same man and it does not make any difference to them which one wins, the owner of the stables gets the money. That is what is going on in this country and in the Senate Chamber at this time.

I want to comment now on one other section, and this is a very important and very significant one, too. It provides that for the efficient execution of this act the judges of the several courts established under the laws of the United States, the United States commissioners, and persons appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the right to seize certain property which shall be disposed of as provided by section 5 of this bird bill, giving to those people the power not only to arrest a man and deprive him of his right of trial by jury, not only depriving him of the right to be taken before a United States commissioner, but actually giving those men appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture the power to seize the property of the people, when the Constitution particularly and distinctly says that there shall be no seizure and no search without warrant; that no right shall exist to seize the people's property without a proper warrant. Yet here is a section in this bill giving to these agents of the Department of Agriculture the right to seize property without a warrant, without other authority of law than the fact that they are appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture for that purpose.

How far are we intending to go in our efforts to break down the Constitution of the country? An officer may go into a man's home. He does not have to have a warrant for that. A man comes to your door to-night and knocks on the door. You go to the door and ask what he wants. "I want to search your house." "Have you a warrant?" "No." "You want to search my house?" "Yes"; and he deliberately comes in and searches it. If you say, "No; I will shoot you down like a dog if you enter my house without a warrant," then you find that he has some little henchman with him, and the two of them will go back and swear that you came to the door with a flashlight, flashed it on them, and that you had a double-barreled, sawed-off shotgun and poked it in their faces and that they had to shoot in self-defense. Then some little United States judge, with about as much brains as a jay bird, who sits on the bench will direct a verdict of "not guilty." This great agent of the law had a right to shoot that man down in his home without a warrant, the victim not even knowing what he was charged with; and Senators are sitting here and by the act which it is now sought to pass proposing to delegate the same kind of power to a man appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of enforcing a bird law, putting a few birds that they happen to call "migratory" above the lives of the American people and the individual citizens of this country.

I do not think, Mr. President, that some Senators can have read this bill; I think some of them have taken it possibly on good faith. I do not believe that the committee before whom the bill went could possibly have given it that serious thought and consideration that they should have given it, because I do not see how men would vote to give any such power to irresponsible agents.

We hear the question sometimes asked, "Why does not the Government get better men to execute and enforce the law?" How are we going to get decent men to hold a job like that? Where are we going to find them? You can not find a decent man in this country, a man of good blood, a man who has been well bred and well reared—and it takes both to make a true man, although sometimes we see a man who is well bred but is not well reared, and we very often find a well-reared man who is not well bred. [Laughter.] But it is asked, "Why do you not get better men?" Whom are you going to get? Who do you think is going to take a job that will compel the holder of it to come to your house and ask you to go out shooting with him and then when you go out and shoot a bird put his gun on you and say, "I have got you; you have violated the law," as officers do in connection with prohibition enforcement? They come over to a man's house saying, "I have got such a terrible pain in my stomach."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the happy distinction which the Senator from South Carolina made between well-bred and well-reared people reminds me of a remark of John Randolph of Roanoke when he instituted a comparison between Andrew Jackson and John Quincy Adams. He said that Andrew Jackson had no knowledge because he had never been taught, but that John Quincy Adams had none because he was not teachable.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I think John Randolph had it about right. On Sunday last a statue was unveiled in the Capitol to one who I reckon was a great man, and I notice that somebody from my State said there was not but one South Carolinian present. I do not know why the others did not attend, but I had my reason for not going, so I did not go. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Maryland and I thank him for his contribution.

I repeat, Where are you going to get good men for these places? A Government agent goes to a man and says, "I am awful sick. Ain't you got a little whisky?" "I have not got a bit." "You don't know just how sick I am. Can you not give me a little bit or just sell me a little?" The poor fellow who has a half pint or pint goes and gives the man a drink, and he says, "Take this," and lays down a dollar or 50 cents and leaves it there. He then goes out and swears some poor negro or poor white man sold the whisky to him, and has him arrested.

Senators, that is what you are fixing to have under this bird bill. The people are getting tired of it. They submit for a long time and they will take a great deal; there is no question about that; you can fool them a great deal of the time and you can fool a great many of them, but when you just keep on encroaching after a while they are going to stop, and when they stop they are going to stop you. If they can not stop you they are going to stop the man whom you send to take their last little privileges away from them.

Some may say, "But we will hang them." That is all right. Away back yonder—I do not know how many years ago it has been—people were burned at the stake to keep down the Christian religion. They burned Tyndale, the man who translated the first Bible into English; they burned a good many others; but when they got through with the burning they found that the Christian religion was stronger than ever; that Jesus Christ still reigned supreme. So you folk are going to wake up some morning and find that the white people of the American Nation reign supreme, and that they are tired, that they are weary of being dictated to and controlled and shackled and hampered in every contemptible way and by every contemptible kind of means that can be devised which it is thought will break down and destroy their peace and their happiness.

Trial by jury gone! Who is going to submit to it? How long are the people going to submit to it? I do not know how long other States are going to submit to it, but when representatives from my State come up here and vote for bills such as this and some others that are being passed, I know how long they are going to be here. They are going to be here just exactly until the expiration of the time for which they have been commissioned, and beginning at 12 o'clock after that date they are going to be at home, or else they will be loafing around Washington, as some are doing now, lobbying, getting into other people's chairs, and interfering with the business of the Senate. [Laughter.]

I wish the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] would go with me to South Carolina at some time. I would be delighted to have him. I would guarantee him any kind of happiness and pleasure he might want and that money could buy—all he wanted to eat and all he wanted to drink, and nice comfortable places in which to sleep—and let him meet a free people, God's people, God's chosen people, a people whose ancestors fought in the Revolutionary War and in the Mexican War and in the War of 1812; people who themselves fought in the Spanish-American War and in the World War, and some of whom are fighting in Nicaragua yonder right now. One South Carolina boy was killed there the other day. He was supposed to be fighting for liberty; but, poor devil, he did not know what he was doing; the Republican administration just sent him there and fooled him; but he thought he was fighting for his country, and that made it all right with him. He was buried over at Arlington yesterday. They shot a few guns over his grave and blew a bugle, I understand, although I was not able to get there. I do not know what good it did him, but he was accorded the final honors due a soldier, and it was all right to do it, and was some consolation to those he left behind him.

However, as I was saying, I should like to have my friend from South Dakota visit me in South Carolina so that he could see the folks in that State, the good common white folks, with no mixed-up blood in them. Then let him go back to South Dakota and talk to his people there; think of what he has seen and heard in South Carolina; compare the two; and I think he would change his views as to some of these radical measures.

We in South Carolina did not come here from across the water; we have not shoved anybody out of a job. We created our own jobs; we made this country; we made our own liberty; but so long as Congress continues to pass such laws as this intended law now before us, and some others which have been passed, they are simply driving this country farther and farther apart. Of that there can be no doubt.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from South Dakota has come over on this side of the Chamber. I wish to read him something. I quote from the bill, as follows:

> Any person brought before a United States commissioner of competent jurisdiction for a hearing on a complaint charging a violation of this act, or of the migratory bird treaty act (title 16, secs. 703–711, inclusive, U. S. C.), or of title 18, sections 145, 391, 392, 393, or 394, of the United States Code, or any amendment thereof, and who at such hearing admits the violation, may within such time as the commissioner may allow, not exceeding 10 days, pay to said commissioners such sum not exceeding the maximum fines prescribed by said acts and sections, respectively, as may be fixed by said commissioner.

That is a provision of the bill. It is absolutely in violation of the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the various States, because what right, I ask Senators, have they under their constitutional oaths to hold out an inducement to a man who is not guilty of a crime to plead guilty to a crime in order to be let off with a lesser fine? Here is the inducement: Two men go out and they catch a man violating this proposed law, or any other law, although he may not be violating any law, and they say, "I arrest you." He asks, "For what?" They say, "You have violated the bird law." "I have not." But to make a showing they take him before a United States commissioner and say, "It will cost you $50 to get a lawyer; it will take three or four days for your trial; you will have to pay somebody to go on your bond to keep from lying in jail until the trial takes place; but if you will plead guilty, even though you are not guilty, we will get the commissioner to let you off for $25, which would be less than half of what it would otherwise cost you." The poor devil makes the best of the situation, goes to court, pleads guilty, and pays the $25 in order that these agents may report a violation at a certain place or a bird killed at a certain place, and such and such a fine collected.

Senators, that is what I am protesting against. That is a kind of law I do not believe in and that is the kind of law I am standing here to-day endeavoring to try to call to the attention of the Senate.

Then, Mr. President, listen to this grant of double authority:

> SEC. 17. That the patrol for the protection of migratory birds on Federal migratory bird reservations established hereunder in any State may be carried on by such State, through its agency or agencies charged with the administration of its game laws, concurrently with the Secretary of Agriculture whenever so authorized by its legislature.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes.

Mr. NORBECK. I do not want to take up the Senator's time because I know he is hurrying on and everybody wants to bring the consideration of the bill to a close as soon as possible, but the section to which the Senator has just referred was stricken from the bill by the Caraway amendment, and is not in the bill any longer.

Mr. BLEASE. That may be true, Mr. President, but when the bill goes to conference it is going to be put back in the bill. I have seen that done here too often not to know.

I saw a bill here the other day that was allowed to pass, and the objection was withdrawn because they said they would fix the objectionable part in the conference committee. That is a greater power than we have here in these two bodies. I saw a flood control bill go through here, too, the other day. Men sat right here and voted for it for political effect who knew it was not right; but they knew it was going to get into hobbles over yonder, and by the time it got between the two Houses it would be straightened out, and they would have the credit for voting for a bill which, if they had known it was going to be a law right then, they very likely would not have voted for.

So it is with this bill. If this bill ever goes out of the Senate, no matter what shape it is in, and goes across to the other House, all they have got to do is to refuse to agree to certain amendments; and the Vice President sits in that chair, and he is smart. Do not worry about that. He would make a very able President of these United States, too. I will say that in passing; but I have never yet seen him put two men on any conference committee on the same side that were not favorable or unfavorable to that bill, whichever way the Republican Party wanted it to go. Do not worry about that, now; and I do not blame him for it. If he is going to be a Republican, let him be one. If he is going to be Presiding Officer, why, let him preside. If he is not going to be, let him get out and let somebody else be. I believe in that doctrine.

What does that mean? That means to say to your State and to mine, "If you do not want Federal agents coming down here and messing with your business and interfering with your people and haranguing and deviling your people, have your legislature pass this law." That is a beautiful threat. "This is the migratory bird law. We are going to enforce this law. We are going to send agents of the Federal Government down here to enforce this law; but if you will submit to this law peacefully, give up your State rights, give up your individuality, and let your legislature adopt this as the law of your State, we will let you enforce it."

I am opposed to any such legislation. If a law is right, pass it without any provision as to whether anybody will accept it or not. If it is not right, do not pass it under any conditions or circumstances. If that is done, I am satisfied that there will be no mistake as to the laws we pass in this country.

I repeat that I am for State rights. I believe in letting every State in the American Union control its own affairs without interference from any other power, whether it be the Government of the United States or any other government. I realize that that idea is getting very unpopular. I realize that very few people in this country to-day are standing up fairly and squarely for that position. It seems that most of them have about reached the conclusion that they are willing to turn over the making of all laws to Congress, and that Congress has about made up its mind to turn over all the laws that are to be made to bureaus; and after a while, I presume, if it keeps on, somebody will offer a bill to wipe out State lines entirely. Just wipe them out. Do not have any State courts. Do not have any State officials. Just have them like Territories.

Let the President appoint a governor for each State, or some kind of a ruler—a viceroy, as my friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] suggests. Let Congress pass the laws to govern the people of all the States. Let Congress empower some little bureau in each State to make the laws for that particular State. Let Congress be the entire, supreme power and boss of the entire United States of America, without giving to the people of a State the right to make any law for their own self-respect or to confine themselves within their own limits in the making of those laws; but have no State lines. That is what you are rapidly coming to, Senators; and when that day comes, woe be unto America!

Other countries have thought they were mighty big. They thought they ruled the world. Napoleon Bonaparte, I think, got to where he thought the only power that could interfere with him was God. As I read his history, I do think that he believed in a God; but that is what he believed. You see what his end was. We had some great countries in the Old World. They thought they controlled it and owned it. They crumbled. They have passed away and are numbered only in the dim pencilings of history. America might take warning from their fate. There is a higher hand than man's; and when that hand moves it makes no difference how large your citizenship may be; it makes no difference how brainy it may be; it makes no difference how strong it may be; it will crumble. When Americans stand back and think they are the supreme people of all the world, and that no power can interfere with them, we have but to look in our own Chamber. We see men standing here, strong, the very picture of health and young manhood, and in the twinkling of an eye they are gone from the world and from the stage of action. In the same twinkling of an eye this Nation can go.

Mr. President, when it was said that "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," I firmly believe that was intended to apply just as much to the city and to the county and to the State and to the Nation as it applies to the individual. I believe that whatsoever any country sows that country will reap. We are sowing to-day for destruction, for riots, for strikes, for dissatisfaction, for discontent, for unhappiness just as surely as God sits upon His throne, because no few men can take the control of this country in their hands and dominate it to the destruction of the many. Sooner or later the majority will speak, and they will speak in no uncertain terms.

As for me, Mr. President, I should much prefer to have a poor government and a rich people than to have a rich government and a poor people. That is democracy. That is the democracy that this Congress should move forward to instead of looking backward and endeavoring to take away every privilege and every right that any citizen of this country has.

We talk about being a great country. Yes; we are, but are we a great people? That is the question that should come first and uppermost in our minds.

A great people is a democratic people; a people that believes in equal rights to all and special privileges to none; a people that believes that the humblest citizen should have the same care and the same protection as the wealthiest; a people that believes that if the rich and the mighty are able to have on their tables that which is best to eat, and, if they see fit to do so, that which they wish to drink; then the most humble in their peaceful way can have what they wish to eat and what they wish to drink; can have their fun and their pleasure. This bill, however, does not apply to the rich man who comes into South Carolina and buys a big reservation, like Barney Baruch, Joe Frelinghuysen, and other men of money, whom I have not anything against, and whom I welcome to my State. They come there and have these large estates. They bring their friends. They have whatever they want; and when I say "whatever they want," I mean what they want. They go out and hunt deer; they shoot quail; they go fishing Sunday, Monday, or any other time they please, and not a word is said. They are the mighty. They have the money. They own big tracts of land. They are on their own land. But if some man who works in a cotton mill or works in a railroad shop from bright and early Monday morning until Saturday night, or Saturday at 12 o'clock, goes home, takes his little bath, gets a little fishing line or a little shotgun and goes out to fish or goes out to shoot a bird, why, here comes along your law and says, "We will put you in jail." "Why?" "Because you are a poor man, and you do not own a big tract of land. You got on somebody else's land."

That is not equality of government. That is not a fair government. That is not an honest government. You are not honest with your people—no government is—that stands up and says, "If you are able to buy a thousand acres of land in South Carolina, you can drink liquor on it, you can make liquor on it, you can fish in the stream that runs through it, you can hunt all the birds that fly across it; but if you have not got these big acres of land, if you do these things the United States Government will put her strong hand on you and put you in jail or in a chain gang."

That is the kind of government I am protesting against. That is the kind of government that I never have subscribed to, and never intend to subscribe to.

Now, why this bill? I have not heard a single reason given for the passage of this bill—not one—and I have listened to the discussion of it. The only reason is to make a few jobs for somebody in the shape of enforcement officials, and create a graft gang to impose upon somebody whose only possible little happiness in life is to have a little hunting trip or go off fishing. Why keep on, gentlemen? You know I am telling you the truth.

You know just as well as I know that there are some men who can do anything they want to do, and it is hidden. If a policeman sees it, he is afraid to say anything about it. If the sheriff sees it, he is afraid he will be defeated at the next election, or lots of them are, and not a word is said; it is covered up, the darkness of the night hides it. But you let some darkey, or some white man who is not so fortunate, go to the same place and do the same thing, and they will lock him up just as quickly as the police wagon can get there and hurry him to the station.

I want to see a government that will put the President of the United States in jail for violating the law just as quickly as it will put the most humble citizen there, a government that will take a judge off the bench who would go the night before and drink the liquor that he sentences the man the next day for transporting to his room, a government that will take the prosecuting attorney out of his office who will drink liquor and gamble and commit other crimes, and go the next day into court and make the most eloquent speeches to put the poor devil in jail who possibly has brought to his room the whisky he drank.

I want to see a government that will allow every man to have a decent suit of clothes, every man to have good substantial food, not fancy, fine food, but at least good, common food, that will sustain his body and give him the life and existence that his Maker intended for him to have.

I want to see a government that says to the people of the country, "Your liberty is yours, and so long as you do not trample upon the rights of your neighbor, you are living the life of a citizen, and can move on, and we will give you the same protection and the same liberty and the same life that we give to the man of money and the man of means."

Do we have that kind of a government to-day? Certainly not. Does this bill intend to give it? Most assuredly not. This bill is in the interest of the few people, this bill is in the interest of the man who has money; this bill is in the interest of the man who wants to keep a certain class of people down under his foot, who does not want them to realize that they are his equals, who does not want them to know that the American Government is theirs as much so as it is the rich man's.

Mr. President, when that form of government comes, there will not be the idleness there is to-day all over this country, farms will not be put on the block all over this country, and there will not be a Federal land bank like the one run in Columbia, S. C., violating the law, buying in land in the name of the Government, and creating a country of landlords and serfs.

I have heard much talk about the farmers, and helping the farmers. No man thinks more of the farmer than I do. I wish I knew how to help him by legislation. But it is not helping him to have a land bank, like the one in Columbia, S. C., that charges so much as an attorney's fee to look up a little piece of land, charges a commissioner's fee to go out and look over the land and appraise it, charges so much fees for drawing papers, and then charges a double rate of interest for the money, then, when the man can not pay, sells him out, turns him and his little children into the street, and buys the land in the name of the rich United States Government.

It is just such laws as that and just such laws as this measure, Mr. President, that are creating the discontent in this country.

Mr. President, in the journal of the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina for the extra session of 1914, on page 107, I quote the following from my message of Wednesday, October 7, 1914:

In my speech at Charleston, following the first primary, I said to the people that the western Senators and Members of the National House of Representatives were not going to permit the United States Government to do what Senator SMITH and his friends and supporters had promised, and that if they were not careful, instead of carrying out the policies which had been promised, the next thing we would hear of would be a demand from other parts of the United States for a tax on cotton. How true was the prophecy! The people who heard the Dillon speech and the Charleston speech will bear witness that I made these prophecies.

I referred to this statement in my remarks, which will be found on page 6361 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 13, 1928.

Mr. President, I read now for the information of the Senate the following letter:

THE EQUALIZATION FEE AND COTTON

The above subject reminds me of Johnny, who was kicked in the face by the cow. His mother called the doctor and asked if he could restore his looks. The doctor said, "No; that his face was disfigured, but Johnny now knows more about a cow." When the kick-back from applying an equalization fee on cotton hits the men in public life, they will be disfigured for the rest of their political careers, but will then know more about cotton. The McNary-Haugen bill proposes to place an equalization fee or tax on cotton as ginned. It will tax bolly cotton the same as high-grade cotton, although the difference in price between the two may be 15 or 20 cents per pound. What the farmers who raise low-grade cotton will say when they pay this tax will be a plenty. The bill provides that the tax revenue shall be applied for the benefit of the contributing commodity. That's what the bill says now. But when this tax is once established and a subsequent Republican Congress, as expediency demands, revises this feature, cotton farmers will find that they will probably be paying a tax for the benefit of wheat and corn producers.

We all know the affection the Greeks held for the Trojans when they made the gift of the wooden horse. The Wheat and Corn Belts of the Middle West are handing the cotton farmers a wooden horse. The equalization fee was conceived in the interest of the wheat and corn farmers of the Middle West. Their representatives feel that this equalization fee will be of benefit to wheat and corn, and then they seek to induce the cotton representatives to apply the same thing to cotton. Now, if the wheat and corn Congressmen feel sincerely that the equalization fee will be of benefit to wheat and corn let the representatives of the Southern Cotton States offer to vote for the bill applying the equalization fee to wheat and corn but excluding cotton from this feature of the bill. Do you think these Middle West Congressmen will accept the offer? If they sincerely feel that the equalization fee is such a good thing for wheat and corn, they will accept the offer, but if they reject it and insist that the equalization fee must apply to cotton as well as to wheat and corn their sincerity can well be doubted. Who ever heard of a Congressman from the Middle West attempting to force on cotton from the Southland a boon it does not want? The difference between cotton on the one hand and wheat and corn on the other is very marked.

Of a corn crop of approximately 2,800,000,000 bushels, 50,000,000 bushels will be exported. Of a cotton crop of 13,000,000 bales, 8,000,000 bales will be exported. Of a wheat crop of 850,000,000 bushels, 225,000,000 will be exported. It will take a comparatively small levy on corn to absorb the loss from exporting 50,000,000 bushels at less than market price, and likewise a comparatively small levy on wheat for the same purpose. As to cotton, it is different. We export 60 per cent of the crop. Therefore the 40 per cent remaining in this country will have to bear the burden of a loss resulting from exporting at a sacrifice. If the workings of the bill bring about a material increase in the price of cotton exported, the world will turn to cotton other than from America. To-day we produce about 60 per cent of the world's crop. Let us attempt to artificially elevate the price and the world will rebel "on" cotton, just as it did "on" rubber. England imposed the Stevenson rubber scheme when it had a practical monopoly on rubber. The result was stimulation of production and intensive research for new rubber fields. England had to abandon the project, not, however, until its Indian colony of rubber producers had been immeasurably injured, for the "outside production" that had thus been stimulated will be permanent competitors.

If the cotton farmers want to build up severe competitors from sections that do not now grow cotton, pass this McNary-Haugen bill and artificially elevate the price to the foreign consumers or export it at a loss, impose the penalty on the American farmers and incur their everlasting resentment—once the experiences of the working of the bill manifest themselves.

It is well to note here 3,000 acres planted this year to cotton in a new cotton section of Russia. (See Foreign Crops and Markets, April 9, 1928.)

No prudent man ever indulges in a venture without carefully considering first whether the same is justified by conditions and then whether the probable gains warrant the risks. In corn, demand is shrinking—Europe is rapidly increasing its hog family and curtailing its demand for American hog products. The Government, in a recent report, stated that the number of horses on farms is less than 20 years ago. A few years ago hogs on feed were reported as 70,000,000; to-day, around 56,000,000. In cotton it is different—the world's use of cotton is expanding—the automobile, responsible for decline in use of the horse, is absorbing cotton in increasing amounts. In 1926 the United States raised a record crop of around 18,000,000 bales of lint. It has practically all disappeared. Consumption of American cotton a few years back was 13,000,000 per year; to-day it is estimated at 16,000,000. It is now claimed that unless we raise this year 15,000,000 bales cotton will sell at 25 cents per pound. And yet, with this glorious picture before us, cotton Congressmen, from cotton States, consider penalizing the cotton farmer with this equalization-fee venture, because corn with its shrinking consumption has hypnotized them.

It is popular to cry "farm relief," but should every farm product be treated with the same physic? Because some have diphtheria, should everyone in the community be treated with antitoxin? Because corn is in distress, should the welfare of the cotton farmer be encroached upon? Give corn what it wants but save the cotton farmer from his "corn friends."

Yours sincerely,

DAN SONNENTHEIL,
993 Park Avenue, New York City, and Dallas, Tex.

I think, Mr. President, that I was the only southern Senator who lives in a cotton-growing State who voted against the McNary-Haugen bill in the Senate. I have no doubt but that the letter which I have just read will be of some interest to some of the Members of the House of Representatives, and I hope that somebody interested in this matter will be kind enough to call the attention of the President of the United States to the letter, so that when he gets the bill he can put on it what he did when a similar bill was passed before. I do not know how many votes there will be here to pass it over his veto, but I assure him that there will be one from a cotton-growing State that will certainly vote not to pass it over his veto.

The so-called farm relief bill, this migratory bird bill, and some other few bills that I could mention are the kind of bills that I have spoken about this afternoon. They are the things I have tried in my feeble way to call to the attention of the Senate. If the Senate does not see fit to listen to what I have to say, or to pay any attention to it, I hope it will not be entirely wasted, but that the people of this country, those who have not the privilege of being Representatives or Senators and those who have not the privilege of owning great estates and large tracts of land where they can go and enjoy the privileges by themselves, or take a body of their friends with them and violate the laws openly with impunity—I hope that they, the people, will at least receive some information by having called to their attention the matters about which I have spoken this afternoon.

I hope that Senators in their leisure moments will sometimes stop to think how they would like to be treated as they are treating the ordinary poor people of the country. I do not know that every Senator here is a rich man. I have never taken the time to look it up and never expect to do so, because it is none of my business whether they are rich or poor. But I have an idea that somewhere in this body there are some men who have to appeal at home not to the political bosses or to the ring, who do not have to jump at the crack of the whip of the ringmaster, who will stop and consider and think how far we have gone with this class of legislation and endeavor to give some relief to the people of the country.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw that until we can get a vote. If it is necessary to have a yea-and-nay vote, we can get a quorum in that way.

Mr. BLEASE. I want a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] as a substitute for section 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I think we can avoid the necessity for calling a quorum. I will accept the amendment which the Senator suggests, and then we will get a vote on the bill without having a roll call or a quorum call. I move that all of section 14, from line 12 on, be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, beginning with line 12, strike out the following:

Any person brought before a United States commissioner of competent jurisdiction for a hearing on a complaint charging a violation of this act, or of the migratory bird treaty act (title 16, secs. 703 to 711, inclusive, of the U. S. C.), or of title 18, sections 145, 391, 392, 393, or 394 of the United States Code, or any amendment thereof, and who at such hearing admits the violation, may within such time as the commissioner may allow, not exceeding 10 days, pay to said commissioner, such sum not exceeding the maximum fines prescribed by said acts and sections, respectively, as may be fixed by said commissioner, and upon payment thereof and of the legal costs such person shall be relieved from prosecution for said violation. Unless the amount so fixed by the commissioner, and the costs, be paid at the hearing the commissioner shall require the usual bond for the appearance of the accused before the district court. Upon payment of said amount and costs within the time allowed by the commissioner such bond shall become null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and at the expiration of said time shall be transmitted by the commissioner to the district court in the usual course. All moneys received by a United States commissioner pursuant to this section shall be transmitted by him to the clerk of the United States district court for disposition in accordance with the law for the disposition of fines and costs collected in such courts; and each commissioner shall report in duplicate to the Attorney General quarterly, on or before the 15th day of January, April, July, and October of each year, all such proceedings had before him and all amounts of money received by him therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] gave notice that he would ask for a separate vote on the amendment on page 3, line 15. Without objection, the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in. The question is on concurring in the amendment on which the Senator from Ohio asked a separate vote, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 19, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "hereunder by Congress from time to time."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, in order to be agreeable to my friend from Kansas, I withdraw my request for a quorum. The Senator from South Dakota has stricken from the bill one very objectionable feature. I still object to the bill, but I shall not delay the Senate by asking for a yea-and-nay vote. However, I want to be recorded as still being opposed to the measure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

On a division, the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and authorizing appropriations for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes."

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in a recent press dispatch going out from Washington it was stated, in reference to several southern dry Democratic Senators, including myself, that we were now being disturbed by a suspicion that the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and similar dry organizations had decided to let Smith seek the nomination and then turn to the Republican Party in a body in the November election. As to myself, and so far as my knowledge goes as to the other Senators alluded to, this statement is erroneous. I have no such suspicion or thought, and I feel sure that my dry southern colleagues have no such suspicion or thought.

Another inaccuracy, doubtless unintentional, in the dispatch is the statement that it is my belief that the drys in the Democratic Party have failed to organize any campaign at all.

DECORATIONS FOR OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5898) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of service rendered, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SWANSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 818, House bill 12286, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not think we can get anywhere with the consideration of the bill this afternoon. There are some of us who want to discuss it.

Mr. CURTIS. It is not intended to proceed with the consideration of the bill this afternoon. It will be laid aside immediately for an executive session, and its consideration will be resumed to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 19, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art our ever-blessed Heavenly Father, the manliest act that we can do is the uplook of our lives to the eternal, the drinking of our souls of the fountain of life, the kneeling of ourselves in humility in which we can be exalted in the sight of God! O it is the rapture of a golden day without a dark outline! O great lamp of life, radiate from the heights of Thy holy hill; O light that falls from the upper world, shine on our country; O voice of God, speak to the people, for only Thou art holy! Not for our salvation, not for our personal exaltation. These are not the motives why we desire to be pure, faithful, strong upright men. It is that we may have a place in the great army of God and go forward, having something to do with the work that is destined to preserve our country and bless all humanity. Hear us, blessed Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am advised by telephone that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] will be unable to serve on the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, and I am authorized to present his resignation to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SUMNERS, to fill the vacancy.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of vocational education.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, much has been said on this floor with reference to farm relief. I do not wish to minimize the value of debate in focusing public attention on so important a subject. There comes a time, however, when legislative action is more important than discussion. This is particularly true when the proposed action is along lines that have proven successful in affording some measure of relief. The problems of agriculture are so many, so varied, and so complex that no thoughtful person would expect to find a legislative panacea for all the ills with which our basic national industry is afflicted. That the situation is serious and one of great importance is testified to not alone by farmers, but by distinguished business men who view the subject as one of grave national concern. A few excerpts from the findings of a commission composed of distinguished business men will indicate quite clearly the necessity for immediate action on H. R. 12241:

Everywhere modern development has put agriculture under pressure; and everywhere the struggle is on to preserve the integrity of the farmer.

* * * * * * *

Any serious and careful consideration of the solution and trend of American agriculture makes it clear that in relation to it the United States is confronted with a question of fundamental national concern and of permanent importance to the American people.

* * * * * * *

Agriculture is not merely a way of making money by raising crops; it is not merely an industry or a business; it is essentially a public function or service performed by private individuals for the care and use of the land in the national interest, and farmers in the course of their pursuit of a living and a private profit are the custodians of the basis of the national life.

* * * * * * *

The disparity between urban and farm incomes has emphasized the disparity in standards of living in the rural and urban populations and caused a large net migration to the cities.

* * * * * * *

With declining farm income, the burden of State and local taxes resting upon farm property, the assessment of which was also but slowly readjusted, tended to rise sharply.

* * * * * * *

Furthermore, a relatively sudden increase in transportation costs, following the restoration of the railroads to private management, occurred at the time when the general price level, and with it the prices of agricultural commodities, were falling sharply.

* * * * * * *

Agriculture embraces about a quarter of the American people and in the past it has connoted a type of citizen, an attitude of mind, and a way of life all of which have been of the highest importance to the social and political welfare of the Nation.

* * * * * * *

Extension of the county agent system is desirable in order to bring home the results of scientific research to the individual farmer. * * * Finally, special attention should be given to the functions of the rural schools in the education of the young people in rural districts with a view not only to improving their efficiency as future farmers but also to cultivating in them a more fundamental appreciation of the values of farming as a way of life and as a profession.

* * * * * * *

The farm population, as is well known, has been increasing much less rapidly than the urban population for a long period of time, so that while in 1820 it formed about 90 per cent of the total, in 1920 it was 29.9 per cent of the whole population.

* * * * * * *

The mortgage indebtedness of farmers has shown a considerable increase since 1920 in spite of strenuous efforts to curtail agricultural loans. It is estimated that the total mortgage debt of the agricultural industry rose from $7,860,000,000 in 1920 to $8,500,000,000 in 1925.

[NOTE.—W. M. Jardine, Secretary of Agriculture, recently estimated the mortgage debt for 1926 at $9,500,000,000.]

Another indication of the difficulties under which agriculture has been laboring in recent years is to be seen in the high rates of failure of farm enterprises. These failures are reflected in foreclosure of mortgage, bankruptcy, default of contract, or other transfers to avoid foreclosure, and forced sales for delinquent taxes. Studies made by the United States Department of Agriculture showed that in 1924 and 1925 forced transfers of farms for these reasons constituted slightly over one-third of all transfers of farm property.

* * * * * * *

More significant is the fact that in the year ended March 15, 1926, out of each 1,000 farms in the United States 21.39 changed ownership as a result of forced sales and similar defaults.

* * * * * * *

In 1925 there were 80,390 fewer farms operated by owners and 107,932 more farms operated by tenants than in 1910.

* * * * * * *

It is estimated that in 1922, 27 per cent of the tenant farms of this country changed occupants, and the figure has probably declined only little since then. Men who remain so short a time on a farm obviously can not be expected to employ agricultural methods which conserve the soil fertility or to identify themselves with the cooperation, educational, or social activities of the rural community.

* * * * * * *

When the prices of farm products fell, taxes did not follow.

* * * * * * *

Direct farm taxes in 1913 amounted to $315,000,000; in 1922 they were $861,000,000, an increase of 173.3 per cent.

All taxes, direct and indirect, paid by the farmer in 1913 amounted to $624,000,000; in 1922 to $1,436,000,000, an increase of 130.1 per cent.

Considered on a per acre basis, the increase between 1914 and 1922 was from 31 cents per acre in the former year to 71 cents per acre in the latter; that is, 125 per cent.

The general property taxes levied by State and local governments took $308,000,000 from the farmers in 1913, but $787,000,000 in 1922, an increase of 155.5 per cent.

Taxes collected from the farms in 1920–21 amounted to about 13 per cent of the farmers' net income and to nearly six times the total net farm profits.

* * * * * * *

[NOTE.—In 1921–22 taxes absorbed 77.7 per cent of the total agricultural net profits.]

* * * * * * *

Our agriculture embraces a quarter of the American people and in the past it has connoted a type of citizen, an attitude of mind, and a way of life. It is of the highest importance to the Nation to know how changes in agriculture that may make for greater prosperity may also alter all these in the future. A certain degree of prosperity is essential to a full life, but that full life, and not prosperity alone, is the end at which one should aim.

* * * * * * *

The process of attrition of agriculture which is now going on in this country is a matter of about which we may feel deep concern and which calls for the earnest application of constructive statesmanship.

* * * * * * *

The preservation and improvement from agriculture presents to the American people a national problem which commands their earnest thought and public-spirited action.

[From the Condition of Agriculture in the United States and Measures for its Improvement]

EDUCATION OF THE FARM YOUTH

It is certain that the task of transmitting to the rank and file of the farmers the results of agricultural research work must largely be attacked through improvements in education of the rural youth. * * * The rural schools can be of great help in transmitting better methods to our future farmers. In the opinion of the commission this phase of rural education has not yet received the necessary attention. At present the rural schools consider it their main task to dispense a type of education which seems ill-suited to the probable needs of the pupils. Little consideration is given to the fundamentals of agriculture and the curriculum seems to be shaped almost completely to meet the requirements necessary for entrance into high school or college. It is not suggested that the rural school become a training ground solely for the vocation of agriculture, but the fact remains that most of the children who stay in the locality will pursue that calling, and it therefore seems that a curriculum which does not completely ignore this fact might be more beneficial than that now normally pursued.

The prosperity of the American farmer depends upon his efficiency relative to foreign competitors. To attain and preserve an American standard of living he must constantly keep several steps in advance of those competitors. This can be adequately done only through education. A well-conceived program of education, moreover, will not only help to provide the means of living well, but will in itself contribute to better living and working conditions. Its benefits will not be rapidly attained nor spectacular, but they will work out their results in a thousand devious but effective ways, and education will thus be one of the most important means for improving conditions on our farms and giving American agriculture the standing which it must have if the Nation is to maintain its proper place in the progress of mankind.

Above all, the commission wishes to emphasize the importance of giving to our rural education in large degree a character and a quality which will help to conserve and improve rural life. If we are to preserve some of the fundamental characteristics of farming as a way of life and a noble calling, our farm youth must be brought to a clearer realization of its intangible values and its advantages in contrast to urban activities, and the farmer himself must in larger measure be brought to conceive of his occupation not as a temporary makeshift in which he may well be content to accept lower returns for his labor than his city fellow in the hope of speculative returns on his land values, but as an opportunity for a rich, well-rounded life in which his intelligence and culture and all the resources of community life may find full scope for development.

The foregoing excerpts are from a report of the business men's commission on agriculture. It was published jointly by the National Industrial Conference Board of New York and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, long prior to the war there had been a widespread popular demand that our public-school education should be democratized and take account of the practical needs of the youth of the country. The Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education was created by act of Congress approved January 20, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission of nine members—to consider the subject of national aid for vocational education and report their findings and recommendations not later than June 1, next.

Pursuant to this act, President Taft appointed the commission, which organized April 2, 1914, and hearings were begun April 20, 1914, and concluded May 8, 1914. The Smith-Hughes Act, as recommended by the commission, was enacted in 1917.

The purpose of House bill 12241 is to broaden the scope of the work under the Smith-Hughes Act in order to reach the farm boys and girls in larger numbers. The bill in no way changes the policy of the basic act except that the money will be allocated on the basis of farm population instead of rural population. The need is shown by the facts developed at the hearings. The testimony indicates that there were somewhere near 1,000,000 farm boys in public schools between the ages of 14 and 21 in the United States in 1927. In 1923, 6.9 per cent of the farm boys received vocational agricultural work; in 1924, 8.2 per cent; in 1925, 8.5 per cent; in 1926, 9.9 per cent; and in 1927, only 10.6 per cent.

The hearings on H. R. 12241 disclose that after the vocational work had been in operation about five years a survey was made to ascertain what became of the boys who had taken the vocational work. The Federal board made a study of 8,000 boys who had taken vocational agricultural training. The board found that of the 8,000 boys that had taken one or more years of vocational agricultural instruction in schools, 59 per cent of them were actually farming, 6 per cent of them were engaged in related occupations, 9 per cent in agricultural colleges, 15 per cent went to other colleges, and 11 per cent were in nonagricultural occupations. That was the result five years ago. Another survey has just been made by the Federal board covering the five-year period ending in 1927. This record also shows 59 per cent of the boys actually engaged in farming, 9 per cent in related occupations, and 2 per cent going to agricultural colleges.

The hearings disclose that the Smith-Hughes law of 1917 has been successful, especially in stimulating a real interest on the part of farm boys in agriculture. This bill H. R. 12241 has for its sole purpose the extension of the benefits now enjoyed by hundreds of communities in the United States out into the rural communities not now enjoying those privileges. This is essentially a bill to benefit the rural districts. It is a practical method tested and proven successful in keeping the farm boy and girl on the farm.

In this connection let me state that the record shows that there are 11,561 rural high schools in the United States. It is in these rural high schools that vocational agriculture is taught at the present time, but only 29 per cent have been reached as yet.

It is the other 71 per cent of the 11,561 rural high schools which this bill seeks to reach and benefit. Let us see if it really is in conflict with the financial policy of our Government.

The record is clear and undisputed that the financial expenditure thus far made for vocational agricultural instruction has brought a financial return to the country far in excess of the investment. Those who oppose the measure for economic reasons should examine the results in dollars and cents. Let me quote Doctor Lane:

Every boy who elects to take the vocational work as a part of his high-school education is required to carry on for at least six months at home some definite practical work under the supervision of his teacher. Now, that means an economic return on the part of the boys in the production of livestock or crops or some other work around the farm. The total labor income from this practical work during the past five years was $23,637,924.25. That is not an estimate. It is based upon accurate cost accounting. * * * For every dollar of Federal funds spent for vocational agriculture there was a financial return of $2.25 realized by the boys from their labor. * * * The total Federal funds spent for salaries of teachers of vocational agriculture during the five-year period was $10,418,460 and there was realized $23,637,924.25 from the other practical work the boys did.

The Committee on Education, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has reported the bill and it is on the calendar. A resolution asking for a rule has been introduced and referred to the Rules Committee.

CERTIFICATES OF CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY REQUIRED OF RAILROADS

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to interpose an objection, but we have a very important matter before the House now, and one or two other gentlemen this morning have indicated a desire to make a similar request. Under the circumstances, I wish the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw his request at this time.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman let me proceed for 10 minutes this afternoon? It is a matter that I wish very much to discuss.

Mr. SNELL. We have before us a very important matter, and I do not think we ought to postpone it for anything else.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman allow me to proceed for five minutes?

Mr. SNELL. I do not think it would be fair to others to agree to that, and I must object.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am not going to take up any time on general debate on this bill, and if the gentleman would just allow me now to express what I wish in the RECORD I shall be very glad. The bill I have introduced is a very important matter.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] also desires time this morning.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to talk on the bill that is pending.

Mr. SNELL. I shall not object to the gentleman from North Carolina occupying one minute.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill that I have introduced, affecting the certificates of convenience and necessity that are required now by the Interstate Commerce Commission of all railroads which desire to extend new lines or build railroads. I have introduced a bill which affects two sovereign States. I wish to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the matter as pending.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, one of the most far-reaching decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission was rendered on April 3, 1928, when that body denied the Piedmont & Northern Railway Co. the right to construct extensions of its lines from Spartanburg, S. C., to Gastonia, N. C., and from Charlotte, N. C., to Winston-Salem, N. C.

Such power as has been exercised by six men who rendered the decision could not have been contemplated by the most ardent supporters of the interstate commerce act. No one could have dreamed that men chosen by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate to carry out the mandate of Congress would ever have exercised such power as is evidenced by the decision in this case.

The Piedmont & Northern Railway was incorporated in South Carolina by a special act of the legislature adopted February 24, 1911, and amended January 27, 1927. The charter granted to this company—all the rights, privileges, and franchise given unto railway corporations under and by virtue of the general statutes of this State, and all amendatory and supplemental acts.

The company was authorized to—construct, maintain, and operate a line or lines of railway, with one or more tracks, to be operated by electricity or other motive power—in and through certain counties in South Carolina and such other counties in the State as may be selected by the corporation with the right—to purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire the railway and other property, including the rights and franchise, of any other railroad company, or street railway company, now in existence or hereafter created, in this State, or in any other State of the United States, etc.

There were three of the commission who dissented to the majority opinion. They were Commissioners McManamy, Esch, and Brainerd.

Commissioner Brainerd, in his dissenting opinion, said:

The record shows that the applicant is an electric railway other than street or suburban; that it is engaged in the general transportation of freight; and that it is not operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation. Although it is true that this carrier thus engaged and operated is subject to our jurisdiction under section 15 (a) of the act, because "engaged in the general transportation of freight," it is, nevertheless, an interurban electric railway, and not being operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation, it is in express terms excluded from the commission's jurisdiction to issue or refuse a certificate of public convenience and necessity. Interurban electric railways are brought under the provisions of the act concerning the issuance of certificates of public convenience and necessity only when they are operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation. Paragraph (22) of section 1 reads as follows:

"(22) The authority of the commission conferred by paragraphs (18) to (21), both inclusive, shall not extend to the construction or abandonment of spur, industrial team, switching, or side tracks, located or to be located, wholly within one State, or of street, suburban, or interurban electric railways, which are not operated as a part or parts of a general steam railroad system of transportation."

The act does not distinguish between a "commercial railroad operated by electricity" and an interurban electric railroad not operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation, and we can make no such distinction.

Commissioner McManamy held as follows, and Commissioner Esch, one of the authors of the Esch-Cummins Act, transportation act, joined in the dissent:

The ability of the applicant to finance the work has not been questioned, nor has objection been raised to the proposed financial structure. Public interest and the need for the service has been shown by the testimony of the Governor and members of the Railroad Commission of South Carolina, the Governor and members of the Corporation Commission of North Carolina, the county and municipal officers of every county and municipality that will be reached by the proposed line, and by some not reached by the proposed line who desire changes in its location or extensions in order that they also may be served by it. Civic and commercial organizations, manufacturers, merchants, and farmers along the proposed route with exceptional unanimity appeared and testified as to the need for and the benefits which would flow from the additional service. Surely no more convincing showing of public interest could be made.

Against this, as stated in the report of the majority, "no opposition is voiced except by the carriers now serving the territory." These carriers admit that the new line would get at least as much traffic and revenue as it has estimated, and it is not shown that the ability of the carriers now serving the territory to render service would be thereby impaired. It is admitted that "there would no doubt be some benefit to the region immediately served, notwithstanding some impairment that would be likely to result, temporarily at least, in the service of existing lines." The existing lines are not weak railroads. They are among the most prosperous of the country. Their earnings are ample. They are approaching, if not already in, the recapture class. Under such conditions benefit to the region immediately served should not be denied because of the probability that some temporary impairment might result to existing lines when, as a matter of fact, the showing is that diversion of all the traffic which protestants claim would be diverted would not seriously affect their revenue.

It is true that the proposed line will parallel existing steam lines at distances varying from 0 to 13 miles, but this is also true of practically every other electric line. It is also true that it will not immediately be self-supporting from new business which it will create, although the showing is that a substantial portion of its revenues will come from such sources. The record shows that the proposed line will, because of more frequent service and stops, render a service more nearly approaching that of motor trucks, which is admittedly desirable in an industrial district such as this. On the showing here made, the certificate should be granted.

Commissioner Aitchison did not participate, being necessarily absent, so the record says.

Commissioner Woodlock, the record states, was necessarily absent, but had he been present he would have concurred in the result.

The other six members rendered the decision denying the application.

It was shown that the Interstate Commerce Commission had never treated the Piedmont & Northern Railway as subject to the valuation act; that it is governed by the accounting rules of the commission as laid down for electric railways; that on October 12, 1920, the Interstate Commerce Commission made an informal ruling that the Piedmont & Northern Railway was not subject to the provisions of the transportation act relating to the issue of securities, and the Railroad Labor Board ruled that the Piedmont & Northern Railway's line was an electric interurban railroad not operated as a part of a steam railroad system.

In the application of this company before the Interstate Commerce Commission it was contended that the commission had no jurisdiction in that it was an interurban electric railway and not being operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation (and this is what Commissioner Brainerd holds).

Paragraph (22) of section 1 of the interstate commerce act says:

(22) The authority of the commission conferred by paragraphs (18) to (21), both inclusive, shall not extend to the construction or abandonment of spur, industrial, team, switching, or side tracks located or to be located wholly within one State, or of street, suburban, or interurban electric railways which are not operated as a part or parts of a general steam railroad system of transportation.

Those joining in the application for a certificate of convenience and necessity with the railway were:

The Governor of the State of North Carolina, as representing the State; the attorney general of the State of North Carolina; the corporation commission of the State of North Carolina, by its entire membership (this is the utility commission of the State), and the attorney for the commission; the county of Mecklenburg, N. C.; the city of Charlotte, N. C.; the Charlotte Shippers and Manufacturers Association (Inc.); Charlotte Chamber of Commerce; Charlotte Merchants' Association; Charlotte Automotive Merchants' Association; Winston-Salem Chamber of Commerce; county of Davidson, N. C.; city of Lexington, N. C.; Lexington Chamber of Commerce; Lexington Retail Merchants' Association; county of Rowan, N. C.; city of Salisbury, N. C.; Salisbury Chamber of Commerce; Salisbury-Spencer Merchants' Association; Carolina Shippers' Association, a large organization composed of shippers comprising a large portion of North Carolina; county of Gaston, N. C.; city of Gastonia, N. C.; Gastonia Chamber of Commerce; town of McAdenville, N. C.; town of Lowell, N. C.; town of Belmont, N. C.; town of Kings Mountain, N. C.; Kings Mountain Chamber of Commerce; North Carolina Cotton Manufacturers' Association; Governor of South Carolina, representing State of South Carolina; South Carolina Cotton Manufacturers' Association; Railroad Commission of South Carolina; county and city chamber of commerce of Anderson, S. C.; cities of Belton and Honea Path, S. C.; city and Chamber of Commerce of Blackburg, S. C.; county of Cherokee, S. C.; county and city chamber of commerce of Gafney, S. C.; county and city chamber of commerce of Greensville, S. C.; county and city chamber of commerce of Greenwood, S. C.; Spartanburg Transportation Association and the county, city, and Chamber of Commerce of Spartanburg, S. C.; the Georgia & Florida Railroad. In brief, those who asked for this permission for the extension of the Piedmont & Northern Railway Co. were not only the railway company itself, but the sovereign State of North Carolina, and practically all of the public interests representing the shippers, manufacturers, and other business interests of the State, and the sovereign State of South Carolina, and practically all of the public interests representing the shippers, manufacturers, and other business interests of that State, and the Georgia & Florida Railroad, which affected the States of Georgia and Florida very materially.

These were the interests that asked for the permission to construct this road wholly within the States of North Carolina and South Carolina and the only interests that opposed the extension and permission for a certificate of convenience and necessity, quoting from the opinion of the commission itself:

No opposition is voiced except by the carriers now serving the territory.

To put this matter in plain and simple language, we find a commission here in Washington which by vote of half of its membership denied to two sovereign States the right to have constructed strictly within the borders of their States an extension of an electric railway. What have we come to in this day of government by bureaus and commissions? Is there no relief for the people? There is relief, but we can not and may not expect to get this relief from the powerful Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress can grant this relief. Under the procedure in the House and under the rules which are now in force and in existence, if we undertake to get that relief by an act amending the interstate commerce law, this bill will have to run the gantlet of the powerful Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the powerful Rules Committee, the majority steering committee, the majority leader of the House, and the Speaker of the House.

A bill amending the interstate commerce law, taking away from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power which has been exercised in such cases as the Piedmont & Northern Railway matter, was introduced in December last by Senator SIMMONS and is now pending in the Senate. I have introduced a similar measure in the House, and it has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for their consideration.

I have taken this opportunity to bring this matter to the attention of the House and the country, to the end that some relief may be given the public from the arbitrary exercise of the power which the Interstate Commerce Commission has taken unto itself under the interstate commerce law.

The President of the United States in an address before the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution here this week called attention to the growing evil of government by bureaus and commissions. I trust that we may have the powerful influence of the President to so amend this interstate commerce law that another instance of arbitrary power may not be exercised by this commission as was done in the Piedmont & Northern Railway case. It may be of interest to the House to know that the counsel who presented this matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission on behalf of the Piedmont & Northern Railway were Hon. Mark W. Potter, of New York City, former member of the commission; W. S. O'B. Robinson, jr., of Charlotte; former Governor Cameron Morrison, of the State of North Carolina; that very distinguished citizen, Charles E. Hughes, former Secretary of State and former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Hon. W. G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury; and the attorneys general of the States of North Carolina and South Carolina, and a number of other able and distinguished attorneys representing the various interests that were joined in this application for a certificate of convenience and necessity.

Against this great array of distinguished citizens representing, as they did, all shades of political faith and all shades of business interests, the opposition was represented by the carriers themselves and no one else. This is carrying to the extreme the question of government by commissions. I do not know whether my action in this matter will have any effect or not, but I can only voice my strong opposition to such a situation. I hope that by instituting this opposition we may eventually get some relief for the people through congressional action.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in addition to the time allotted for general debate in the discussion of the flood control bill I may have 15 minutes. If I can get time from both sides I can not take it from either side with a moral obligation that I shall support the bill or amendments that may be offered. Coming as I do from a State that is to pay a large portion of the cost, and being sympathetic with the proposition, it seems to me that the request to get 15 minutes on the bill is rather modest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time allotted for general debate be extended 15 minutes, to be occupied by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, that is establishing a new precedent. I do not desire to object, but with five hours of debate it seems ample time would be afforded so that the gentleman would have opportunity to express himself. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his request.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection for a few minutes. The request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is worthy of consideration. The gentleman from New York is one of the leaders on the Republican side.

Mr. SNELL. That simply shows that we are absolutely fair here. [Applause.]

PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill [S. 2900] granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, with House amendments thereto, and insist on the amendments of the House and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2900, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD, Mr. ELLIOTT, and Mr. UNDERWOOD.

MEDALS IN THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I desire to make a unanimous-consent request to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5898, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 5898, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what about the minority? Has the gentleman consulted the minority?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I have. I have just come from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BRITTEN, BURDICK, and VINSON of Georgia.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3740, for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3740, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY]. [Applause.]

Mr. GREGORY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, those of you who just a year ago witnessed the mad rush of the mighty Father of Waters, sweeping like a destroying angel over hundreds of proud cities, thousands of happy and contented homes, and millions of acres of fertile fields, or who later visited the stricken area to view the scenes of the greatest peace-time disaster this country has ever experienced, know how futile would be the effort of the most gifted tongue or the most facile pen to describe the wreckage and the ruin, the horror and the agony which were left in the wake of the 1927 flood. Scenes such as those beggar description. While the wild ride of the Four Horsemen—death, pestilence, famine, and war between heroic men and the heartless elements—from Cairo to the sea can not be obliterated from the memory of the people of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi, like soldiers returned from the hell of the battle field, they do not care to speak of their hardships, and if they do speak of them they are prone to minimize them. While the columns of the press throughout the land were blackened with great headlines each day over a period of several weeks, describing the ruthless, onward march of the flood, and the hearts of millions living in remote sections melted in sympathy for the defenseless victims of the wrath of the waters, the lapse of time has, in a measure, healed the wounds of those tragic days. Nevertheless I am persuaded that the great heart of America is not asleep. It has not forgotten the obligation of the Nation to the stricken and suffering people of the Mississippi Valley.

Too long has the Congress marked time in the matter of enacting legislation to afford the people of the lower Mississippi Valley some assurance that there shall be no recurrence of the calamity of last year. The eyes of the Nation are upon this body this week as it enters upon the task of discharging the solemn and imperative duty of disarming the giant which has again and again waged war upon a brave and heroic people whose backs are now against the wall. Before the Congress takes final action upon measures of defense which it must surely set up, I deem it appropriate that those of us who, by reason of residence, have had an opportunity to obtain first-hand information relative to conditions in the Mississippi Valley, should briefly call the attention of the House to the menace which threatens the lives and property of a million loyal Americans. Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and other sovereign States, through their representatives in this body, have told the story of the injuries they have suffered and of their utter helplessness to prevent their repetition. To the panorama which they have spread before you I desire to contribute a few scenes from Kentucky.

I have the honor to stand here to-day as the Representative of the first congressional district of Kentucky. This district has within and on its borders four great rivers. Along the northern boundary of my district flows the Ohio, which enjoys the unique distinction of being the only river on the American continent which carries tonnage from its source to its mouth. Entering from the State of Tennessee, the Cumberland River and the Tennessee River flow across my district and empty into the Ohio River, while the western boundary of my district is formed by the Mississippi River. Having in my district more great navigable rivers than can be found in any other congressional district in the Union, the people of my district are vitally concerned in the question of flood control.

In December, 1926, an unprecedented flood occurred in both the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers. For several weeks the only line of communication between the eastern and western portions of my district was the Illinois Central Railroad bridge. Cities and villages were submerged, and thousands of acres of highly productive farming land were transformed into a mighty inland sea. Strange as it may seem to some of you, during and previous to the floods of these two rivers there was no rainfall in that section of Kentucky. All of these flood waters, which destroyed property amounting in value to a vast sum of money, came from other sections of the country, and sweeping on to the Ohio, and thence to the Mississippi, they became the heralds of a flood in the alluvial valley which later was to shock the Nation with the toll of life and property it claimed. While the bill under discussion offers no immediate relief to the people of the Cumberland and Tennessee River sections, it does provide for surveys and studies of these and other important streams in various sections of the country; and it is to be devoutly hoped that as a result of these surveys and studies future Congresses may be supplied with information upon which to base legislation which will enable the people living in the valleys of all of the great navigable streams throughout the country to successfully curb and combat the menace of floods.

It is my purpose to discuss briefly the effect in Kentucky of the 1927 flood in the Mississippi Valley. If there be any of you who may be relying upon the pending bill or upon the map filed with the report of the Chief of the Army engineers to guide you in determining the needs of Kentucky for relief from Mississippi River floods, I want in the outset to advise you that the bill makes no adequate provision for flood protection for the counties in my district bordering on the Mississippi. The objection to the bill, to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] called your attention on yesterday, is well founded, and I shall be glad to join with him at the proper time in urging this body to so amend the bill as to provide the measure of relief to which his people and mine as well as others are so justly entitled.

I hold in my hand a map which accompanies the report of the Chief of Engineers, dated December 1, 1927. The map purports to show the areas in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River which were subjected to floods before the levees were built and also the areas which were flooded by the Mississippi River in 1927.

The green shading on this map indicates areas subjected to floods prior to levee construction, while the brown shading purports to show sections overflowed in the 1927 flood. From an examination of this map one would conclude that all that portion of Kentucky bordering on the Ohio River from Paducah to Cairo and all of that portion abutting the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Tennessee line had suffered from floods in previous years, but that in the 1927 flood Kentucky was as dry as a powder horn. The utter unreliability and misleading character of this map must be apparent to anyone when he learns that there is no system of levees on the Kentucky side of the Mississippi River north of the city of Hickman, while on the Missouri side of the river levees have been constructed in recent years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. By whom was the map furnished to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. GREGORY. This map was furnished by the Chief of Engineers of the Army. The narrowing of the channel of the natural flood way by the construction of levees on the Missouri side of the Mississippi forced the flood waters of the Mississippi River in 1927 over on the Kentucky side to a depth and extent of area never before approximated by any flood in history. While Kentucky was never menaced by floods from the Mississippi to any appreciable extent prior to the construction of the levees, the extension of the levee system, without a corresponding construction in Kentucky, has caused the floods to encroach more and more upon Kentucky lands.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGORY. I yield.

Mr. QUIN. The building of levees on the opposite side of the Mississippi River causes this damage in the counties in the State of Kentucky to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. GREGORY. It does.

Mr. QUIN. Just the same as in my district?

Mr. GREGORY. It does.

For a period of several days in April, 1927, flood waters passed over and by the little city of Columbus, Ky., at a rate in excess of 2,000,000 cubic feet per second. In order to realize what these figures mean, if water were forced upon the State of Rhode Island at that rate for a period of 24 hours it would cover every inch of that State to a depth of 6 feet; the entire State of Massachusetts would be similarly submerged in 8 days; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who so earnestly contends that the South has not yet contributed enough money for flood control, would find his great State buried beneath a 6-foot blanket of water in 60 days. Yet with this vast volume of water flowing past Kentucky, which was greatly augmented as it flowed toward the Gulf, there are those who seem to think Kentucky experienced nothing more than a spring freshet. As a matter of fact, the four counties in my State which are along the Mississippi River suffered a property loss from the flood of 1927 in excess of $3,000,000. I have here an itemized statement of losses sustained in each of these counties, which I can not take the time to read but which, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my printed remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREGORY. The situation in the counties in western Kentucky bordering on the Mississippi River presents a striking illustration of the injustice and futility of attempting flood control in the Mississippi Valley other than by Government control and at Government expense. The only levee district in Kentucky is the Fulton County levee district. This district maintains about 18 miles of levee in an effort to protect approximately 25,000 acres of land. It extends from the city of Hickman, Ky., to the Tennessee boundary line, where it is joined by the Reelfoot levee. The latter levee is some 4 miles in length and protects approximately 55,000 acres of land. The levees in Kentucky and Tennessee are joint in fact though not in law, and the Tennessee levee would be absolutely worthless if the levee in Kentucky were not maintained. The Fulton County levee board in Kentucky has no funds available for further work, and the taxing power has been exhausted. The assessed value of the land in this levee district is $1,000,000. The mortgage debt against this land amounts to $750,000, while there are outstanding bonds against the land amounting to $104,000. From these figures it must be apparent that no prudent investor would care to buy additional bonds from this district. Since the Reelfoot levee district in Tennessee is wholly dependent for protection upon the maintenance of the levee in Kentucky, no reasonable assurance of safety from floods can be given to the landowners of Tennessee, even though they should be financially able and willing to keep their 4 miles of levee up to the highest standard of efficiency known to engineering skill. However, the financial condition of the Reelfoot levee board is but little, if any, better than that of the Fulton County levee board in Kentucky. On the other hand, it is manifestly unfair to tax landowners in Kentucky to construct and maintain 18 miles of levee for the protection of only 25,000 acres of their own land, while the same levee is absolutely essential for the protection of more than 50,000 acres of land belonging to their neighbors in Tennessee who are required to maintain but 4 miles of levee which offer but little protection to the people in Kentucky, and which would afford no protection whatever to Kentucky land if there were no levee in Kentucky.

The testimony before the Flood Control Committee shows that the people in the Fulton County, Ky., levee district have already expended the princely sum of $300,000 for levee construction and maintenance; yet after being bled white by these contributions the splendid little city of Hickman, their county seat, is left without any protection. Before any levees were built, the city of Hickman was safe and secure and suffered no inconvenience from floods, but the building of levees on the Missouri side of the Mississippi has constantly raised the flood plane in Hickman. This flood plane reached its maximum height in Hickman in 1927, the principal business section of the city being under 6 feet of water. With the Dorena crevasse the flood plane at Hickman was reduced 2 feet in 24 hours. The fact must not be overlooked that when the gauge reading was at a certain point at Cairo in former years before the construction of levees in Missouri, the city of Hickman had no flood problem, but after the construction of the Missouri levees, when the gauge reached the same point at Cairo as in former years, the city of Hickman was submerged. Since no material contribution is made to the flood waters of the Mississippi by local rainfall between Cairo and Hickman, the inevitable conclusion is that the misfortune Hickman has suffered in recent years is directly traceable to levees constructed elsewhere under Government direction and supervision and largely at Government expense.

As I have already shown, Ballard County, Ky., which is just across the river from Cairo suffered greatly, thousands of acres of valuable farming land being overflowed, and a considerable portion of her county seat, Wickliffe, being inundated. The historic town of Columbus, Ky., was swept away, its principal business street now being in the main channel of the river. Facing a recurrence of the terrible disaster of 1927, the people of Columbus have been compelled to remove such of their homes and business houses as were left standing after the flood to the bluffs about one-half mile east of the old town site. Under the direction of the Red Cross and with assistance of that wonderful organization, a new Columbus is arising on the hills where it will be safe from the ravages of the mighty Father of Waters.

What happened at Hickman, Columbus, and Wickliffe happened to the rural section in Kentucky along the Mississippi from Hickman to Cairo, yet the Jadwin plan offers absolutely no protection to these people, save and except the lowering of levees on the river front on the Missouri side, which lowering will be made of questionable value due to the proposed construction of setback levees in Missouri.

I can not understand the attitude of those who insist that the valley States should make further contributions for flood protection.

I can not understand why gentlemen should insist that the people of my district should bear any portion of the expense incident to any protection which may be accorded to them in the future. The suffering they have endured and the great economic loss they have sustained are not the result of their folly in selecting an unsafe place in which to live. Their suffering and their loss did not come from the invasion of a foe marching under an alien flag, nor can this dire calamity be made chargeable to an act of God. It was and is chargeable to the bottling up of the Mississippi River by a series of levees built without their consent, but whose location and construction were determined upon and partially paid for by this great Government. I do not complain, nor do my people complain, because of the building of levees. They have served and will continue to serve a most useful purpose, but no levee should be built to the injury of any people unless just compensation be made therefor. We are not asking the Government to reclaim a foot of land in Kentucky. We want nothing more than simple justice, and justice will not have been done to my people until the injury which has been done to them shall have been remedied. We are not asking for reimbursement for damages sustained in the past. We want and are entitled to security for the future. Anything less than that would, in equity at least, be a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, which is contrary to the spirit of our Constitution and repugnant to the principles upon which this Government was founded.

Although flood control in the Mississippi Valley is absolutely essential for the national defense, for the promotion of commerce, for the transmission of the mails, and for other purposes vitally affecting the welfare of the country at large, it is urged by some that the valley States should not only furnish all right of ways for flood-control works of every character but should also contribute to the cost of construction of these flood-control works. For instance, our neighbors over in Missouri should abandon thousands of acres of valuable farming lands to the mercy of the angry waters that come from Canada and the north and also pay for the privilege of making this sacrifice. If the squeamish and meticulous policy of requiring local contributions to be made for all Federal improvements which may be of incidental benefit to the communities in which they are located is adopted, not a snag could be removed from a river, not a bank could be revetted, not a channel could be dredged, not a lock or dam in aid of river transportation could be constructed without local contributions, because all of these things have a beneficial local influence. Further than that, no public building could be erected in any city without local contributions, because such construction might enhance the value of adjacent property. No harbor on our seaboards could be improved, because harbors are beneficial to the cities where located.

I repeat it: Kentuckians are not here as mendicants; they seek no subsidy; they ask for no reparation. They are a proud and self-reliant people. Since the days when hardy pioneers crossed the Allegheny Mountains and carved from the "Dark and Bloody Ground" a Commonwealth which has given birth to a race of heroes and statesmen the mention of whose names causes a thrill of pride to pulsate in every American heart, Kentuckians have been able to care for themselves and have been glad to extend a helping hand to others. Need I remind you that it was a Kentuckian, George Rogers Clark, who, with his band of faithful followers, stamped the genius of American civilization and American ownership upon the great Northwest Territory? Need I remind you that it was the sons of Kentucky who, looking across the Father of Waters, first caught the vision of a great American empire, rich beyond the dreams of avarice in products of field and forest, mine and stream, and whose western limits, gorgeously arrayed in fruits and flowers, fringe the sunset sea? Need I remind you that in the dark days of the sixties, when the sons of the North and the sons of the South, divided as they were by their lots in life, divided by the hardening peculiarities of temperament, divided by the most sacred convictions of right and wrong, yet one in valor and in devotion to duty as God gave them the wisdom to see it, engaged in the greatest internecine war the world has ever known, it was Kentucky that gave to the South the intrepid, the peerless, the great-hearted leader of the Confederacy, Jefferson Davis, while to the North she gave the patient, the loving, the magnanimous Abraham Lincoln, whose immortal figure is destined to loom larger and larger in the perspective of the ages? Need I remind you that in every great crisis Kentuckians have always heard the clarion call of duty, and, neither counting the cost nor reckoning the peril, like the prophet of old, have said, "Here am I, send me!"

No, Mr. Chairman; we are not asking for alms. We plead for justice and justice only. When justice is granted to us and to our neighbors to the south of us this great Government will have subdued the raging waters of the Mississippi. Then a million loyal Americans who dwell in the alluvial valley will lift their hearts and again thank God that they live beneath the sheltering folds of the Stars and Stripes. Cities now desolate will again hear the music of whirring spindles in busy hives of industry. Farms now devastated will again be rich in the golden glow of their rice fields and opulent in the mimic snow of their broad acres of cotton. The corn tops will ripen once more, while the meadows will be in bloom. And then, oh then, the sun will shine bright in our old Kentucky home. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] in his speech related facts to you touching the district which he represents in Kentucky that are practically identical with four of the counties on the Mississippi River in the district which I have the honor to represent. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] spoke to you yesterday when the rule was under consideration, and his district is likewise affected.

What is embarrassing to us is that this bill fails to provide for the protection of those people. In justice to everybody in the United States the Mississippi River must be controlled through levees and outlets, and it is my judgment that all of the people of the United States should pay for this, and that not one dime should be expected as further contributions from the people who have been suffering this burden during all of these years.

These people in the four counties in the State of Mississippi, these in the State of Tennessee, in five counties, and these in the State of Kentucky, in four counties, are burdened by water being placed on their lands because of the fact that levees have been constructed on the opposite side of the Mississippi River. Therefore when the amendment shall be offered that our friend [Mr. GARRETT] proposes, upon which we have practically agreed, I hope that in fairness to all of the people you gentlemen can see proper to let that amendment be put into this bill.

It occurs to me that with the wise provisions, and in many instances very generous provisions, which have been carried for all others, even tributary streams, the people in the districts I have mentioned should be given consideration. In the State of Mississippi they have taken in the Yazoo River, in the State of Arkansas the Red River, and in the State of Louisiana, and so on, several others. These tributary streams are to be protected, and yet these people, who built their homes and farms in safe places on the east bank of the Mississippi River in my district, have had them destroyed because of the fact that levees built on the west side of the river have been raised higher. That naturally makes this land on the east side of the river a reservoir or flood way in time of high water. That is to be continued under this flood control bill, yet there is not one line in this bill, according to my conception, which will compensate those people or pay them for their lands, although all of the new flood ways that are taken are to be paid for. They are to be compensated for under the terms of this bill. They go so far as to pay for the removal of tracks and the raising of railroads which happen to be in the territory of which the flood commission will take charge.

Yet the bill which the committee has brought out fails to provide a dime for these properties on the east bank of the river in four counties in my district, some in Tennessee and some in Kentucky, while it lends its generosity to the great corporations. The bill provides for payments to railroads, yet under its terms the property of these poor people will be taken and destroyed and not a dime will be paid to them.

I presume that all of my colleagues in the House want to be fair and just in dealing with all the people; and, as I have said, I hope they can see their way clear to support the amendment which will be proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP].

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, it is quite certain that no bill that might be passed on flood control would be entirely satisfactory to many Members of this House. It is a difficult subject upon which to reach an agreement, no matter how anxious or sincere Members may be in their desire to come to an agreement. This bill is not entirely satisfactory to me. As I view it, there are some serious defects in it. As it stands I can not vote for it; but I am hopeful that this bill will be perfected by proper amendments that will make it possible for all of us to vote for this important legislation.

We are now in the latter part of the session; not many weeks remain. If it is at all possible, we should now reach a conclusion. The time has come to pass a proper flood control bill.

In the very beginning I want to say that there has been no difference of opinion as to the necessity for flood control; neither has there been any difference in the generous and sympathetic impulses that have pervaded the people in the different sections of the country. That was well demonstrated when the American Red Cross sent out its call for relief. In every State there was immediate response. In every State the amount asked for was oversubscribed. When the second call for aid came the result was the same. There was no East, no West, no North, no South. We were all Americans—were all anxious to relieve the suffering and distress of our fellow citizens. Better still, to the glory and honor of the American people it can be truly said that their benevolences and charities extend even beyond their own land and their own people. Their love for humanity is world-wide. Their sympathy embraces all mankind. No matter where disaster may occur, no matter where misfortune may overwhelm any part of the human family, there you will find the helping and outstretched hands of the American people.

Not only were the American people agreed that the inhabitants of the lower Mississippi Valley should have prompt and effective relief when the flood came, but they were also agreed that a recurrence of such a catastrophe should be made impossible. You will recall that when President Harding met the last shipload of our returning dead from Europe he exclaimed, "This must not happen again!" So to-day the universal sentiment of the American people in reference to the great flood of 1927 is expressed in those same words, "This must not happen again!"

It is not my purpose to dwell at length upon the great flood itself. The details are fully known to all of you. Fortunately, the loss of life was not so great as in some other disasters. No definite figures perhaps are obtainable. By some authorities it has been stated that 246 people perished. If this be correct, the loss of life was approximately one-half as much as in the recent disaster in California. We hardly realize it, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that more than twice as many people as perished in the floods in the Mississippi Valley in 1927 are killed every week in this country by automobiles. These casualties are not so dramatic and therefore do not so completely arrest our attention.

The damage to property was over $200,000,000, and between 600,000 and 700,000 people, it is estimated, had to leave their homes and seek shelter and food in the refugee camps.

With other members of the Committee on Flood Control I spent a week last spring going through the flooded districts from the break in the levee above New Madrid on the north to the break in the levee below New Orleans on the south. It was an interesting and informing trip. We saw much, but one of the things that impressed me most was the wonderful manner in which the Red Cross took care of the situation. If ever a difficult task was well done, such was the case there. I do not know and can not single out the persons to whom particular credit is due. Suffice it to say that there is glory enough for all. The Red Cross has become our great national beacon light and shines for all the world. Another thing that greatly impressed me was the advance that had been made in preventive medicine. In other days a great epidemic would have broken out and terrific loss of life would have occurred, but so well did preventive medicine do its work in the great flood of 1927 that even in the refugee camps the death rate was little more than normal. What a wonderful work has been done for mankind by members of the medical profession. Oftimes the men who by their researches and experiments make discoveries that save innumerable lives are wholly unknown to fame. In a larger sense, however, they have their reward.

What is known as the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River extends from the Gulf of Mexico to Cape Girardeau. Geologists tell us that this valley was formerly a part of the Gulf but that the silt coming down from the upper reaches of the Mississippi and its tributaries filled this alluvial valley until only the present narrow channel for the river remains.

This alluvial valley contains 29,790 square miles. It comprises a part of seven States, as indicated by the following table expressed in square miles:

	Square miles
Illinois	65
Missouri	2,874
Kentucky	125
Tennessee	453
Arkansas	4,652
Mississippi	6,926
Louisiana	14,695

In fertility and richness the land in this valley is equal to that in the famed valley of the Nile. In this respect no other land in the United States surpasses it. The soil in the alluvial valley can never be exhausted.

The Mississippi River is, of course, the most important stream in the United States. It stands in a class entirely by itself. It is 2,475 miles in length and has about 250 tributaries, of which 50 or more are navigable. The Mississippi Basin contains 1,240,000 square miles, or about 41 per cent of the continental United States, and includes—in whole or part—31 of our States.

Instinctively we recognize that the Mississippi River has been a most important factor in our national development and history. In the very center of this Capitol—commonly known as the rotunda—hang eight large paintings. These paintings have this place of honor not because they are great masterpieces of art, because they represent great historical events. Among these paintings is the Discovery of the Mississippi River. You are all familiar with it. You have seen it again and again. Of all the great throngs that have passed through this Capitol and have looked upon this familiar painting, no one has ever questioned its right to this place of honor.

The hearings on flood control by the Committee on Flood Control were long and extensive. They began November 7, 1927, and continued almost daily, morning, afternoon, and night, for nearly three months. About 300 witnesses appeared before us. Some of these imparted much information and some had little wisdom to offer. The hearings made six printed volumes, with a total of nearly 5,000 pages. In view of the subject under consideration these volumes should not be considered "dry" reading, yet I doubt whether many of the Members will wade through them. Some may think that a flood of words is quite as bad as a flood of water. [Laughter.] The first witness was William Hale Thompson, the well-known mayor of Chicago. There may possibly be some difference of opinion as to the great war he has been waging against King George, but all will agree that he is a picturesque character. He is picturesque not only in manner, but also in speech. Some time ago he announced to the world that King George would have to keep his snoot out of Chicago. That was not saying it with flowers. Our hearings started, so to speak, with a bang. When Mayor Thompson left Chicago to appear before the committee he did not simply pack his grip, sit down in an ordinary Pullman, and read an ordinary book. No; he came in state, with 12 special trains and 2,000 followers and retainers. When the Queen of Sheba visited Solomon she no doubt did her best to impress that able and clever ruler, but her caravan, I dare say, had nothing on William Hale Thompson's trip to Washington. It will always be easy to remember our first witness.

Our hearings had not proceeded far when we were told that flood control on the lower Mississippi should be only a part of our task and that a new and revolutionary policy should be adopted by which the National Government, at national expense, without local contribution, should control the floods on every stream in the country that might cause loss of life or damage to property, no matter how small or insignificant such a stream might be. This was a surprising development; but, like vaccination for smallpox, it "took." We began to hear of rivers from every direction. I never knew before we had so many rivers in this country. Some of these rivers evidently had been concealing themselves, and now, for the first time, came out of hiding. More than that, all of these rivers were represented by the patriots that came before our committee as being desperately wicked and terribly dangerous. According to their story, even rivulets and creeks had become monsters of iniquity and were threatening to engulf the people and their property. As represented to us, the situation was a most distressing one and but one hope of salvation was held out, namely, national flood control at national expense, without local contribution.

The prospect of easy Government money had a very natural effect. Demands for it came from every direction. One witness, more frank that others, when asked to state definitely and specifically just what his people wanted, replied, "Why, we want our share of the money." He thought we were dividing up the money in the United States Treasury and he wanted his people to be in on it. As a matter of fact, he was not far wrong, from his viewpoint. If we adopt the policy to which I have just called attention, the national flood control of all the streams in the country at national expense and without local contributions, the money in the United States Treasury will be quickly divided up.

If that policy is adopted, new geographies will be needed in our public schools. In the geographies which we now use many of the streams for which flood control is asked are not even shown. Necessarily, therefore, the new geographies showing these streams will be much larger than the old ones and, of course, it will cost more to publish them. That should not deter us. We can have them printed "at national expense, without local contribution." In the meantime we can adopt this great, inspiring slogan, "When bigger geographies are made, 'flood control at national expense, without local contribution,' will make them." While thinking on these things let us not forget the noble words which I quoted a moment ago, "We want our share of the money."

If the Government ever takes charge of all the rivers of the country for flood control at national expense and without local contribution, the cost to the Government will be staggering, more, no doubt, than the cost of anything else ever undertaken by the Government except, perhaps, the World War. One of those advocating such a policy and with a keen appreciation of what would result if that policy were adopted, recently remarked somewhat facetiously, "Heretofore we have been drawing money out of the National Treasury through the bunghole, but if we put this policy across it will knock in the head of the barrel." He was undoubtedly right. If this policy is ever adopted, the head of the barrel will certainly be knocked in.

Many things could be said about the hearings, but I shall content myself with but a few observations. Nearly all of the witnesses were interested parties—interested directly in a financial way. The unanimous desire and insistence of these witnesses that the Government should pay the entire bill has been emphasized. To me such unanimity does not seem at all remarkable. I know of nothing that people are more anxious and willing to do than to place their burdens on the shoulders of the Federal Government. I know of nothing that the people acquiesce in more readily than the payment of their bills by the Federal Treasury. These interested witnesses were all asked if they thought that they should pay any part of the expense, and it is true that they all promptly replied "No." Do you think that is strange? Then they were asked if they did not think that the Government should pay it all, and it is true that they just as promptly answered "Yes." Such testimony by interested parties is not very impressive. To me it proves nothing except that human nature is still the same. If litigants in court were permitted to give this kind of testimony, I assure you not much would ever be recovered.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPP. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOCH. I quite agree with what the gentleman is saying, but I hope the gentleman will not make it unanimous, because the gentleman will recall that the witnesses from my own State vigorously opposed the proposition of the Federal Government meeting the entire expense and said they expected in any flood-control proposition to bear a considerable part of the expense.

Mr. KOPP. That was partly true of the representatives that appeared from the gentleman's State.

Mr. HOCH. It was true of the governor of our State and his associates who appeared before the committee.

Mr. KOPP. One of your very distinguished gentlemen said the Government should pay it all. The delegation from the gentleman's State that agreed with my position were the exception, and you know the exception proves the rule.

It was suggested during the hearings at different times and in different ways that the upper States had done a great wrong to the lower States in the Mississippi Valley by throwing water down upon them, and it was stressed repeatedly that the upper States should be compelled to take care of this water. This, as I look at it, is a self-evident fallacy. The upper States have not thrown their water down on the lower States. As I understand it, God made the earth, including the Mississippi River and the law of gravity. As I understand it, neither legal nor moral responsibility is imposed upon anyone because water still continues to run downhill.

When the people settled in the alluvial valley, they did so with their eyes open. They knew the Mississippi River was there. They knew that floods had come in the past and that floods would come again in the future. Nobody forced them to settle there. Nobody wronged them. Nobody imposed upon them. They had a good and sufficient reason for locating in that valley. On account of the richness of its soil they preferred to settle there and take their chances with the floods. Others took their chances with the drought in the semiarid regions, and they also had great losses, but in neither instance has the Government been in any way to blame.

The Government was also criticized during the hearings, in various ways, because the levee system had not been made an unqualified success. It is true, for instance, that the levee system, by restricting the flow to the channel between the levees had caused increased flood heights in the lower valley, but why blame the Government for this or anything else connected therewith? The Government did not impose the levee system upon the people of that section. Far from it. The levee system was initiated by the local people themselves. They promoted the system. They came to Washington for years and persistently asked for it. All that the Government did was to yield to their entreaties. The Government never required the building of levees. It only aided the people when they decided to build levees, and this at their urgent solicitation and request. Furthermore, the various levee districts had their own engineers and these engineers approved all the projects.

Let it be clearly and definitely understood by all that the record of the Government in the alluvial valley has been a generous one—a record that deserves praise and not blame from the beneficiaries.

Much criticism during the hearings and at other times has been directed at the Army engineers. Some of these criticisms have been made by other engineers who would like to get in on this project. Applicants for executive positions in the execution of this project are quite numerous throughout the country. The applicants seem to be fully convinced that they are much better fitted for this task than the Army engineers. They frankly admit their superior qualifications.

It has been asserted, over and over, that the Army engineers demonstrated their incapacity and unfitness for taking charge of this project by failing to provide for the superflood of 1927. This argument when first heard sounds like a clincher, but upon second thought loses its entire force and effect. It is true that the Army engineers did not prepare for the superflood of 1927. They did not know it was coming and neither did anybody else. The Army engineers judged the future by the past; that was the best they could do. Patrick Henry's eloquent statement that there was no way to judge the future except by the past has been approved and applauded for more than a century and a half. The Army engineers did what any sensible and prudent man would and should have done under the circumstances. If the critics of the Army engineers knew that we were to have a superflood in 1927, or any other time, why did they not tell us about it? Why did they not announce to the world what was in store for us? Why did they not warn us before the catastrophe occurred? We do not give any great or outstanding importance to the man who says, "I told you so." But these critics are not even in that class, for not one of them ever told us so. If any Member of this House thinks that he knew that the superflood was coming, why did he not communicate his wisdom to the rest of us before the thing happened? Every one of us knows that if any Member had introduced a bill during the last session of Congress authorizing the appropriation of three or four hundred million dollars for the control of such a flood, his bill would not have received the slightest consideration in this House. Why? Simply because the Members of Congress, like the Army engineers, judged the future by the past. And if during the last session the Congress had passed such a bill authorizing the appropriation of three or four hundred million dollars for flood control, the country would have looked upon it as a frightful outrage. Why? Simply because the country, like Congress and the Army engineers, judged the future by the past.

While much was said in the hearings against local contributions, the situation in the valley was never made clear to the people generally. The emotions were, of course, deeply aroused by the flood of 1927. The people became very sympathetic for the refugees who were driven from their homes and had to spend weeks and even months in the refugee camps, where they were fed and clothed by the Red Cross. It must be borne in mind, however, that the people whom the Red Cross succored are an entirely different class from the people who will receive special benefits from the levees and other flood-control works.

Generally speaking, that is not clearly understood, but this will be made plain to the country. Most people still think that the local contributions, if insisted upon, will come from the poor refugees, but that is not the fact. The 600,000 or 700,000 refugees will not receive any special benefits from flood control and will not be required to pay local contributions if that policy is adopted. These refugees are poor laboring men or poor tenants who own no land. Of these refugees about 500,000 are poor colored people. The money that was raised for them was a charitable and benevolent fund out of which they were supported and clothed until they could readjust themselves. The owners of the land are an entirely different class. They include the corporations, the bankers, the capitalists, and other large property owners.

No special benefits under this bill will go to the survivors of the poor people that were drowned. No special benefits will go to the refugees who are now trying to make a new start in life. All the special benefits from flood-control works will go to landowners. A large proportion of these live in the cities and towns and live as well to-day as they did before the great flood came. The records show that large corporations hold a big part of the land. Some of these corporations own upward of 50,000 acres. More of them own upward of 25,000 acres, and many own upward of 5,000 acres. The individual owners also in large numbers own great tracts of land. These landowners are not entitled to charity. They have no claim upon us from that standpoint. If we are to give something to the poor people in the lower valley we must give it to an entirely different class from the landowners. We should not permit our tender sympathies for the poor refugees to be coined into dollars for the landowners.

The landowners have put up a great campaign. Many lobbyists have been here for months during the winter. These people, of course, have a right to be represented here by as many lobbyists as they want. Many expensive advertisements have been published from one end of the country to the other. I need not tell you that the refugees have not been paying for these lobbyists and advertisements. That is done by the men who own the land back of the levees and who expect to be, and who will be, tremendously benefited by flood-control works.

I repeat, and I want you to remember, that the poor refugees will receive no special benefits. Not even the families of those who perished will get any special benefits. Here and there may be found an exception, but generally this is true. If these poor refugees and the poor families of the people who lost their lives were to receive the special benefits, we could more readily reconcile ourselves to the doctrine that there should be no local contributions. But it does seem that when special benefits go to the owners of large estates there should be local contributions. Any other rule is unfair and unjust. Nobody has insisted that any arbitrary rule should be made as to local contributions. All we asked was that an economic survey should be made and that if these landowners were able to pay for the special benefits they received, a contribution should be required, and that if they could not pay for special benefits, they should be relieved. I insist that this is fair. I insist that this is just.

It is a far cry from the poor refugees to the corporations, capitalists, and bankers who own the lands. The latter are not objects of charity and are not entitled to charity. It behooves us to exercise due caution that these men shall not convert our tender sympathies for the refugees into large donations for themselves.

The flood had scarcely started last spring until a great cry went up for a special session of Congress. Frantic appeals were made to President Coolidge to call such a session. It was fortunate, indeed, that we had a President not only of good judgment but also of high courage. [Applause.] What could a special session of Congress have done last spring? There was then no evidence on which Congress could act. It was impossible to procure that evidence until about the time the regular session convened; and even after we procured it, it took us nearly five months to get a bill ready for consideration by the House. Any legislation during a special session would have been the result of strong emotions and would not have been based on sound judgment.

It is a great thing for a country to have a President who is not only right upon the issues before the country at the time of his election but who is also equal to the emergencies that arise from time to time during his administration. No wonder that the country has such remarkable confidence in President Coolidge.

Many bills have been introduced during this session on flood control, but the only bills considered have been those introduced by Chairman REID, of the House committee, and by Chairman JONES, of the Senate committee.

The Reid bill was introduced December 21, 1927. It was amended and ordered favorably reported to the House on February 16, 1928. To this bill six of us felt compelled to file a minority report. The reasons given for our minority report were, briefly, as follows:

That it offered no basis even for an outline of a flood-control plan for the lower Mississippi River.

That it delayed the adoption of any definite flood-control plan until complete study of the Mississippi watershed could be made by a newly created commission of seven members, a majority of whom would probably be wholly unfamiliar with the Mississippi problem.

That it provided maximum flood crest heights at Cairo, Arkansas City, and New Orleans, which heights had been arbitrarily and unwisely fixed without any supporting evidence.

That it exempted from local contribution all costs of construction and maintenance of such control works without reference to local benefits or ability to pay, and in effect reversed the well-settled policy of the Government that there should be local contributions for special benefits.

The Reid bill as reported required gauge heights to be kept down to 54 feet at Cairo, 58 feet at Arkansas City, and 19 feet at New Orleans. These gauge heights in our judgment were entirely impracticable. We found that it would cost $1,400,000,000 to keep the river down to these gauge heights, and there was doubt even if that sum would be sufficient. The bill did not even provide for the local communities to furnish rights of way for the levees, and also placed the entire burden of the maintenance upon the Government.

The other Members joining with me in this minority report were Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin; Mr. STALKER, of New York; Mr. DAVENPORT, of New York; Mr. SELVIG, of Minnesota; and Mr. COCHRAN, of Pennsylvania. We would have been glad if we could have joined with our colleagues in reporting a bill, but from our standpoint the Reid bill had so many objectionable features and was so revolutionary in character that we could not do otherwise than file our dissent.

Subsequently the Senate passed the Jones bill, known as S. 3740. When that bill reached the House it was, of course, referred to our committee. When that bill was submitted to us we found that in some important respects it was an improvement over the Reid bill. It waived local contributions in this particular project, but it did recognize and declare that local contributions for special benefits were fundamental. It also recognized contributions further by requiring maintenance of the levees on the Mississippi. In addition, it did not contain the objectionable gauge heights. It also provided a commission that was more practicable than the commission in the Reid bill, and in a general way at least adopted a plan for the project.

With us it was a choice between two evils, and we decided to take the lesser and voted to report out the Jones bill as it came to us from the Senate. By this we did not commit ourselves to the Jones bill on the floor. That was made plain and was clearly understood at the time. We hope that the Jones bill, which is before us now, will be so amended and so perfected that all the Members of this House may feel free to vote for it.

Briefly let me now note some objectionable features in the bill before us. In the first place, all of section 1 after the words "chief of engineers," on line 2, page 2, should be stricken out. The whole project should be put under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. The commission in this bill, while better than the commission in the Reid bill, will inevitably mean increased expenditures. No one can tell what such a commission will do. The way to build these flood-control works is to put all the responsibility upon the administration, which is responsible to the people and can be held accountable by them.

Section 4 contains vicious provisions. Who the author was of said section 4 I do not know, but I feel very certain that it originated in some railroad office. The purpose of that section is to give the railroads in the Mississippi Valley an unfair and unjust advantage. If left in the bill it will make the railroads a present of many millions of dollars over and above just compensation. Under the Constitution, as provided in the fifth amendment thereto, private property can not be taken for public use without just compensation. That phrase fixes the damages to which everybody is entitled in condemnation proceedings when property is taken for public use by the United States Government.

The railroads, however, in the lower valley are not satisfied with the Constitution of the United States. They have inserted cunning language in section 4.

You will note the first part of the section lays down a very broad rule of damages. It seems to include remote and indirect damages, and if section 4 contained only the last three lines at the bottom of page 4 and the first three lines at the top of page 5 it would lay down a broader rule of damages than the courts have heretofore fixed.

But note the first two words in line 4 on page 5. These words are "and also." Therefore, in addition to the rule of damages laid down in the preceding lines, further damages are to be awarded to the railroads. These railroads are preparing to file enormous claims. They came before our committee and asked for over $70,000,000.

The retention of section 4 as it now reads will mean a vast amount of litigation and ultimately great loss to the Government. In any event, why should anybody be given more than the Constitution of the United States plainly directs? Everybody is entitled to just damages, and the courts of the country have interpreted that phrase many times and have laid down rules for ascertaining just damages.

All of the language in section 4 of the bill enlarging the rule of damages fixed by the Constitution of the United States should be stricken out.

The railroads are entitled to their rights. Nobody would take any away—nobody could take them away. They are fixed by the Constitution of the United States.

This bill must be kept free from all graft of every nature and kind. The people of the country have felt sympathetic toward the South, but if they find that this bill is loaded down with graft there will be such a revulsion of feeling as was never witnessed before in the entire history of this Nation. This bill must be clean in its terms, and the flood-control project must be executed by clean hands.

This bill, while it recognizes the fundamental principle of local contribution, does not require any contribution except certain maintenance along the main channel. It does not even require the landowners to furnish the right of way along the Mississippi. This would not be much, for in extent the levees are completed most of the way from Cape Girardeau to the Head of Passes on both sides of the river, where levees are practical. In other words, the United States Government is to make the landowners of the alluvial valley a big present, and then, in addition, is to pay for a place to put it. Without further at length arguing this matter, permit me simply to say that this situation reminds me of an incident that took place in my State many years ago. An old gentleman, who had acquired some means, decided to make a donation of a new church to the congregation to which he belonged. He offered to erect a new building if the congregation would provide the furnishings. A meeting of the congregation was called to consider this proposition, and after a long and heated discussion the following resolutions were adopted:

First. That it is the duty of Brother Johnson to provide the furnishings as well as to erect the church.

Second. That some of the members are too poor to contribute to the purchase of the furnishings and that therefore, it would be economically unsound for the rest of the members to contribute.

Third. That we are opposed to local contributions.

After considering these resolutions with some degree of patience, Brother Johnson replied as follows:

> My dear brethren, your very interesting resolutions have been received. When I offered to erect a new church building if the congregation would provide the furnishings I thought I was serving the Lord. I now find I was mistaken and will await His further orders.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the single purpose of making a correction with reference to some matters of fact.

In an extension of remarks on April 4 last, on page 6150 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], speaking of the benefits that would accrue to some of the large owners of properties in the flood ways, used this language:

It has been alleged that the Hines Lumber Co. of Chicago has large interests in the flood area and that it has been actively interested in the no-contribution campaign. A casual examination of the record fails to disclose any large holdings of the company under that name in the flood ways, although other lands among 15,000,000 acres to be protected may be involved.

[Omitted from the PERMANENT RECORD.]

While that language is very carefully used and probably can be said not to make the direct charge that the Hines Lumber Co. owns property that may be benefited by the pending bill, still, representatives of this company, many of whom are residents of my district, and particularly their vice president, Hon. William S. Bennet, formerly a Member of this House and now vice president of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., have asked me to place in the RECORD a statement by Mr. Bennet himself to the effect that neither the Hines Lumber Co. nor any of its subsidiaries or stockholders have any interest whatever in the land that may be affected by this legislation and own no property that may be acquired for the purpose of flood ways.

There is another company by the name of Hines listed somewhere as owning property in this area, but that has no connection or association with the Edward Hines Lumber Co. of Chicago.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the brief statement by Mr. Bennet.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

Neither the Hines Lumber Co., of Chicago, nor any company under any name in which the stockholders of that company are interested owns any land within a hundred miles of the flood ways. We do not own any land at all in either Arkansas or Louisiana. We own land on the Gulf coast of Mississippi in Harrison and Hancock Counties and in Stone, Pearl River, and Lamar Counties, immediately adjoining those counties to the north, but these lands are nowhere near any flooded region and not even in the watershed of the Mississippi River. They are the only lands that we own in the State of Mississippi. Congressman FREAR has shown me that he based his statement upon the name of J. H. Hines Co., who, according to the list in the second column on page 5874 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, owns 10,202 acres in Avoyelles Parish. I have never before heard of this company. It is in no way connected with the Edward Hines Lumber Co. * * * It is my intention by the foregoing to make clear the fact that neither the Edward Hines Lumber Co. nor any stockholder in that company owns land in the flooded district at any place.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one minute in order to say that the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois is accurate. I made no charge whatsoever; I was informed that the Chicago lumber company owned property there, but I was careful, without any direct information, to state that the Hines Co. was the same. I did so to protect myself from injustice to the company, although there was no improper charge made, for they had a right to own property there if they chose to do so.

I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not anticipate that I can add much of new information on this great subject that we are discussing, but I want to state briefly and definitely my position upon the question, and I think it is that of the people of the State of Nebraska, which I in part represent.

I will vote for a bill that authorizes a plan which will be effective in the regulation and control of the flood waters of the Mississippi and which will promote in the greatest degree the interests of the whole valley and does not unduly burden the National Government.

The bill under consideration sets up a policy and authorizes national expenditures that, if carried to their probable conclusion, can bankrupt the Federal Treasury. I can not support the bill in its present form. The committee that reports it admits that it is not the best nor most efficient plan. Its final cost is beyond the ability of the human mind to conceive or determine.

It is proposed to expend untold millions, raised by general taxation, for the benefit of a limited territory, without any contribution or payment by those directly benefited.

The Congress has in the past authorized great policies and plans for national development—the reclamation act and the national highways are examples. One hundred and fifty millions of Federal funds have been expended by the Government to develop irrigation projects operating in 11 States. But the farmers who have benefited by the expenditure of that great sum of money are bound and their lands and property are pledged to pay back into the National Treasury the money advanced.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been taken from the National Treasury for the construction of highways, but because the States where they are built are greatly benefited by them the law rightly requires that the States shall pay one-half the cost of their construction. Either the States that benefit from flood control should bear a fair share of the expense or we should provide a plan that will amortize at least a part of the cost to the Federal Treasury.

The committee report states in large type, page 14, "Reservoirs regarded ideal method of control." This truth is fundamental. It is a Scotch saying that the wealth of the farmer is wrapped up in the weather. The wealth and also the troubles of the Mississippi Valley are wrapped up in the weather and the water it brings. Man can not control the weather, but, regulated and restrained, the water in the river will become the greatest blessing bestowed upon this Nation. We all remember the story of the bundle of sticks that could not be broken, but taken one by one they were easily snapped asunder.

And so with the river. United, the floods of the Father of Waters defy man's attempt to confine them. Divided and regulated by reservoirs and storage dams the river will become the servant of man, not his master.

Attempts in the past to confine the combined flood waters to a certain channel have always failed. Either the waters themselves break through the walls built to hold them in, or men destroy their own works to lessen flood destruction. Spillways and "fuse" levees are admissions of this truth.

Nature gives to the Mississippi Valley enough rainfall in every year to make it the most productive agricultural region in the world. When too much of the annual precipitation is concentrated into certain months and the excess waters are permitted to flow unchecked into the lower valley flood losses occur.

If the excess rainfall for the spring months can be held back for a time, floods will be avoided and great benefits in many States will follow. If the spring floods are not stored and used upon the tributary watersheds, the waters are wasted and the lands they destroy are washed into the sea. Losses from drouth on the valley watershed are greater than the damage from too much water. The waste of national wealth by soil erosion is worse than the destruction by floods on the lower river.

Control of flood by protective walls and spillways alone is a policy of great initial and continuous expense with no possibility of returns to the National Treasury. The experts whom President Coolidge has consulted have estimated that the cost of flood control by levees and spillways on the lower Mississippi will amount to more than fifteen hundred millions of dollars. If original estimates are so huge a sum, no one can tell whether the final cost will be one thousand five hundred millions or three thousand millions. In addition there will be continuing maintenance expense.

I was a Member of the House when we voted to build the Panama Canal. Mr. Cannon was then chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I remember that he stated, the engineers say, that the cost of the canal will be $150,000,000, but no man—no engineer—can tell me whether the cost will be $150,000,000 or $300,000,000, because when man sets himself in contest with the greatest powers of nature no set of engineers can tell where the expenditure will cease. He was vindicated, because the cost of the canal was over $300,000,000 instead of $150,000,000 as originally estimated by its advocates.

Expert engineers vary as to probable cost of reservoir storage, but the consensus of opinion is that it will not reach one-half the amount given by the President's advisers as the cost of controlling the floods by walls and spillways in the lower valley.

Regulation by storage and diversion on the tributary streams that cause the flood will be a source of continual benefit to the States and constant returns to the Federal Treasury. Attempted control by levees and spillways will constitute a system of never-ending expense and constant danger.

The committee which reports the bill admits that reservoir control is the scientific and permanent plan for prevention of floods in the Mississippi Valley. Their report states:

The engineering profession, civil and Army, are in accord on the theory that the ideal method of controlling floods is through the use of reservoirs by means of which waters are impounded and controlled in the source of streams.

But they only preach reservoir control. They do not authorize it. What excuse, then, is offered for failure to adopt the only plan that will really work a scientific and economical solution of the flood problem? Reservoir control is rejected, I am told, because a board, the chairman of which, Col. William Kelly, late of the Army engineers, but now in the open employ of an electrical power corporation of New York, decided it too expensive. The electric-power monopoly, of course, is fighting reservoir control, and the employment of Colonel Kelly by the Power Trust followed fast upon his report against the storage plan.

The amortization of the cost of control by the sale of hydro-electric power is an integral part of the economy of the reservoir plan. After an exhaustive study of the whole question, the committee report on page 22 declares as follows:

The total estimated cost of a comprehensive reservoir control is placed at $445,000,000.

This is about one-third as great as the President's advisers have estimated the price of control under the plan proposed in the present bill.

This bill makes all costs of control a charge upon the National Treasury. No payment is required from any source because of benefits derived. No hope is held out anywhere that money once paid out will ever be returned.

Opponents of storage control contend that reservoirs would be full when floods come. Not if the waters are utilized as they should be for salvage and to amortize the cost of flood control. Water can not be held in reservoirs and used at the same time. For power purposes it must run over the dam. For irrigation it must be spread upon the land. For navigation use it must flow down the river.

Engineers have estimated that the surplus waters that flow into the Mississippi in a flood year like 1927 would fill a lake of the area of the State of New Jersey to a depth of 10 feet.

Agricultural engineers and soil experts agree that an equal amount of water can be stored in the soil of the States of South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma every year to the everlasting benefit of those States and to the salvation of the Mississippi Valley.

Navigation, power, and irrigation are the highest beneficial uses for water in rivers. Storage in reservoirs on tributary streams will utilize the flood waters for these purposes. No other plan will.

Permitting floods to run to destruction on the lower valley wastes and neglects our greatest national resource. If we build storage reservoirs on the watersheds of the upper valley the sale of water and power will, in the course of years, largely repay the cost of construction to the National Treasury.

No one has been bold enough to claim that dirt walls on the lower river will insure the valley from damage by floods in the future, or that any portion of the cost will be paid back into the Federal Treasury. All the States will be taxed to pay the cost of construction and damages resulting from any unsuccessful, unscientific, and uneconomical plan of flood control.

Because we have been blind enough to practice nothing but primitive plans and principles in the past should not prevent us now from spending the Nation's money wisely and for lasting benefits to the entire valley.

We must not blame those who have felt the full force of the concentrated floods in the past that they now ask protection, no matter at what cost to the Federal Treasury. They rightly demand safety from the devastating wall of waters that flows down the river in flood time. But it is also the duty of Congress to select the best plan of control and to protect the National Treasury. Storing the flood waters on the watersheds where they fall will protect the people in the lower valley from floods, and at the same time start a stream of money into the National Treasury paid for the use of the waters where they are impounded. Let us develop our national resources by making these flood waters a power for production and national prosperity. Let us store the waters and save the land, not use them as a lever to open the floodgates of the National Treasury. [Applause.]

I have here a chart which I want to comment upon briefly. This section shows the entire flood in second-feet in the Mississippi Valley at the crest, practically 3,500,000 cubic feet of water per second. This next diagram shows you where the flood came from. The Arkansas and the White added more water to the flood than any other streams. The next greatest contributor was the Ohio, then the Missouri, and here comes the upper Mississippi, and here is the Red River. This picture shows all that the lower Mississippi contributed to the waters of the flood. This chart shows where the silt in the Mississippi comes from. The floods and the silt are the two things that do the damage. The silt coming down the Missouri River is vastly more than that from all other rivers combined—the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Arkansas, and the Red Rivers. That is the reason the Missouri is called the Big Muddy. It brings down ten times as much land and silt as any other single stream. That is the reason we ask consideration of it. This section shows the annual rainfall. This chart was prepared by the engineering department of Nebraska, under Professor Mickey, a witness who appeared before the Flood Control Committee. This shows the water that falls in the entire valley in an average year. So you can see that after all the people who are far from the mouth of the river have much to do with determining the solution of the problem you are fighting against.

As to the possibility of amortization of cost of flood control by reservoirs, in the State of Nebraska we have the Platte River and down through Kansas there runs the Kansas or Kaw. They are the two great tributaries of the Missouri, which we know is really the Mississippi River itself. In the valley of the Platte there are great reservoir sites that will store the flood waters in that stream. Nebraska business men engaged reclamation engineers under authority of an act passed by Congress and have expended $30,000,000 or more of money raised by themselves. They had that project surveyed and estimated and determined by the Government engineers and the cost of moving every foot of the dirt and building the power plant. I took that project down to the Federal Power Commission, authorized to go into such matters, and, based upon the exhaustive report of the Government engineers, which took a year or more to prepare, I was told that 80 per cent of the cost of that project can be amortized to the Government in 40 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the gentleman might state that up the river we have demonstrated the truth of this theory in the Platte project.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. At the Pathfinder Dam the Government has already built a dam that has reduced the floods by 40 per cent in the Platte River and equalized it during the dry season to the extent of 45 per cent. What can be done in Nebraska can be done at the sources of all the streams that flow into the Mississippi, and such a system will work an absolute solution of the question. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I would not expect this bill which we are considering to meet the plans and specifications which are in the minds of many different Members; but all great pieces of legislation are brought about usually in the way of compromise. Generally speaking, I can not conceive of how we can get a much better bill than the one that we have here. I am going to forego discussion of any part of the bill save and except that in which I am particularly interested, relating to tributaries. I crave the indulgence of this House until I can give you a picture of what happened in my district as an illustration of the importance of tributaries in the consideration of this Congress in arriving at the proper flood control bill.

I say it without any expectation of contradiction that my district suffered more permanent irreparable injury in the floods of 1927 than any other like area in the United States. There was not a drop of water in my district from the Mississippi River. I say without fear of contradiction that Arkansas suffered more loss in dollars than any State in the Union as a result of that flood, and that only 12 per cent of that loss was caused by the waters from the Mississippi River. There is confronting you now the biggest peace-time question that will come before Congress in this generation. If we had only the floods south of Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf of Mexico to consider, our flood problem could, in a way, be solved. Whenever you submit a flood project for Arkansas, which benefits only 20 per cent of the people and neglects 80 per cent of the people, you are doing something that the people of the United States do not want you to do. Whenever you pass flood-control legislation here that does not take care of tributaries, you are doing something that the American people do not want done. If this Congress is to embark upon a scheme of flood control in this country, they must sink their efforts in some constitutional warrant, and I think this bill has found those provisions.

Then, gentlemen, if you are going to base your efforts upon the constitutional provisions as to commerce and the general welfare and the proper dispatch of our mails; if you are going to do it on the constitutional provisions of national defense, then I say to you that wherever you find these constitutional provisions imperiled, the United States Government must go; that is, at least imperiled to the extent of practically paralyzing these enterprises and involving great loss of life.

To give you an illustration of what the State of Arkansas suffered in the 1927 flood, in order to emphasize the importance of this tributary control, gentlemen, I quote now from the most authoritative source that I can get, the Bureau of Economics in the Department of Agriculture.

Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas suffered more than any other States. The number of horses and mules lost in Mississippi was 7,000, in Louisiana was 7,000, in Arkansas was 9,000.

The number of cattle lost in Mississippi was 9,000, in Louisiana was 19,000, and in Arkansas was 21,000.

The number of acres of land inundated in Mississippi was 861,000; in Louisiana, 1,100,000; in Arkansas, 1,839,000. Therefore, gentlemen, it will be seen that there were inundated in Arkansas approximately 750,000 acres more than in Louisiana.

Let us see how much of that damage came from the tributaries. There were over 8,000 horses and mules lost on tributaries, of a grand total of 9,000 lost in Arkansas. There were 19,000 cattle lost and there were inundated over 1,588,000 acres of land along the tributaries in the State of Arkansas. Therefore, gentlemen, according to the figures which I gathered from the Red Cross and the Department of Agriculture we find that the tributary loss in the State of Arkansas amounted to 88 per cent in the flood damages sustained in the State.

I live in a valley where the land is largely owned by the small farmer, who heretofore has been considered an independent farmer. That little valley is 230 miles long, extending from Fort Smith to Pine Bluff. I am only interested at this time in that Arkansas section. That little valley is from 5 to 25 miles in width. It has 11 cities, ranging in population from 3,000 up to 100,000; Little Rock, the capital city, being the largest. In that distance of 230 miles I went, in person, over all the 13 counties except 2. I asked men whose business ability and business integrity I knew personally to give me the statistics as to the losses that those people suffered in that valley. They based the losses on the permanent injury done to real estate, the damage done from loss of houses and contents, the damages through crop losses, and the damages to bridges and highways.

Gentlemen, when they had turned in their different statements to me, I found there had been a loss in that valley of over $26,000,000. That figure does not include the horses and mules and the personal property outside of the contents of the buildings.

Gentlemen, we have in this bill a survey for the Arkansas River included among the other tributary surveys. Is there anyone, from the President down, who has a voice in this matter that would subtract from this bill, either here or in conference, any provision that would take care of a situation like that? We are standing here ready to shed crocodile tears over the loss of life and property. I say that life and property are as sacred on the tributaries as it is anywhere else.

Governor SHALLENBERGER has in a most able manner presented the question of reservoirs, and I shall not enlarge upon his statement. I have it on no less an authority than General Jadwin himself that through the instrumentalities of reservoirs they can control the floods on the Arkansas River.

Do you know that last year, in April, there occurred on the Arkansas tributaries in the State of Kansas a damage of $12,000,000? Then you come on down into Oklahoma and there you find they suffered another damage of $20,000,000, and then you take the damages in the Arkansas River Valley of $26,000,000 and you have that combined damage in these three States of practically $58,000,000.

I call your attention to this, gentlemen: That I have not touched the area that is below Pine Bluff, a distance of 150 miles from the mouth of the Arkansas River, and the counties in southeast Arkansas that were overflowed by Arkansas waters. So we come to the question, How are you going to control these tributary streams? If we can not do it with reservoirs, I do not know how you are going to do it. I do know that the State of Oklahoma has taken a very progressive step in this matter. Several years ago the State created a flood commission and this commission has surveyed out many large reservoir locations. These locations by great engineers have been sanctioned as feasible and practical, but Oklahoma has not had cooperation from other interested States. It is a project too big for one State to undertake. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am a member of the Flood Control Committee of the House, a new member, one who came late into the drift of the arguments and the testimony, and therefore my mind is still in process of education; and in the few minutes I have at my disposal I hope to try, if I may, to draw a picture of the development of the discussion on this issue as I have watched it somewhat from the side lines, but partly in connection with the discussions of the Flood Control Committee itself.

It is nearly a year since the great flood of 1927. Certain facts and points at issue have clearly emerged.

In the first place, a definite conviction on the part of the whole country that the terrible catastrophe of 1927, please God and the efficient purpose of the American people, shall never occur again. A generous sentiment has been aroused, national in its range, that all the integrity, intelligence, and experience of the Government of the United States shall be brought to bear upon the problem and that full account shall be taken of the great losses, the sudden and terrible burden upon the Delta districts subject to the overflow.

Second, there is a conviction that the problem shall be considered as a national problem, that the Nation shall take vigorous initiative, that the administration of flood control in the Mississippi Delta henceforth shall be and must be a national administration, and the program of relief shall be a perfected project, looking forward to protection against not only such a gigantic flood as that of 1927 but against superfloods 25 per cent greater.

Upon these matters there is a unity of purpose, of spirit, of thought that approaches the unanimous. There are not two classes among the American people of those who are loyal to the dollar and those who are loyal to humanity. The Nation as a whole proposes to be loyal to humanity.

But some differences of judgment have arisen. First, about the financing of the project. A vast emotional tide, arising out of the catastrophe of 1927, has borne many to the point of view that the Nation should now not only unify the administration of flood control on the lower Mississippi but should pay for it in its entirety for the first time in the history of the country. There are some harbor and other projects where the general benefit is clearly of vast primary importance and where financial and economic skill and experience have not yet worked out the refinements by which any particular special benefit and unearned increment may be brought to pay its appropriate share of the general burden. In these projects the Nation or the collective governmental entity, whatever it may be, has paid the whole bill as a quick and easy way out of a financial dilemma not yet completely mastered.

But in the Delta of the Mississippi no such difficult dilemma has ever presented itself. The history of flood-control financing in that region is an open chapter of natural development of the fiscal relations between the localities and the General Government. Nature established the great watersheds and drainage systems of the Mississippi before there was a human being on the planet. The General Government is not responsible for it.

This wonderfully rich Delta was built up to fertility by this overflow long before the coming of man. And man took this rich and fertile area as he found it, with its original risks as well as its opportunity of profit and happiness. It was always an unmanageable river, and before there was a State or a General Government, man began to build levees and erect a protection against the natural floods of the Mississippi area. For a long time the navigability of the river was not an issue of first importance, and it was the fields of cotton and of cane which were regarded as in need of protection. For a long period the human encroachment upon the normal expansion of the river in flood times was not great and low levees were enough; for many generations the cost of building levees was amply taken care of by the profit from the products of the enormously fertile soil, itself the gift of the river.

Therefore the roots of protection in the Delta are local roots, and for a long period of our history local contributions toward cost of flood control were the only ones recognized in law or in fact in that region. When the swamp and overflow land acts were passed in 1849, 1850, and 1860, the gift of land to the States from the National Government was to aid the States in the construction of levees and drains, and the drift of the responsibility for protection was still local in its significance.

But the areas under cultivation in the Delta grew and the population on both sides of the river above and below grew. At first the whole Delta territory was sparsely settled. Soon it became covered with a network of cities and highways and improved agricultural sections, and one State competed with another State in throwing higher its barriers. The wide wandering of the river in its flood period was checked and hemmed in more and more, and the sudden and vast rainfalls of other sections of the country were carried through higher and higher and more and more costly levees in the great flood bottle neck from Cairo to the Gulf.

As early as 1879 the Federal Government was brought face to face with its own problem of navigation, as the levees became higher and higher and the silt filled the channels of the river.

The Mississippi River Commission was established and the protection of the navigability of the stream scrutinized and provided for as never before. Federal money began to flow into the care of the Delta, not for flood control but for the protection of navigability.

Then as the torrents of 1912 and 1913 arose and the evidence of the new and intolerable nature of the burden became clear, the Federal Government rallied to the support of the localities in the flood control acts of 1917 and 1923, and the local interests thereafter were required to contribute only one-third of the cost of levees, together with the rights of way, and the share which the Nation as a whole assumed gave proof of the country-wide conviction that the burden on the lower Mississippi was a common burden and must be recognized as such.

And after that, the deluge of 1927, its enormous damage, its vast effects of depression upon the homes and hearts of millions in the valley of the Mississippi. With the flood tide of waters came also the flood tide of national emotion.

And then came the time to think. Committees of Congress, individual Members, and public opinion began slowly to listen to the still small voice of facts, caution, reason. The President of the United States is more responsible for setting the Nation to think on this problem than any other force whatever. [Applause.]

It is becoming clearer that flood control on the Mississippi has its roots in special benefits and that general benefits slowly emerge. What then should the general share of the burden be? Under the impulse of emotion, one suggestion has been that the country should throw aside all thought of special benefit and let the Nation pay it all. Yet there is a special benefit in the perfected project; a surer and more continuous income from the cotton fields—real property in the villages and towns and cities on a securer basis than ever before; railroads free of the flood menace; levee bonds rising toward par; young and growing timber no longer subject to drowning in the overflow—surely there is a special benefit to emerge.

As soon as we stop to think we begin to detect special benefits. The principle of appropriate assessment continues to apply as it always has in the whole history of the Delta.

The only question is, What is to be done about it? Two things may be done. First, an economic survey. Nobody knows just how much of the two hundred and ninety-two millions spent by localities in the Delta through the whole range of protection from the beginning should be credited as excessive in view of the fact that the river has slowly been becoming a general burden through encroachment everywhere upon its natural condition. Nobody knows the worth of vast acreages in the Delta. In the Yazoo Valley the testimony runs from $40 to $100 an acre. Which is right? It makes a difference in the amount of contribution which the land might still conceivably and reasonably carry, if provision were made for the burden to be assumed slowly, as the increment of value arises out of the perfected project of flood control. Should not the land be classified, and the worthless, which can bear nothing, be separated from the productive, which can bear something? Will not the railroads in the protected areas be vastly better off, and is it necessary to legislate advantages to them and then pay them for the advantages out of the taxpayers' money? Is there not protection enough against damage for them in the Constitution, without specifically writing something still better into this bill?

There are many questions which are vital to the fair and just solution of the Mississippi flood-control problem on its financial side which can not be answered except by an economic survey by competent persons. Certainly Congress can not settle questions of equitable burden like these by guessed-at percentages or slap-stick financial sections inserted in a bill. An economic survey need not stand in the way for a moment of the vigorous prosecution of essential works of flood control. This is the thorough way and the sound way. This is the way to be sure that the taint of privilege and injustice, broadly charged in the reported views of the President of the United States, may be guarded against.

But an economic survey stirs some sincere apprehension in the minds of the masses of the people in danger of flood. They fear that it means delay and disappointment. It also is calculated to stir the apprehension of any particular interest which may now be profiting by inequitable or inefficient assessment or tax system and which prefers to remain secluded in its security.

And so the alternative of a compromise settlement of the contribution problem has come to the fore. Let us close the matter now, for this particular project, say some, in view of all the circumstances and conditions which surround it, by limiting local contribution to rights of way or for the levees on the river and the flood ways and for maintenance. This will not only serve as a bulwark to the fair principle of local contribution for later projects on the tributaries of the Mississippi and elsewhere but practically approve it under those circumstances and under those conditions where it may again come to its full significance. A method of reasonable compromise may be considered because of the perhaps excessive expenditures of $292,000,000 by these localities hitherto, and because of the interstate character of the great new flood ways.

But there is need of preserving the principle and practice of local self-help. There never was a time in the history of the country when vast projects requiring vast expenditures of the money of the taxpayers pressed so closely upon the Congress of the United States. It is time to think and to plan and to protect the Federal Treasury and not to yield to the emotional tide. Loyalty to humanity is entirely compatible with loyalty to sound governmental financing. The emotionalists who decry carefulness about the dollar, whether the private dollar or the public dollar, have again and again proved themselves to be the real foes of humanity. Perhaps the most depressing chapter in the history of the United States is the financial chapter. Partly necessary and partly ill-managed, the emotional financing of the War of the Revolution, the War of 1812, and the Civil War brought vast misery to the American people. It was not until toward the year 1900 and the early years of the present century that the Government of the United States came to an understanding of the problems which had to do with its own financial well-being. The John Shermans, Nelson Aldriches, the Carter Glasses, and the Woodrow Wilsons, who made the country stop and think about the financial road it was traveling—the country owes them a debt of gratitude which it never can repay. [Applause.]

This is the great contribution in our time of the present President of the United States.

The appeal to emotion, to carelessness, to free spending of other people's money, is in the end the most deadly menace to the orderly progress of humanity.

And the next most needful thing to look out for in this bill is the agency which is to prosecute the project. I am for the Army engineers as the responsible directing authority, with full control of contracts and expenditures of the money appropriated by Congress. I have watched them throughout the development of the discussion of this project, and they are the one group who have made the greatest impression on me for cool-headedness and high intelligence. They have been trained to integrity and a broad patriotism which looks at a problem from the point of view of the whole people. [Applause.] If I had my way, I would double the number of young men at West Point and Annapolis, not so much from the standpoint of a more adequate preparation for war but from the standpoint of having centers of discipline and integrity and self-control in times of peace in thousands of communities all over the United States. Honesty and efficiency and a soundly disciplined life throughout our borders would be the better for it.

I do not blame the President of the United States at all for desiring the engineers of the Army to have the full directing authority and control of contracts, financing, and planning day by day until the work is done. This is a project far greater than the Panama Canal. President Coolidge properly wishes it to be in every respect of integrity and efficiency a monument to his own carefulness and unselfish devotion to his country. No President wishes 5 years, 10 years, 50 years to pass and facts to become known that involve the corruptibility of a great project like this. His own reputation and the reputation of his administratiton and of his country are at stake. And he knows that his own best reliance and the country's best reliance is the skill and honor and discipline of the Army engineers. I do not blame the President for indicating that he can not sign a bill which does not adequately safeguard either his own reputation with posterity or the reputation of his country. [Applause.]

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman has made a very able presentation. I want to ask him if he thinks the United States Chamber of Commerce is composed of a group of men that is likely to be swept off of its feet by emotion?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I did not think so until I read the record of the United States Chamber of Commerce in the matter of what should be done about tax reduction. [Applause.] Since then I have been pretty certain that they can be swept off their feet by emotion.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman knows that the United States Chamber of Commerce has determined, on a referendum of 2,131 to 512, that the Federal Government should hereafter pay the entire cost of constructing and maintaining the works necessary to control floods on the lower Mississippi.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will say to the gentleman from New York that the document he holds came across my desk, too; but it did not register after the action of the United States Chamber of Commerce on tax reduction. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, like the last Speaker, I come from a district far removed from the scene of the disaster of the Mississippi; too far away for my people to have any benefits direct or indirect from any project constructed on the Mississippi River. I have tried, as he doubtless has tried, to look at this problem solely from the standpoint of a national legislator. I am glad that he and the gentleman from Iowa, who preceded him, agree with us that in view of what happened in 1927—a loss of 246 lives, between 600,000 and 700,000 people made homeless, an economic destruction of national wealth which they estimated at $200,000,000, but which the evidence before the committee shows is nearer $300,000,000, this thing must never happen again. We all agree with what the President of the United States said, that "its recurrence must be forever prevented." The difference is as to how we are to proceed to prevent the recurrence.

The time is passed to dismiss it as an act of God. Floods can not be prevented, but we know to-day they can be controlled and regulated and passed safely to the sea. I have little sympathy with the argument that because in ages past the Mississippi was wont in a state of nature to overflow and devasted 10,000,000 acres of land that therefore it has the innate and natural right forever to continue to do so. Why, where are the sons of the men who conquered the wilderness and peopled the plains of the Middle West? Where are the sons of the men who reclaimed the western deserts? Where are those who boast of the progress and advancement of our country?

Are they willing to say that a million and a half people and ten millions of the most fertile acres in this country are condemned to suffer the ravages of the floods of the Mississippi River and that the people who have built their homes there must take their chances with the floods because in the undeveloped condition of our country the river was accustomed to overflow, uncontrolled and unrestrained. Oh, they say, that in the lower valley they have reclaimed this land themselves, but I say that if they had not done it, it would have been the duty of the Government to have encouraged and assisted them in reclaiming it. It is our duty to make this country as productive as possible and to utilize all its natural resources. Why, not only in the South have they been engaged in this kind of work, but also in Indiana, in Ohio, in Illinois, and in all the upper States on the tributaries of the Mississippi. Wherever a roof has been erected, wherever a pavement has been laid down, wherever an acre of land has been drained and reclaimed there is found a direct contribution to augmenting and intensifying these floods.

It is the natural order of progress and development, and we are not going to confess our incompetency and our impotency by standing idly by and see go on year after year this great economic waste caused by an uncontrolled river when there is a way and a means to stop it. It is of interest to the people of my community as it is of interest to the people of every other community because we are one people and one nation and what harms one part of this Nation harms every part of it and what adds to the prosperity of one part benefits all.

What is the difference between those who oppose and those who advocate this bill? It is simply the means of bringing about the desired result. Thank God, the engineers who appeared before the committee—and they were numerous—testified that given money enough and means enough it is possible to control and regulate these floods and render them harmless. It is our duty as the National Government to see that this is done, and the only question is in what way it shall be done.

The system which has been in vogue has failed, has utterly failed. I say this with no reflection upon the Army engineers. I join in the pæan of praise that has been rendered them as to their honesty and capability. We ourselves are in part responsible for hog-tying them, for hobbling them, for hindering them with conditions, with restrictions, with limitations which have made it impossible for them to take a broad, comprehensive view of the problem or for them to adopt a plan national in scope. We have made them dependent by the provisions of the law upon local contributions. We have made it a condition precedent that before they can take a single step in this great flood-control work, they must first have a payment of money from the local community.

As one of the members of the Mississippi River Commission who had given much thought to this matter stated, the fault of the present system is that we have too many weak partners. This is a question of fact of record, not a question of mere assertion. It is not something that we can speculate about. The truth is that when the flood of 1927 came there were gaps in the flood protective works. The construction program of the Army engineers had dragged three years behind because of the inability of local communities to make the contribution which the law required, and this great flood coming down found these places that were incomplete and not up to standard and it went through those levees.

Why, if the people could have paid—and there is no sham about this matter—they would have paid because they had before them the warning of the great flood of 1922. Do you think they would have quibbled over a few dollars to have made their property, their own lives, and the lives of their loved ones safe? It is the uncontroverted testimony that before the flood of 1927 came they were unable to vote the bonds necessary, they were unable to sell the bonds necessary, they were unable to raise the necessary money by taxation in three or four levee districts. If they failed before the 1927 flood on a lesser constructive program laid down in 1914, how much more incapable are they now to raise a much greater financial requirement to take up this new and enlarged work which we are now told must take place. [Applause.]

Immediately following the 1927 flood it was found that there were 14 crevasses which it was impossible to close under the provisions of the present law because of the inability of local levee districts to comply with the requirements for local contributions. The Mississippi River Commissioners, in violation of the provisions of the law, closed these breaks at the expense of the Government, and yet the argument is made that the same provision should go back into the pending bill, although it has been proven that it will not work.

Flood control on the Mississippi River is a single problem, and its solution can be secured only by unified treatment. The Federal Government is the only agency capable of doing the job. Every part of the flood-control work is interrelated. What is done downstream affects the river back upstream for miles. What is done upstream may affect the river all the way down. What is done on one bank of the river is certain to affect the opposite bank.

The evidence before the committee showed that Tennessee was dependent in part for its protection upon levees in Kentucky, Arkansas is dependent on works which must be located in Missouri, and Louisiana in turn on levees in Arkansas. If we are to fight the river flood successfully, we must ignore State and local lines, because the river ignores them. We must have a comprehensive plan under unified control and direction. The character and location of the works must be determined by the need of the entire valley and not by the locality where built. Missouri, for instance, does not want a flood way from Birds Point to New Madrid. Arkansas does not want some of its fairest territory turned over to the Boeuf flood way. Louisiana is protesting the use of large areas in the Tensas Basin and Atchafalaya. But the greatest good to the greatest number must be the basis for determining the location of these works and only a Federal agency can make these decisions and, in making them, the agency must be unhampered by local conditions. We would be leaning on a broken crutch if we must depend on local contributions for progress in this work. The local districts are bankrupt as shown by their bonds selling at from 40 to 50 cents on the dollar. If we believe that this job should be done, and should be done before another disaster, then we must decide that the Federal Government is to do it.

The cost should not deter us if we are convinced that the project must be undertaken. "Puffing" is doubtless a legitimate form of argument and there has been much "puffing" of estimated cost. We have been assured by those for and against the present bill that, with the Army engineers executing the work, there will be no waste and no extravagance, and every cent voted will be accounted for. We also ought to have confidence enough in our own Federal courts to know that there will be no hold-up on the purchase of rights of way. The actual values should be paid to the owner, because it is unthinkable that we should take the land of one person in order to protect the property of another. There can be no occasion to fear the results of the condemnation suits that may be brought in the Federal courts and there is no justification for the suggestion of scandal in connection with the acquisition of these rights of way. It will not be a case comparable to juries rendering excessive damages against railroad companies, because in the first place juries will not be used under this law but only appraisers appointed by the judge. The honor and integrity of the Federal judges can not be impugned. Personally, I favor some amendment to the so-called railroad section, but aside from that the bill throws every safeguard possible around the acquisition of the rights of way.

What I fear is not the cost to the Government of the project if we undertake it but rather the cost to the Nation if we fail to undertake it. The tremendous economic waste that has been going on at regular periods will continue with greater disasters in the future if we fail now. This great economic loss will sap the prosperity of our country and strike a staggering blow at our economic welfare. Three hundred and twenty-five million dollars destroyed by floods is that much national wealth gone forever, but $325,000,000 applied to constructive and preventive flood-control works as an investment will pay our country and all the people handsome dividends in restored confidence and in enlarged national prosperity. The money so expended will not be lost but will merely go from one pocket to another. Men out of employment will be put to work. Industry will be stimulated and the country as a whole greatly benefited. Let us not fear to face this great undertaking with vision, courage, and confidence, and settle it right, so that in years to come the job will not have to be done over again by our children and none will have to apologize for our short-sightedness and lack of vision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL].

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, during the months of May and June, 1927, this country, from Maine to California, was shocked by the terrible disaster caused by the floods in the Mississippi Valley. The sympathy of the Nation went out to the poor people who suffered the loss of their homes and fortune. The Red Cross gathered from all parts of the Nation $15,000,000 to aid these people. The Congress of the United States is now considering what part this Government shall play in bringing back this great valley to a condition that will allow the people to live safely within its confines.

Long hearings and thousands of suggestions, differing in most every particular, have been presented to the Flood Control Committee. This great mass of evidence has confused everybody in Congress and it is a wonder to me that the committee was able even to write a bill.

The present bill—S. 3740—that is before us is one that has been passed unanimously by the Senate of the United States and has finally been favorably reported by the Flood Control Committee of the House. The bill in some respects is justified and in some respects it is not justified; but on the whole we must accept the fact that the flood of 1927 has destroyed property running into many more millions than the total cost of this flood control will be to the Government, and therefore we must take into consideration at this time what has happened in the past in the way of loss and consider for the future what we must do to protect this great territory from any future disaster of this kind.

It has been my opinion that the Government should pay practically the whole expense of this great project of flood control in the Mississippi Valley. The reason that I make this statement is because I do not believe the people of the South are able to pay any proportionate part of it. I do not believe the Government would have any advantage in making assessments against the property owners of the South, because, if they did, the collection of the amounts due would be almost impossible, and it would be necessary to pass over those who could not pay, which would be an injustice to those who could pay. However, I think the Government should not establish a precedent of going into any one locality and paying the entire bill, and, therefore, it would seem to me that those States in the South who are directly interested in flood control should meet the Government at least part way. They should do what they can toward assisting the Government in building flood ways, spillways, and levees for the protection of the southern part of this Nation.

From a speech that I made January 31, 1928, I quote:

> The securing of right of way for spillways and flood ways should devolve upon the State through which the spillway and flood way pass. The State should assume that part of the program to secure either easements or purchase of lands for this purpose so as to relieve the Government of any obligation or damage or future responsibility.
> If it becomes necessary to purchase the land the Government should furnish the funds to make the payments and should accept any reimbursements that might come from the resale or the rentals of the land. The States should assume all legal responsibilities. The laws of the States should be so constituted that the minimum purchase price for the land would be accomplished on a basis of the tax valuation of the land. The maintenance and control of the flood ways should be in the hands of the United States Government, but under some conditions it might be equitable to divide the expense between the State and Government.

I have not changed my mind on this proposition, although I intend to support this bill with certain amendments, and I believe that the Southern States should see the advantages that will accrue from carrying out the proposal that I have made, for the following reasons:

It prevents speculation in lands that are to be used or are contiguous to the sections that are to receive the benefits. In other words, if the State assumes this responsibility it will not allow the Government to be subjected to exorbitant prices, that it might be subjected to if the Government is obliged to assume the entire responsibility.

The major portion of these lands where flood ways are to be placed are not particularly valuable lands and the prices should be reasonable.

It should not be the policy of the Government to confiscate a man's property by running water over it without reimbursing the landholder, but, on the other hand, the landholder should not be paid in excess of the true valuation of the property, and the landholders throughout the State who are to be benefited by the flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries might well afford to pay a percentage of the cost.

Section 4 reads:

> Just compensation shall be paid by the United States for all property used, taken, damaged, or destroyed in carrying out the flood-control plan provided for herein, including all property located within the area of the spillways, flood ways, or diversion channels herein provided, and the rights of way thereover, and the flowage rights thereon, and also including all expenditures by persons, corporations, and public-service corporations made necessary to adjust or conform their property, or to relocate same because of the spillways, flood ways, or diversion channels herein provided: Provided, That in all cases where the execution of the flood-control plan results in special benefits to any person, or persons, or corporations, municipal or private, or public-service corporations, such benefits shall be taken into consideration by way of reducing the amount of compensation to be paid.

This section is very vicious and might prove very disastrous to the country. The provisions in it would require the Government to pay money for the rebuilding of railroads and other public-service corporations, and if a village should be interrupted by the building of the flood way within its limits the Government would be responsible.

There is now a provision in law whereby citizens may receive just compensation in the courts and that should be sufficient, but to commit the Government to a provision fraught with danger and enormous expenditures from which scandals may accrue would be unreasonable. It might in time reflect back to Congress, and therefore it is my opinion that this section should be eliminated entirely.

And so these several States should come to an agreement with the Government so as not to establish a precedent of putting the entire burden upon the Government. This could easily be arranged by bonds given to the Government for 25 years with a nominal rate of interest and making the interest free for the first five years. By doing this it would not put a hardship upon the States and would not establish so dangerous a precedent as may be established if the Government assumes the entire cost and responsibility.

The local interests in those States have already made an expenditure of approximately $292,000,000 that has been used in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River for the protection against floods.

The people of the Nation will approve of the Government allowing credit for this amount and the issuance of bonds for any additional proportionate part of the cost that may be properly charged to the States. They will also approve of the Government furnishing funds regardless of what it costs to build flood-control works that will control.

The flood of 1927 covered a vast area of land—150 miles in width and 300 miles in length. These flood waters were not the overflow directly from the Mississippi River, but was the overflow of its tributaries. The Yazoo, the White, the St. Francis, the Arkansas, the Ohio, the Missouri, and the Illinois Rivers furnished over 50 per cent of the flood waters of the valley. The tributaries, therefore, were more the cause of the tremendous overflow than the Mississippi itself.

In this bill, the Secretary of War, through the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, is directed to prepare and submit to Congress at the earliest practicable date, projects for flood control on all tributary streams of the Mississippi system subject to destructive flood, which projects shall include these rivers.

In my judgment, this is one of the important sections of the bill. It would be absolutely absurd to try to protect the valley by simply building levees along the Mississippi River. If you will investigate, you will find that it was the breaks in the Arkansas River that caused the overflow of all southern Arkansas and western Louisiana. You will find that 7 per cent of the flood waters of the Mississippi River come out of the Illinois River. These were the rivers that caused this great flood disaster. And so it is important that these rivers and all tributaries shall be considered in this bill.

It is not necessary that we should immediately make large expenditures on these tributaries and I would not advocate it, but it is necessary that the Government engineers shall make a survey of all of these rivers and that these rivers be put under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission or their successors, and that these tributaries shall, at the proper time, receive the same consideration as the Mississippi River proper.

The great bugaboo is raised that if we are to take in these tributaries, it will commit the Government to take in the tributaries of the whole Nation. That is not the fact. This bill only takes care of the tributaries that actually caused the flood, and it should be, because if these tributaries are not taken care of, then the flood control would not succeed.

And so I say to the Congress of the United States that from observations that I have made—and I have spent considerable time on this subject—I think that we should not hesitate to bring about a complete flood control of the Mississippi River and its principal tributaries designated in this bill. In doing this we should take into consideration that we are favoring the Nation at large. This great valley, through which the Mississippi River and the tributaries flow, is the bread basket of the Nation. It furnishes the food for all parts of the country. It is inhabitated by a population who have made their living by the sweat of their brow. The farmer who tills the soil must be protected; he must know that his family will not be deluged by the swift waters that are sure to engulf him unless this protection is given, and I for one, coming from the central part of the country, realizing as I do the great dangers that exist along these rivers, am here to advocate a bill that will protect the people that live in this valley.

Along the Illinois River, where I reside, the farmer has suffered intensely for the past two years; his farms have been inundated for 18 months continually; he has been unable to raise a crop now for two successive years; he is practically broke; he bides the time when the Government will come to his aid; he does not ask the Government to pay the entire expense, and it is not the money that he craves; it is the protection that he wants.

Rivers that flow through the valley where there is no organization to say what should be done with them are in deep distress, and therefore every one of these tributaries, including the Illinois River, should be put strictly under the jurisdiction of the Government with full power to devise ways and means to protect the lands and citizens along the river.

I would not advocate at this time that the Government pay the entire expense of the protection of the tributaries of the Mississippi River, but that the farmer and the landholder should in those cases pay his percentage, namely, two-thirds by the Government and one-third by the land holder; but I do say that the Government should have jurisdiction over the tributary river and should bear the expense of the main channel of the river.

In conclusion, I would suggest that the Congress of the United States should determine a policy that would recognize the obligation of the Federal Government to assume and perform the task of flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. The work should be done promptly and properly; the entire force of the Government engineers should be put to work and no time should be wasted in working out a plan to safeguard the people of the Mississippi Valley so that their families and property may be free from future danger. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I desire in opening to state a few rules of law, consideration of which is pertinent to the issue before the House, and which I shall undertake to apply to the case as I proceed.

A local assessment made on the theory of benefits is an enforced involuntary charge imposed by competent political authority to raise funds to pay for part or all of an improvement of a public character which confers a special benefit upon certain property.

The power of levying a local assessment is distinguishable from our general idea of a tax, but owes its origin to the same source or power.

In other words, an assessment is an enforced contribution for a public object; it is a public tax in the sense that it is levied for a public object; it is a local tax in the sense that it is limited to a certain locality. It differs from ordinary public taxes in that it is not levied upon the polls and estates within a municipality or a district in respect of public or common benefits, but upon particular lands in respect of a particular benefit received by them from the execution of a public object.

In the ordinary sense, a tax is levied to meet the general expense of government, while an assessment is levied to meet cost of public improvements resulting in special benefit.

A tax is a recurring charge, while an assessment is levied occasionally.

In theory the individual who pays a tax is left poorer by reason thereof, while in theory payment of an assessment does not leave the owner of the property assessed any the poorer. He is fully compensated by the special benefits conferred upon him by the improvement.

If a charge is laid against all the property within the limits of some political unit such as city, county, and the like, and if the charge is made in proportion to the valuation of the property upon which it is levied, such an exaction is held to be a tax, and not an assessment. However, if the exaction is levied upon property in such district in proportion to the benefits conferred by an improvement, such form of exaction is regarded as a local assessment, being not of the form of a general tax.

A general benefit is one which is supposed to flow to the general public from a public improvement. While a special benefit is one which enures to certain specific property in a manner different from that in which the general neighborhood is benefited and which operates to increase the value of such property.

Whether a benefit is general because there is so much other property which shares in it, or whether it is special because there is so much other property which does not share in it, is a question somewhat difficult to determine.

The theory underlying the doctrine of assessments for benefits is that the special benefits conferred on the owner of property more than compensate him for the amount of the assessment which he is obliged to pay. The fundamental principles of such special taxation is that it shall be measured by the special benefit.

The assessment is made solely on the ground of benefits conferred.

It is a local assessment imposed occasionally, or required, upon a limited class of persons interested in a local improvement who are assessed to be benefited by the improvement to the extent of the assessment, and it is imposed and collected as an equivalent for the benefit and to pay for the improvement.

Assessments for local improvements can be justified only upon the theory that the lands upon which they are laid are specially benefited by the improvements for which they are laid, and hence ought to bear the burden rather than property generally; and if a law should authorize such assessments to be laid without reference to benefits it would either take property for public good without compensation or it would take property from one person for the benefit of another.

This, in effect, Mr. Chairman, has been the uniform holding of all the courts of last resort of the several States affected. It is pertinent to this discussion, and particularly to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP], members of the committee reporting the bill, who make the point that the bill is bad because if enacted into law it will result in special benefits flowing to large land holders living in other sections of the country.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. That is very kind and considerate, and I appreciate it. Does the gentleman contend that the last provision in this bill which requires the State of California to contribute one-third to the Sacramento project, and the people of that district another one-third, and the Government only one-third, is unjust, and does the gentleman contend that the law that has been in existence for 10 years with respect to the Mississippi River has been illegal or unconstitutional?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking to the Sacramento section of this bill. That which is proposed in that section of the bill is in full satisfaction of the demands of the people of the Sacramento region in the State of California, and I wonder if the gentleman analogizes the Sacramento to the Mississippi to his entire satisfaction. To me, Mr. Chairman, there is a broad distinction, and the two problems must be treated differently.

Mr. FREAR. Then, if that be true, may I ask the gentleman——

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit—well, go ahead, sir.

Mr. FREAR. I was just going to say that for the last 10 years the Mississippi River section has made its contribution under the law; what has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman well knows that the witnesses that he has vouched into this court of the country, and upon whose partisan testimony he bases his entire cause in opposition to the bill, stated before the committee of which he is a member that the burden heretofore imposed upon the people of the valley was excessive and therefore unjustifiable, and in recognition of that fact the Chief of Engineers has proposed to reduce the contribution that should be required of the valley from 33⅓ per cent of the costs, as heretofore required under the law, to 20 per cent, and has indicated a willingness to reduce the amount to even less than 20 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. COX. I can not discuss the matter with the gentleman all day.

Mr. FREAR. The principle is the same whether it is 33 per cent or 20 per cent.

Mr. COX. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if in this case the proponents of this legislation shall be able to point out irreconcilable conflict in the testimony of witnesses upon the accuracy of whose testimony the opposition have built their case, then the proponents in the light of all the other evidence in the record will be adjudged with having carried the burden that they assumed.

I do not understand that the gentleman of the opposition takes issue with me on the accuracy of the principles of law which I have stated. The opposition have said in effect that this legislation will confer a great benefit upon the people who transgressed upon the natural flowage rights of the river; that the river was in existence when the people settled there; and that this is a reclamation project proposed to be carried on for the special benefit of the people who live near the river from its source to where it empties into the Gulf.

If permitted at this time, I should like in reply to this argument to quote from what I think is quite respectable authority, that is, from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States found in volume 241 of the Supreme Court Reports, page 368, a decision rendered by Mr. Chief Justice White, one of the most distinguished jurists ever occupying that high position:

> Indeed, from the face of the bill, it is apparent that the rights relied upon were assumed to exist upon the theory that the valley through which the river travels, in all its length and vast expanse, with its great population, its farms, its villages, its towns, its cities, its schools, its colleges, its universities, its manufactories, its network of railroads, some of them transcontinental, are virtually to be considered from a legal point of view as constituting merely the high-water bed of the river, and therefore subject, without any power to protect, to be submitted to the destruction resulting from the overflow by the river of its natural banks.

And, Mr. Chairman, that is the test in this case. If this House finds the execution of the project as proposed is an act of preservation and not primarily one of reclamation, then the responsibility and the full responsibility is upon the Government.

The court further said:

> In fact, the nature of the assumption upon which the argument rests is shown by the contention that the building of the levees under the circumstances disclosed was a work not of preservation but of reclamation—that is, a work not to keep the water within the bed of the river for the purpose of preventing destruction to the valley lying beyond its bed and banks, but to reclaim all the vast area of the valley from the peril to which it was subjected by being situated in the high-water bed of the river. If it were necessary to say anything more to demonstrate the unsoundness of this view, it would suffice to point out that the assumption is wholly irreconcilable with the settlement and development of the valley of the river; that it is at war with the action of all the State governments having authority over the territory and is a complete denial of the legislative reasons which necessarily were involved in the action of Congress creating the Mississippi River Commission and appropriating millions of dollars to improve the river by building levees along the banks in order to confine the waters of the river within its natural banks, and by increasing the volume of water to improve the navigable capacity of the river.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. With pleasure.

Mr. McKEOWN. The court in one of these cases finally held that the United States was not liable in damages.

Mr. COX. Of course; and I want to say that the provisions in section 4 of the bill were written, I dare say, for the purpose—and although I do not agree with some of the provisions of section 4 and opposed them, and shall further urge my objections in detail when we reach the bill under the five-minute rule—of taking the property out of the class that is mentioned in the cases of Jackson and Hume and others, where the property in question was clearly and admittedly destroyed under circumstances where the owner had no right of relief. The fact that it was taken in the name of progress and in behalf of navigation and by the United States with plenary powers was held to be a complete answer to demand for compensation.

While I appear in opposition to this bill, I do so as the friend of flood control interested in the enactment of legislation that meets the responsibility which rests upon the Government fully and completely. The bill under consideration I do not think does this in the fullest sense. I appear not as one antagonistic to the proposition that the flood waters of the Mississippi should be controlled, not as an enemy of the valley of the Mississippi, but as an advocate of the cause of a stricken people. I come from a State that is not affected by the floods, and that is wholly without the influence of their immediate effects. I come as one who has given some study to the question, and who has been brought to the conclusion, fixed, definite, and absolute, that, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] has said, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] has said, as the President of the United States has said, as the star witness for the opposition, General Jadwin, has said, this is in all respects a national problem. Mr. Chairman, if the river be a national asset, if the control of its waters be a national responsibility, and the control of the waters is the question under discussion, then it is a national liability, and the Government does not measure up to the responsibility that it confessedly says is upon it, when it fails to control the waters without undertaking to force contributions from the people of the valley who are already worn to the bone in an uneven contest for existence.

It is needless for me to undertake to give you a historical review of the floods of the Mississippi River. This has been too brilliantly recited by men who live under the very menace of the stream itself. Everyone knows that in consequence of the great calamity which befell the people of the valley a year ago there was a demand from all sections of the Nation that the Congress be assembled and that it undertake to give immediate relief.

Congress did not assemble, and I applaud the President for his wisdom in not calling it into extraordinary session at that time. A month before the Congress did convene, the chairman of the Flood Control Committee assembled his committee here in Washington and took up the consideration of this cause. That committee has labored diligently and has done the best it could. It has endeavored to arrive at a proper conclusion. It did arrive at a conclusion. The majority opinion of the committee as to what would constitute a project that would solve this problem was set forth in the report of the majority of the committee on the Reid bill, and was filed by the chairman on behalf of the committee. Mr. Chairman, I pause here long enough to say that, if this bill is enacted into law, the man who should have the right to claim the greatest credit for its enactment is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Flood Control of this House—a genius, an indefatigable worker; and may it be said to his glory, Mr. Chairman, one who has stood for the declaration of a new policy on the part of the Government with respect to the question of internal improvements. [Applause.]

What is the cause of the floods of the Mississippi River? Again I quote from the Chief of Engineers of the Army. He said in effect that floods result from the constriction of the river channel by the construction of levees and from the improved drainage systems, which mark the progress of civilization in the outstretches of the country. That is the record of the Chief of Engineers made upon the question of the causes of the flood. The people in the valley are not alone to blame for the construction of levees. As a general proposition they did enter upon levee construction as a defensive measure, and they prosecuted it to considerable extent until 1879, when the Congress created the Mississippi River Commission. That commission entered upon a study of the question of the control of the waters of the Mississippi and reported in 1883. Legislation was then enacted which resulted in the adoption of a plan of control.

This legislation regarded the preservation of navigation as peculiarly a national problem; the navigability of the river was to be protected and improved; and it was determined that it could be improved only by the building of a system of levees from Cairo to the Gulf. The Government agents, having adopted that theory, went along and took over the levees that had been constructed at intervals up and down the river, and proceeded to improve them by widening them at their base and increasing their heights. So, Mr. Chairman, the idea was to confine the water. More than that, the Government's agents sealed all of the natural outlets of the river and further increased the levees for the purpose of further restricting the waters, thereby increasing their volume and velocity. It is true that local interests participated. They had to participate. There was no alternative. The very proposal of the Government was put in such form that if they did not contribute, if they did not participate, the Government, upon whom the responsibility of control rested, would refuse to exercise it and let them drown. And that is the proposal that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] now make to this House.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? That is a serious arraignment.

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. I put in the RECORD yesterday from the Chief of Engineers a complete statement of what will happen in case they refuse to contribute, and showing where they will not in any way be in danger.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not have to go further than the report made by the Chief of Engineers, and if that is not entirely satisfactory to him, then I invite him to a study of the report of the Mississippi River Commission. If that be not convincing, then I refer him to the testimony of General Jadwin given before the committee, when he said in effect that as a result of the plan of enforcing local contributions the work of flood control had failed in many particulars and on many occasions.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I can not yield now. In talking about the participation by the valley, about the responsibility which General Jadwin and the President said should be imposed, the gentleman knows that the witnesses appearing before the committee professing to know anything about the conditions in the valley and knowing anything about the fiscal affairs of the various levee districts all testified with unanimity that the districts have already exercised their taxing power in most instances to the limit; most of them have not only defaulted in the payment of the State and county taxes, but most of them have also defaulted in meeting the interest charges on the bonds; and in many instances, Mr. Chairman, these levee districts, which the gentleman would have you believe are so well able to respond to this demand, have fixed charges in the nature of tax assessments and mortgage liens outstanding against them far in excess of the appraised value of the property of the several districts involved.

They say, Mr. Chairman, they admit, that control must be effective. They say that no such calamity as that which happened a year ago should be permitted to occur again; that the Nation can not permit such a calamity to happen again; and yet, Mr. Chairman, if we should judge to-morrow by yesterday, the proposal which they make means no activity on the part of the Government, because their proposal is that the old system heretofore followed under the law, which has admittedly proven a failure, shall continue under the new legislation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen deep down in their hearts are interested in the protection of the valley, and feel that the Government should participate, they should be frank and candid enough with this House, that expects the members of the committee to bring the unvarnished facts, and should state what the conditions are, and what the experience of the agency that conducted this work heretofore has been.

Mr. Chairman, they say that the Jadwin plan or the plan of Army engineers, meaning, Mr. Chairman, the Chief of Engineers of the Army, ought to have full jurisdiction of this entire matter or the execution of whatever project is decided upon. I can think of nothing, Mr. Chairman, that will be more unfortunate for the people of the valley than for General Jadwin to be the executive officer, administering the law if it is passed, except to enact no legislation whatever.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I can tell the gentleman something that will be more unfortunate, and that is to have a politician in there; and that is what we will get if we do not put it in the hands of an engineer.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has taken issue with me on the statement that the Chief of Engineers should not be in complete charge. Let me refer to the record. The testimony in this case of all the engineers appearing before the committee, except those under the dominion of the Chief of Engineers, has condemned his plan, and therefore the proposal in the bill is that there shall be an impartial review. The Chief of Engineers objects to any review whatsoever.

I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 4 last, as follows:

> I have heard that there is propaganda on the part of some to establish a commission to prepare a plan for the flood control of the lower Mississippi, and I understand that they count on putting on that commission some very good men, some very good engineers, but these men are not experienced in the Mississippi Valley. We have counseled, we have had the advantage of the advice of all men who had experience in the last 30 or 40 years on the protection of the Mississippi Valley, Army engineers, civilians; we have had the advice of the levee board engineers; and we have had public hearings and have gotten the views of everybody practically who knows anything really at present about this subject. These men who are going on this commission, if it is appointed, may be good men, but it is going to take them a long time to get to know anything nearly as much about this subject as is known by the men who have worked up this project.
> I venture the prediction that if these new men work 10 years on this project they can not get as good a plan as the one that I have presented to you here to-day, unless they recommend the same plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 35 minutes.

Mr. COX. I will take 20 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 20 additional minutes.

Mr. COX. I cite the gentleman to an editorial, and I ask the attention of the gentleman, if you please. I cite to the gentleman an editorial appearing in the Engineering News Record under date of March 8, 1928. I shall not take the time to read the editorial, but this is one that appears in a publication that represents the great engineering associations of this country, and it condemns the plan proposed by the general in this case:

> The share of blame resting on the executive department of the Government is too weighty to be overlooked. A plan and an estimate worked out by that department were presented for decision by Congress—to be taken or left, for no alternative was submitted. But they are such as would inevitably be rejected by any authority charged with deciding on their adoption. The estimate of cost confessedly includes only a fraction of the expense, and even as to the admitted fraction it is under gravest suspicion of inadequacy. * * * Moreover, with the cost altogether disregarded, there remain fundamental doubts as to the technical soundness and efficacy of the plans—doubts clearly expressed by many engineers outside of Government circles, and clearly enough realized by Members of Congress. The New Madrid flood way, shallow diversion channels a dozen miles wide, the sufficiency of which was merely guessed at, reliance on the haphazard crevasse formation to relieve an overburdened channel, levees flowing within a foot of the top in a great emergency, such elements of the plan utterly failed to engage that confidence vital to the undertaking of the great enterprise. That this should be the case is a serious reflection, indeed, on the governmental authorities responsible.

They say that the War College ought to be turning out a great many more engineers than it is doing. In other words, they proceed upon the idea that it is only the War College of the country that can turn out capable and eminent engineers. I want to remind those who hold that view that the War College is but a preparatory school. I measure my words. It is but a preparatory school. The real engineering institutions are the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Sheffield Scientific School at New Haven, Conn., the Van Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute at Troy, N. Y., Lehigh of Pennsylvania, Purdue of Indiana, and Cornell University, and others.

They say that the Chief of Engineers is infallible. The Chief of Engineers, when he came before the committee, said that his plans could be executed for $296,400,000 plus the cost of rights of way and damages, which he intimated would not amount to a great deal. At that time in his endeavor to indicate the leniency with which he purported to treat the stricken people of the valley, he said—I quote from his report, page 12, paragraph 42—as follows:

> 42. While $37,440,000 is small in comparison with the amount to be spent by the United States and with the amounts already spent by the people of the valley, it must be remembered that these people still owe considerable sums on their bonds on which the money spent was raised. Some of the levee districts are also near the limit of their bonding power under present State law and also near the limit of their credit.

So, Mr. Chairman, we take the Chief of Engineers as he appeared four months ago at the time of the presentation of his report. I know how some people were shocked when one assumed to question the Chief of Engineers of the Army, but when he appeared before this committee, Mr. Chairman, his position was that he wanted to be lenient with the stricken people of the valley, and therefore he had made the burden light by changing the amount of contribution from a third to a fifth. Take his findings. Take the testimony appearing in this case, where he gave an estimate of a supposedly middle course, on the result of the investigation as to the cost of the rights of way, as to the damages, as to all other things which in his first proposal would be put upon local interests, and you will find that it is inconsequential in comparison with that which he now says those conditions represent since the proposal in this bill that the Government shall pay.

Let me say to this Congress that the cost of this plan, 60 days, 90 days, or 4 months ago was no greater than it is to-day. The distinguished leader of the dissenters of the committee on this bill has referred to an address published in the RECORD of several days ago under the heading of extension of remarks. He has referred to it with evident pride. In that statement it appeared he had called upon this same Army engineer to furnish him with what? To furnish him with material with which he might destroy this bill, his child, because he did join in the combination that resulted in the reporting of the bill. Not only did he join, but the gentleman from Iowa, largely responsible for this measure being brought before you, now appears before the House and says, in effect:

Although the bill comes to you under my leadership, the bill is unworthy of your support, and I here and now in your presence assault it.

Mr. FREAR. May I inquire of the gentleman just what he means by that statement? I do not understand that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman himself is not in favor of every provision of this bill?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; and I did not vote for its reporting, either.

Mr. FREAR. I voted for the report but not for the bill.

Mr. COX. I understand.

Mr. FREAR. May I ask the gentleman what he refers to in my extended remarks?

Mr. COX. I refer to the statement that the gentleman makes as to the cost, and this is the point. If the gentleman was advised four months ago, he owed it to the committee and to the country at that time to give an estimate of the cost that would be imposed upon local interests. The gentleman stated here in effect, Mr. Chairman:

Under the data given by the Chief of Engineers the cost of the execution of the plan of the Chief of Engineers—

Which he was so strongly in favor of at the beginning of the investigation but which he now opposes—the cost of the execution of the plan of the Chief of Engineers will be $999,800,000.

Yet the Chief of Engineers purported to make the burden lighter. His proposal in the beginning was that of the $296,400,000, $259,000,000 should be paid by the Government; and, mark you, Mr. Chairman, that was not the sum that went to flood control but only what was left after the deduction of $141,000,000 which went to revetment and mapping. Revetment is necessary to control, but it is not an emergency measure, and there is a condition in the valley that calls for emergency treatment, Mr. Chairman, and the whole country knows it.

According to General Jadwin of a week ago, or whenever this report was furnished, the cost to local interests would be $740,800,000. Gentlemen, that is your witness. That is what General Jadwin now says, or what he said a week ago, that the local interests should be compelled to do, and if it is not, I ask the distinguished leader of the opposition to now make declaration as to what it does show.

This is not all, Mr. Chairman, and I am sorry time does not permit me to go into a minute discussion of this question. The opposition to this legislation is given support by a distinguished gentleman who came here at the beginning of the hearing on the part of this committee, presumably favoring flood control. At the instance of the Representatives of the State from which he came most favorable consideration was shown him by the committee. We thought he came as a friend of all the people of all parts of the country that were subjected to the floods of their rivers. We find now, however, Mr. Chairman, that he has joined the opposition and is snooping around this Congress earwigging this one and that one, conferring with the Chief of Engineers, holding interviews with the President, and furnishing them with ammunition to fight this proposal in every way possible.

I want to show you, gentlemen, what an indictment he lodges against the Chief of Engineers and against the President of the United States.

I want to say here with reference to the President, that while I do not believe he holds the high office of Chief Executive of the country by divine appointment, I do believe, Mr. Chairman, he is a man who is essentially honest, and that no one holds the confidence of the people of this country any more securely than does the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if you will not do me the unkindness to infer that I mean something unfavorable to him, the President of the United States is being dreadfully and unmercifully imposed upon by his advisers upon this particular question.

In a recent interview between Mr. Blake, of Oklahoma, and the President—who else was present I do not know—Mr. Blake furnished the President with a brief he had submitted upon this whole question; and later the Chief of Engineers was called into conference, when a full discussion under the brief was had as between General Jadwin, the President, and Mr. Blake, of Oklahoma. And this is what Mr. Blake said in his brief:

It is apparent that the General Jadwin plan is an expensive plan to somebody, as no calculation, even by its sponsors, brings its cost under $1,000,00,000, and many figure it at $1,500,000,000; some even higher.

Mark you, gentlemen, quoting further:

General Jadwin and the President contemplated $259,000,000 on the Government and the remainder on the community.

That is not all. Another estimate of the cost of the execution of the Jadwin plan is $1,850,928,000 according to the same brief. Quoting further:

General Jadwin expected all this except $259,000,000 to be borne by individuals.

In other words, deducting the amount the Government is to pay, it will be a charge of more than $1,600,000,000 upon local communities. Now, gentlemen, if the division of cost of 1 to 5 is correct then $1,600,000,000 is 5 per cent of $8,000,000,000. That would be the cost to the Government under the Jadwin plan, as Mr. Blake contends, because that is the thought running through the whole discussion of the problem, as presented in the brief. As I say, according to that estimate local interests would contribute $1,600,000,000, whereas the Government would pay $259,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, I must hurry on, and I can not cover the case. I want to call your attention to this one phase. You hear a good deal said by all the gentlemen appearing in opposition about the great lumber interests benefiting and the large landholders who are to profit as the result of the execution of this project. But let me make this observation to you: If the Government finds it is necessary to acquire land in the valley the Government is not going to pay ten times its value, as contended by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. The Government can be charged with only the actual market value of the land. You may find, gentlemen, that in some instances it is a forced sale on the part of the landholders in order that these plans may be executed, and that they will be forced to part with their title. Well, what is the result of such a transaction? The landholder is made no richer. His interest is simply represented by cash in hand whereas before it was represented by land. The Government is out nothing. The Government is just as rich after the transaction is consummated as before. The Government acquires the title to the land and gets the land in exchange for cash. So, gentlemen, the argument that somebody is going to be enriched should have no standing in this consideration.

I know the question runs through the minds of many here as to what it is proposed to do with the tributaries of this country. I know, Mr. Chairman, the trouble resulting from floods and I know that trouble is not wholly confined to the people of the Mississippi Valley; that is, to the people of the alluvial valley. I know there are localities elsewhere, many of them, where the control problems are difficult and where the menace may be as great as in the Mississippi Valley.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should permit ourselves to be checked in a determination to meet the responsibility that is upon us with reference to the Mississippi because of a fear that the tributaries will be coming here later and demanding like treatment. Let me say to the Congress that I am willing that the tributaries shall receive the same consideration as is extended to the Mississippi, determining each and every case upon its merits.

The Mississippi presents a national problem as no other stream in the world does. If the proposition is to go there and spend this money in order to confer some special favor upon the people, then the Government is engaged in an enterprise in which it has no business and it should retire, but if the preservation of the stream be necessary for the security of the national welfare, in whatever manner it may be affected, then there is not only justification for the Government giving full and special treatment but there is a responsibility to give immediate consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining. The gentleman has consumed 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, not only is the question of commerce affected by the navigability of a stream but commerce is injuriously affected by the result of overflows and in many other respects. There is the question of transportation of the mail, passenger transportation, telegraphic and telephonic communication. In addition, when three-quarters of a million people are turned out of their homes, and their property laid waste, then their power of production is stopped as well as their power to consume and purchase, and that has a material and injurious effect upon the commerce of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I shall expect some other speakers to develop this particular phase of the question, in which I am more interested than any other, but I have been too late in coming to it.

You stress doing something for the valley and therefore for the country, yet certain of you oppose this legislation unless the execution of the project be put under the jurisdiction of the Chief of Engineers. I want to say that if you pass legislation carrying into effect the economic recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, that if you put the execution of flood-control plans under him, you will fill with mortal terror the people of the valley and destroy their confidence in the conservation of their rights at the hands of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to myself. My distinguished friend from Georgia mentioned a meeting recently held between the engineers, Mr. Blake and General Jadwin, and some other people who were present, and if I gathered correctly he stated as a final instance that if 20 per cent of the general levee and control work was levied on the people it would reach something over a billion dollars, according to Engineers Blake and Jadwin. There is some mistake as to the meeting that occurred between General Jadwin and Mr. Blake, because the President in a message, speaking of the Jadwin plan, said:

> On the basis suggested, the total construction costs would be divided as follows: Total, $258,960,000; 20 per cent by local interests, $37,440,000.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I do not want the gentleman to put words in my mouth that I did not use, and I do not think the gentleman intends to do so.

Mr. FREAR. I certainly did not.

Mr. COX. I made no statement that any definite conclusion was reached as the result of any conversation between Mr. Blake and General Jadwin.

Mr. FREAR. Did not the gentleman from Georgia say, or did he not mean to be understood, that over a billion dollars was to be placed on the local interests under the Jadwin plan?

Mr. COX. I said that Mr. Blake, in the brief furnished the President, made the statement that the Jadwin plan would cost $1,800,000,000, and in another instance he said it would cost more than a billion. Now, if the participation of the Government is to be limited to $259,000,000, it is a mere matter of calculation——

Mr. FREAR. That is what I understood the gentleman to charge, when here is the statement by the President's message of only $36,840,000 local contribution.

Mr. COX. Did not the gentleman say in the speech which he put in the RECORD a few days ago that the entire cost of the execution of the plan would be $999,800,000? Now, if you deduct the $259,000,000, you will find what the General Jadwin plan would cost local interests.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, the gentleman did not read the speech understandingly. In the speech I gave the different estimates furnished by the engineers. I appreciate the gentleman's excellent judgment in selecting the Engineering News-Record of March for authority, but he ought to have selected the Engineering News-Record of April. Let me read from the April number. This is an editorial:

> Precipitate legislation on a momentous question, as represented in the Senate's passage of the Jones flood control bill, can not invite either public or engineering approval. Its political background is obvious. * * *
> If the Senate's action gives warning that Congress is simply playing politics in the flood issue and is evading a direct answer to the problem of Mississippi flood control, constructive thinking on the subject becomes the personal obligation of the citizen. Let us therefore inquire what line of action gives real promise. * * *

Now, I want to say that long before the gentleman from Georgia entered Congress—and he is now an estimable Member—10 years ago I voted for this very protection giving two-thirds of all flood-control payments on the Mississippi incurred by the Government to the people down there in the valley. They have only contributed one-third of the costs. We do insist that justice shall be done the taxpayers of the country under the bill. Here is the difficulty: The gentleman from Georgia says that some interests can not pay. We admit it, and we provide an amendment for Government loans to those who can not pay. I expect to offer an amendment to that end. If they can not do that we are going to place in the hands of the Secretary of War, if you accept another amendment, the right to exempt from contribution where necessary for the entire work. Those who can pay ought to pay, and those who can not do so at this time ought to be willing to take a loan from the Government, and the Government ought to loan it to them. If they can not do that because of conditions named we will exempt them. What can be fairer than that in any business proposition?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. REID of Illinois. The figure $37,000,000 which the gentleman just read does not include the rights of way.

Mr. FREAR. Twenty per cent by local interests. This is all the Jadwin plan contemplates—on page 11—20 per cent of general levee and control work, $36,840,000; 50 per cent of special protection works, $600,000; total, $37,440,000.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Read what comes next:

> The local interests are also expected under the project to furnish rights of way and protect the United States against charges for flowage easements and damages.

Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Then the Jadwin plan costs somebody under Mr. Locke's figures, or the gentleman's figures, either the Government or the local interests, a billion dollars.

Mr. FREAR. Fine! Now we have our friends admitting that the flood ways are going to cost the Government $1,000,000,000. I have not contended it would reach half that figure.

I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, unlike my colleague from my State, Mr. DAVENPORT, who said that he was far removed from the flooded area, I say to you that the people I represent do not consider themselves distant from the flooded area. With us it is not a sectional matter. Wherever there is a national calamity, wherever there is suffering, there you will find the heart of New York. I do not believe it is necessary for the sponsors of this bill to review and recite the details of the result of the flood. We are agreed on what happened. There is a unanimity of desire in this House to bring about permanent relief. It would be most helpful, I would say, if the sponsors of the bill would explain three points to clarify the provisions of the bill—first, the engineering plan; second, the question of national policy in dealing with a subject of this kind; and, third, the financial details.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill would bring permanent relief to the people of the Mississippi Valley from flood problems, I would shut my eyes and vote for it, no matter what you had in it. There are some of us who consider the engineering plan both crude and primitive, and that being so this bill, I believe, will not permanently solve the problem. The same problem will be back in the House within 10 years. Therefore, the real friends of relief desire to eliminate from the bill every possible danger of a national scandal. I for one do not desire to prejudice relief in the future by what I fear will happen under this bill. Only a week ago to-day the Committee on Agriculture had its Calendar Wednesday, and if you remember we had a little bill here providing for a bird sanctuary up in Minnesota, authorized by Congress over a year ago, providing for the taking of land at $5 an acre; and yet they were here just a week ago to increase the allowance to ten or fifteen dollars because the price of that swamp land had gone up immediately after the law was passed. Can you imagine what will happen to the lands involved in this project? Can we not guard against any such thing taking place? I do not go as far as my colleague from Wisconsin in demanding local contribution. I am not insistent on that. I do not believe that the Federal Government ought to take the attitude of passing the hat around. All I ask the sponsors of this bill to do is to protect it against the inevitable land grab that is now in preparation and ready to move upon the works the minute the bill becomes a law. Rather than a direct system of local assessment on the part of the Federal Government on the area of benefit, rather than a direct relation between the Federal Government and the owners of the land immediately affected, why can not we arrange a plan between the States interested and the Federal Government? I shall suggest at the proper time a plan whereby the 18,000,000 acres in the area of benefit in the various States could pay for the 3,000,000 acres necessary for flood ways and spillways in accordance with the plan in the bill. Let each State affected contribute the amount necessary to pay for the spillways and flood ways in proportion to the acreage within the State directly benefited.

It will amount to only a few million dollars if the estimated value given by the sponsors of the bill on the land to be taken for spillways and flood ways is correct. The States would furnish the land necessary for the spillways and the flood ways and the United States Government would bear the cost of construction and carrying out the flood-control plan.

The question of flood is not new. Man has had to grapple with it from the beginning of the world. The greatest engineer on the subject lived 2,000 years ago—Lo Ping, of China. They solved the problem there in one instance, and no engineering skill to-day can improve upon the principle which he laid down: "Shen tao t'an, ti tso yen"—"dig the bed deep, keep the banks low." We have spent millions and millions in building levees, and each year the levee is higher and higher, so that now you have the Mississippi River 14 or 15 feet above the level of the city of New Orleans. We have the resources and surely we have sufficient engineering genius to solve this problem constructively and permanently. We can not work out the engineering details here. That is not our function. I think we must work out a satisfactory bill which will provide real flood relief, absolutely graft proof, and void of land speculation.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] made a splendid speech here this morning. Imagine, as he pointed out, in this day and age, permitting this tremendous power to go to waste! Instead of permitting these millions of horsepower of energy to be a constant danger to the inhabitants of the valley, we could harness it so as to make it a blessing to that region. Why do we not provide in this very bill for the damming of waters at various points of the river and its tributary? Why do we not control the flow and keep it under control, utilizing at the same time this water power for generating electricity?

The minute you do that you step on the toes of the dam and power trust of this country, which apparently is sufficiently powerful to influence the action of this House, and you know it. [Applause.] If you utilize those millions of horsepower in a series of reservoirs along the tributaries of this river and then follow the fundamental principles providing for a deep river bed and low banks, as laid down by the Chinese engineers 2,000 years ago, we shall have solved this problem permanently.

Gentlemen, this bill is important. There is not a great deal of difference between the opponents of the bill and its sponsors. Let us not permit this bill so to leave this House as to bring back another 26-page veto upon it as we received on another bill some time ago. Let us not furnish the justification for a veto. We want to bring about flood relief and we must get together.

There are sufficient friends of this bill here who will support it if you will simply surround it with the protection that I have mentioned before, and that is to have the States furnish the land necessary for the spillways and flood ways. It will then come under local condemnation and be safeguarded by local interests. The cost of the estimated 3,000,000 acres required can not be very much. In comparison with the 19,000,000 acres benefited it is very little indeed.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Congress in all has appropriated nearly $200,000,000 for the improvement of the harbor of New York. Does the gentleman favor that without State participation?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. New York has contributed hundreds of millions of dollars for harbor improvements.

Mr. ASWELL. But Congress has appropriated $200,000,000 to New York without local contributions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana that we do not ask that you contribute even in the same proportion as New York does in harbor improvement. I concede that this is a national problem. I concede that it is the duty of the Government to make provision to prevent another flood. But I say that the States that will derive the most benefit should at least furnish the land needed. It will take away from this legislation its land-grabbing feature and will remove the prejudice against the idea of the United States Government going into a project of this kind in the future.

Mr. ASWELL. There has been no prejudice manifested, except in the propaganda and demagoging that has been handed out in the last few days.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman feels that way——

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and others have done that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman think this vast potential power should go to waste because the mighty water-power propaganda has intervened? That is the kind of propaganda that has gone out and that is the kind of propaganda which the gentleman is unwittingly giving aid to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to myself, to say that if I have been engaged in uttering demagogic expressions, the President of the United States and many other reliable and reputable men have done the same when demanding contributions from those able to pay. I have no personal interest in this matter and am willing to have every State make a contribution, and my State is willing to make contribution of several million dollars for this project, but the gentleman from Louisiana represents a State that is largely interested. He and the other Representatives from his State say the State will contribute nothing for their own protection. The gentleman talks about what has been given years ago. For many years those States have been collecting for their cotton and other crops far more than they have ever expended for the erection of levees. I say that some of the best men in this country believe as I do; that these States should contribute; that it is unjust for us to go on and spend all this money and let the people down there, irrespective of their ability to pay, accept all these benefits free. [Applause.]

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are now considering is the result of many months of labor on the part of the Flood Control Committee of the House and the Commerce Committee of the Senate. Both committees held extensive hearings and most of the members visited the flood-stricken area in person.

Too much praise can not be accorded Chairman REID, of the House Flood Control Committee, for so courageously maintaining that flood control is a national problem and insisting that the entire cost should be borne by the Federal Government. A like measure of praise should be accorded Chairman JONES, of the Senate Commerce Committee, whose skill and ability resulted in a unanimous report of his committee and an equally unanimous vote in favor of the bill in the Senate.

The State of Louisiana has reason to be grateful to its member on the Flood Control Committee, Hon. RILEY J. WILSON, and to its two United States Senators, who so ably protected the interests of a State that suffers more than any other from the flood waters of the Mississippi. [Applause.]

EFFECTS OF THE FLOOD

Before discussing the merits of this bill I would like to refer briefly to the effects of the recent flood.

The story of the flood of 1927 is one that will never be forgotten in the Mississippi River Valley. The press, the telephone and telegraph, and the voice of the radio but poorly pictured that tragedy. One had to be on the scene to realize that such a calamity was possible. That many hundreds of lives were not lost was due to the splendid relief work done under the direction of Secretary Hoover and ex-Governor Parker, of Louisiana. That many others did not die of starvation and disease was due to the Red Cross and to the charity and generosity of the American people that enabled this great organization "its wonders to perform."

When the levees on the Bayou des Glaises and the Atchafalaya Basin gave way, it flooded one of the most fertile and thickly populated sections of Louisiana. The cities and towns of New Iberia, St. Martin, Breaux Bridge, and Morgan City were submerged. Ninety-nine per cent of the parish of St. Martin was under water to a depth of 1 to 12 feet. Large areas in the parishes of Iberia, St. Mary, Lafourche, Terrebonne, and Assumption were covered by this devastating flood, and valuable crops were destroyed.

But human suffering and woe is what touched the heartstrings. This flood covered a territory that had never been overflowed. The people could not be convinced that they were in danger. They refused to leave their homes and their possessions. The rude awakening came with the break in the levees, which was followed by a mad rush for safety and frantic attempts to save life, livestock, and property. Business was suspended in neighboring towns, and the whole community became engaged in rescue work. Every available water craft was put into commission and for several days people were being rescued from housetops. As fast as they could be rescued the refugees were taken to the neighboring cities of Lafayette and New Iberia, whose citizens vied with the Red Cross in extending aid and relief. These refugees, some 50,000 in number, were cared for in the Red Cross camps established at Lafayette, New Iberia, Houma, Thibodaux, and Napoleonville, the citizens of which rendered every aid that was humanly possible. And when at the end of two months the flood had subsided and these people returned from whence they came, what did they find? Their homes had been totally or partially swept away, their fences were all gone, their once-fertile fields were covered with slime and sand, their livestock and chickens had been swept away in the flood. They had nothing left but the courage to begin life again. And yet, it is these same people, we are told by some high in authority, who should now tax themselves and contribute toward flood control.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

Mr. Chairman, this bill, like all other legislation, is the result of compromise. Personally, I would have preferred the original Reid bill, which adopted no plan, but provided for a commission with full authority to solve the flood problem without local contribution. It is true that this may have resulted in some delay, but where life and property are at stake a little delay would do no harm.

The bill under consideration, while adopting the Jadwin plan, yet authorizes the modification of that plan and contains provisions which, in my opinion, will safeguard the interests in the Atchafalaya Basin. Had the Jadwin plan been adopted in this bill, without authority to modify or change it and without the safeguards to which I shall presently refer, I should have felt constrained to vote against it, as I am convinced, after a most careful study of General Jadwin's plan, that it would not only fail to remedy conditions in the Atchafalaya Basin but would in times of flood make conditions in that basin even worse than they were in 1927.

I shall take occasion to refer more particularly to the Jadwin plan further on in my remarks.

This bill provides for a board consisting of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, the president of the Mississippi River Commission, and two engineers chosen from civil life, whose duty it shall be to consider the differences existing between the plan of the Chief of Army Engineers and the Mississippi River Commission plan, and after such study and such further surveys as may be necessary determine the action to be taken on same and its decision followed in carrying out the project. If the board can not reconcile the two plans, then the matter must be referred to Congress. But the most important provision relating to the Atchafalaya and other basins is that which follows:

Provided further, That such surveys shall be made between Baton Rouge, La., and Cape Girardeau, Mo., as the board may deem necessary to enable it to ascertain and determine the best method of securing flood relief in addition to levees before any flood-control works other than levees and revetments are undertaken on that portion of the river.

As originally framed, the bill provided for a survey between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and Point Breeze, La., thus excluding a survey of the Atchafalaya Basin. At my earnest request, Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana, was considerate enough to have the bill amended in committee by extending the survey as far as Baton Rouge, thereby including the Atchafalaya in the survey to be made. Without this amendment the board was without authority to modify the plan of the Chief of Engineers further than to reconcile it with that of the Mississippi River Commission. With this amendment the board is authorized to make such further surveys as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the best method of securing flood relief in addition to levees, and this must be done before any flood-control works, other than levees and revetments, are undertaken on that portion of the river.

NECESSITY FOR SURVEY

A survey is necessary because the plan of the Chief of Army Engineers neither meets nor remedies conditions in the Atchafalaya Basin.

This plan proposes that the Atchafalaya River shall receive and carry to the Gulf 1,500,000 second-feet of water. The most this river has ever carried is 500,000 second-feet, and this was followed by crevasses that inundated a vast section of the country. The plan of the Mississippi River Commission proposes to divert 900,000 to 1,000,000 second-feet down the Atchafalaya, and that would give a reading of 13 feet on the Morgan City gauge. The diversion of 1,500,000 second-feet through the Atchafalaya would give a gauge reading of over 15 feet, and would submerge the Southern Pacific Railroad from Schriever to Baldwin, a distance of over 50 miles.

The Atchafalaya River, as one of the outlets of the Mississippi River, must bear its burden of the flood waters, but whatever amount of water this river is made to carry, that amount should be limited and controlled.

The proposed fuse-plug levees, so constructed as to give way in time of extreme flood, would turn an indeterminate amount of water down the Atchafalaya, would raise the flood heights several feet over that of 1927; and if perchance the so-called guide or flood-way levees should give way, the loss of life and property would far exceed that of 1927. Such a disaster would not only flood the same territory as did the 1927 flood but hundreds of square miles of additional lands. To make the Atchafalaya River take care of one-half of the water that flows down the Mississippi in time of extreme flood, without limit or control, would be inviting a disaster that would make that of 1927 pale into insignificance.

FLOOD-WAY LEVEES

The guide or flood-way levee proposed in the Jadwin plan for the west side of the Atchafalaya River terminates, according to the map accompanying his plans, near Grand Lake, between Franklin and Patterson. There is no plan to control the water when it reaches the end of this levee, and nothing to stop the water from going around the end of the levee, thereby flooding the entire east side of Bayou Teche, and again there is nothing to stop the water from crossing to the west side of the Teche and flooding the greater portion of St. Mary Parish, including the towns of Charenton, Baldwin, Franklin, Centreville, Patterson, Berwick, and Morgan City.

On the east side of the Atchafalaya conditions would be no better. The flood-way levee proposed in the Jadwin plan terminates about 8 miles east of Morgan City, and the backwater going around the end of this levee would cover the entire west side of Bayou Lafourche as far up as Donaldsonville and would flood a large portion of the parishes of Terrebonne, Lafourche, and Assumption.

That the effect of the Jadwin plan would be as above outlined is the fixed opinion of such eminent engineers as James P. Kemper and Walter Y. Kemper, of Louisiana, both of whom were born and raised in the Atchafalaya Basin and are thoroughly familiar with the levels and topography of that country.

The necessity for a modification of the Jadwin plan is virtually admitted by the general himself in his statement before the Commerce Committee of the Senate, as appears from the following:

Senator RANSDELL. Do you insist on your report through the Atchafalaya? Would you extend that farther down?

General JADWIN. My report provides for going down farther than is shown on the map. You will find a paragraph in there, and I have an addition to the estimate.

Senator RANSDELL. Explain that briefly. My friends down there in that country tell me that they would all be flooded if your project were carried out.

General JADWIN. We are going to take care of everything down there that is economically justified. We have an extra sum in the estimate. You know that country is developing down there, and we want to take care of that water in a way that will fit in with them. That is what we mean when we put a paragraph in there, and we intend to protect everything that is economically justified.

Senator RANSDELL. Entirely down to the Gulf?

General JADWIN. Yes. We intend to go down through there as far as the soil will bear levees, and we may have to make some turns and we may have to put a lock in where we cross the intercoastal waterway.

Senator RANSDELL. And provide for a million and a half second-feet that you suggest?

General JADWIN. Yes.

Senator RANSDELL. It would be a great addition, would it not, to the estimate that you have spoken of? I think you figure $27,000,000 for that general section. You would have to add a great many millions, would you not?

General JADWIN. Oh, it is in there. We have the money in there that will take us down.

It will be noted that General Jadwin states that the guide or flood-way levees will be taken farther down than is shown on his map, and, in fact, be built as far down as the soil will bear levees, thereby protecting everything that is economically justified.

Certain it is that his plan and the map accompanying the same did not indicate the protection that he now proposes, nor did it make any mention of locks. The provision in the bill calling for a survey will therefore permit the changes suggested by General Jadwin and will also permit such further modification of his plan as will give the Atchafalaya Basin the protection to which it is entitled.

MORGAN CITY

Under the Jadwin plan Morgan City is to be protected by a so-called ring levee; that is to say, the city will be placed in the flood way, and its protection will be dependent on a levee which will encircle the city, the cost of which is to be paid one-half by the city and one-half by the Government.

This city of some 5,000 inhabitants, with its flourishing industries of lumber, oysters, fish, and furs, is entitled to more consideration, and is given more consideration by the plan of the spillway board, which is adopted in the report of the Mississippi River Commission. The spillway board proposes that the Atchafalaya River shall receive 1,000,000 second-feet of water, which would put the gauge at 13 feet at Morgan City, while the Jadwin plan proposes that the river shall receive 1,500,000 second-feet, which would put the gauge at Morgan City upward of 15 feet. In his statement before the Flood Control Committee, Colonel Wooten, the chairman of the spillway board, made this statement with reference to the east side of the Atchafalaya River:

Then starting on the east side, to maintain the existing levee intact, strengthen it and build an extension of the levee system down on the east side and swing it around to protect Morgan City, so that backwaters from the Atchafalaya would not back up on Morgan City.

Colonel Wooten also recommends the construction of a sea wall in front of Morgan City of such dimensions as would insure its safety from overflow in times of the highest flood.

With further reference to protecting Morgan City, Colonel Wooten, in answer to a question, makes the following statement:

Mr. MARTIN. You said something about your board having taken into consideration the advisability of putting a spillway in the Atchafalaya near Morgan City.

Colonel WOOTEN. Yes; we looked around for proper sites.

Mr. MARTIN. You did not recommend it on account of expense.

Colonel WOOTEN. Yes; on account of the cost; that is the balance between the costs and the benefits in order to get a discharge which would really amount to anything. It would give us a good deal of the valley which we do not have to have, because we have got enough capacity in the Atchafalaya at Morgan City, if we levee it, to take care of the flow which would be consequent upon the flood which we assume would be the basis.

This answer of Colonel Wooten but emphasizes the necessity for a survey, as is authorized in this bill, to the end that Morgan City may be given relief and not be subjected to a financial burden it is unable to bear.

EAST OF ATCHAFALAYA

With reference to lands lying east of the Atchafalaya, the following colloquy took place between Colonel Wooten and myself before the Flood Control Committee:

Mr. MARTIN. Colonel, in speaking of the height of water at Morgan City, how does your proposed plan protect the parish of Terrebonne, for instance?

Colonel WOOTEN. Perhaps I had better describe that a little bit more. Here [indicating on map] is Morgan City. Here [indicating] is Bayou Boeuf coming down, and Bayou Black coming in over here [indicating]. As you know, the intercoastal canal at the present time goes through Bayou Black and Bayou Boeuf up to Morgan City.

In order to extend the levee system down far enough so that backwater from the Atchafalaya will not come around through Bayou Boeuf and Bayou Black into this Terrebonne and Lafourche country, we propose to put a dam just below Morgan City and put that levee right on across it and extend it down the Bayou Shaffer to its junction with Bayou Chene; and the intercoastal canal, then, instead of going through Bayou Boeuf, would go down through Bayou Chene and up through Bayou Shaffer to Morgan City. It would add a few more miles in length to the intercoastal canal, but it would avoid putting a lock in Bayou Boeuf.

I have great confidence in Colonel Wooten, but whether his plan, as outlined in answer to my question, will protect the parishes of Assumption, Lafourche, and Terrebonne from backwater, I am unable to say. Eminent engineers familiar with the topography of that section of the Atchafalaya Basin say that it would not. There is too much at stake to have any uncertainty, and an additional survey will remove the doubt and provide a remedy, if one is needed.

OTHER SAFEGUARDS

This bill also contains the following provisions:

Provided further, That all diversion works and outlets constructed under the provisions of this act shall be built in a manner and of a character which will as fully and amply protect the adjacent lands as those protected by levees constructed on the main river: Provided further, That pending completion of any flood way, spillway, or diversion channel, the areas within the same shall be given the same degree of protection as is afforded by levees on the west side of the river contiguous to the levee at the head of said flood way.

These safeguards should remain in the bill, and they will tend to give the people residing in the Boeuf, Tensas, and Atchafalaya Basins a sense of security during the time that flood-control works are under construction. Under no circumstances should a flood way be constructed until all lands and property embraced within such flood way have been acquired or the easement thereon purchased and all protection and drainage works completed, to the end that lands, cities, and towns adjacent thereto shall be as fully protected as those adjacent to the main river.

A NATIONAL OBLIGATION

I congratulate the committees of both branches of Congress that have framed this legislation upon having reached the conclusions that flood control is a national problem and that the entire cost should be borne by the Government. There can be no flood control with divided authority. Either the Government must take over the problem and solve it, or we must look forward to disasters even worse than that of 1927.

The proposal in the Jadwin plan that the people in the Mississippi Valley pay 20 per cent of all cost of flood control, provide rights of way for all levee structures and drainage works, maintain all levees at the head of flood ways, maintain all flood-control works after construction, and pay all damages resulting from such constructions would cut triple a burden that is already unbearable and defeat the purpose of any legislation looking to flood control. The State of Louisiana can not meet these conditions, nor should it be expected to put up one cent toward controlling a river that belongs to the Nation and that is the drainage ditch of 31 States. We have reached the limit of our financial endurance. We have expended $290,000,000 in an earnest effort to save life and property, only to find that conditions grew worse year by year, and we are told by our engineers that unless this flood-control problem is solved, the worst is yet to come. In 1794 a 3-foot levee gave ample protection at New Orleans. To-day an 18-foot levee keeps the inhabitants of that city in fear and trembling in times of flood. We are the victims of the march of progress. The development of the 31 States above us has made our burden unbearable. There are no longer any natural reservoirs to withhold the flood waters and let them down on us gradually. Lands have been reclaimed, forests have been depleted of their trees, and the lands upon which they grew drained and placed in cultivation. Every improvement in that vast territory between the Rocky and Allegheny Mountains has been reflected in the constantly increasing flood heights in the Mississippi River. This water must enter the Mississippi on its course to the Gulf, and if we owe this servitude to one-half of the Nation, then certainly the problem of so regulating this servitude as to save both life and property is a national one, the cost of which should be borne, as a matter of justice and equity, by the Government alone.

During the disastrous flood of 1927 the President made this statement:

We propose to solve the problem of flood control so that such a situation may never again have to be met.

Speaking at St. Louis, Secretary Hoover said:

I believe the whole of the United States is unanimous in that we must undertake such engineering works as will give security, not only now but for the future.

Who are "we," if it be not the Nation?

Both the President and his Secretary of Commerce spoke with authority, because the Nation is thoroughly aroused, and the demand that this calamity shall never again occur is, as Secretary Hoover puts it, "unanimous."

Every organization of any importance in this country has spoken. The American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the farm organizations have all declared and gone on record as favoring absolute control of the flood waters of the Mississippi, and this without local contribution.

In the settling of the debts of our allies growing out of the late World War, we dealt with them upon their "capacity to pay." This was done in order that these countries might recover from the devastating effects of the war and that they might be rehabilitated. Are we to show less consideration to our own people? We have reached the limit of our "capacity to pay." Even with the Government assuming the entire burden, we will be paying taxes on outstanding indebtedness, expended on flood-control work, for the next 40 years.

Mr. Chairman, attempts will be made to amend this bill when it reaches that stage in legislative procedure. Let me express the hope that this House will stand by the action of its committee and not adopt amendments that will defeat the purpose of this legislation.

The duty and obligation of this Government to protect the lives and property of its people is unquestioned. Let us assume this obligation, respond to the sentiment of the country, and by passing this legislation show that this Government is in reality a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." [Applause.]

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is only half an hour since I arrived from the city of New York. During that time I had the privilege of listening to the closing speech of my distinguished friend and colleague [Mr. LAGUARDIA], as well as the remarks of my confrere, Congressman JACOBSTEIN, of Rochester. I had no desire whatsoever to participate in the debate that has been going on here relative to the flood control of the Mississippi. However, the colloquy between Congressman JACOBSTEIN and Mr. LAGUARDIA prompts me to give the House certain information which might be of interest to the membership of this historic body.

The district I represent is the fourteenth congressional district of New York City. It is one of the most crowded and congested districts in the city of New York. During the years 1916 to 1920 it was represented by my good friend Mr. LAGUARDIA. To-day I have the honor to represent it not as its master, but as the servant of its wishes.

A month before Congress convened I sent out a questionnaire, containing nine questions, to all the voters of my district asking my fellow citizens how they would like me to vote on these vital matters affecting the public welfare. One of these questions appertained to flood control through the agency of the Government of the United States. Ladies and gentlemen of the House, I want to say to you in all sincerity that there was not a man or woman who responded to this questionnaire but who answered in favor of giving a helping hand to the people of our Southern States, who have been afflicted with this terrible catastrophe in this their greatest hour of need and sympathy. [Applause.]

The individual States of our Union are comparable to the organs of the human body. When one organ is diseased, the others suffer. So with our States. The social, the economic, the industrial interests of one State affect the other. One is dependent upon the other for its happiness, for its success, for its welfare, and for its prosperity. Coming therefore from one of the largest working districts in the city of New York, representing every class, creed, and color, men and women who toil and struggle in the quarries of life, I feel I have the right as their spokesman and as their servant to state to you gentlemen of the House that the sympathy of the great East Side of New York, the working people, who labor and toil by the sweat of their brow; that they are with you in your desire to improve your economic condition through the prevention of future floods and are desirous of being recorded as anxious to help you so that the tempests of the future, their rain, flood, and storm, shall never again visit their ravages upon your home, upon your fireside, and upon your farms. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman incorporate in the RECORD the questionnaire, so we may have an opportunity to know just what the people of the gentleman's district voted for, and whether they had this bill before them or some other proposition? There are many of us who are in favor of helping the southern people, but there is a difference of opinion as to the method of helping them.

Mr. SIROVICH. I shall be pleased to discuss the question of help the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of, for a minute or two.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I can not answer two questions at the same time. If Mr. SCHAFER will allow Mr. LAGUARDIA to ask the question——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman conceded he did not hear my speech.

Mr. SIROVICH. I only heard the end of it.

Now, regarding the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. The question before the House, as I understand it, is, Should the Government of the United States pay the complete expense of the flooded area of the Mississippi, so that the flood should never return again; or should the local communities along the Mississippi River be assessed in part to defray this expense.

Knowing the condition of the poor farmers of the South, realizing their suffering, their trials, their tribulations, and the vicissitudes incident to the destruction of their homes, their farms, their livestock, and the products of nature, representing a working group of people that are in sympathy with the ideals of the farmers of our country, I know I represent the sentiments of the people of the fourteenth congressional district of New York City when I say to you, That the Government of the United States, the most prosperous Nation in the world, should consider it a privilege, yea, an honor, to pay all the expenses of the poor farmers of the South, so that they could be protected against the ravages of nature in the future and live in happiness, in contentment, enjoying the blessings of life and the reward that comes to those who till the soil to reap the harvest of their labor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in reference to the Sacramento River flood-control project. It is embodied in section 14 of the bill. I regret that the gentleman from California, my colleague Mr. CURRY, who for so many years has been associated with the project, is unable to be here and speak for it instead of myself.

The practical question presented to the House as to this project is as to what should be the equitable and just contribution as between the Federal Government and the State and local interests. The present law provides, in effect, that the Federal Government is responsible for one-sixth of the cost of the project. The State and landowners are responsible for five-sixths of the cost. The proposal embodied in this bill is that the Federal Govenment assume one-third of the cost of the project, the State one-third, and the owners the remaining one-third.

We might consider the Sacramento watershed as illustrated by this Hall. The Sacramento River flows south through the valley 250 miles over a plane practically as level as a floor. On the east side is a mountain range with an average elevation of 4,000 feet and many peaks as high as 8,000 feet. On the west side is another mountain range with an average elevation of one to four thousand feet, while at the head of the valley is a mountain range from two to ten thousand feet high.

This is a land of large rainfalls. The result is that after a rainstorm, within 24 hours the water rushes from the mountains into the valley, and although the watershed is small the flow of the Sacramento River is 600,000 cubic feet per second at the mouth of the river.

This stream flows on a ridge through this great valley. Much of the way the river is 20 feet higher than the valley on each side. There would be no river in the channel if it were not for the protection works that have been constructed along this main channel. There are about 1,100,000 acres in the flood area which are covered with water at times when we have had severe floods. In addition to that amount, over 200,000 acres are in by-passes which help to drain the water to the San Francisco Bay.

Flood control in the Sacramento Valley was greatly complicated by the fact that following a few years after the first gold rush to California a system of hydraulic mining was practiced by which mountains were literally torn away and conveyed down stream. Engineers have estimated that the quantity of débris thus moved down the Sacramento River and its tributaries was equal to seven times the total excavations in building the Panama Canal.

The result was that the bed of the stream filled up 10 feet, and in some places as much as 19 feet, and part of this débris was moved as much as 250 miles to San Francisco Bay. Navigation was practically destroyed and the valley was every now and then overflowed by a destructive flood. In 1893 an attempt was made to take care of this situation.

The California Débris Commission was appointed to consist of three Army engineers, to devise plans for providing for navigation and control of floods. The project was accepted as a cooperative one between the State and Federal Government. During the 17 years that followed an effort was made to dam this débris with the hope that the stream would scour out the rest of the débris below that, and provide navigation and take care of the floods. That plan failed. Then a plan of dredging the river was adopted, and after a brief trial that was shown to be a failure. It was not until 1910 that a successful plan was adopted. That is the plan now under construction. That plan proposed that the State and local interests assume two thirds of the cost and that the Federal Government assume the other third. Certain definite work was assigned to the Federal Government on this basis. Shortly following the publication of this report, the California Legislature, assuming the report would be adopted, provided legislation under which the landowners could be legally assessed through taxation for their part of the flood-control works. A system of assessment was prescribed under which the lands benefited were to pay in proportion to their benefits. The legislature also made provision for the State assuming its proportion of the liability. The plan of the débris commission was later modified and adopted by Congress.

The Sacramento flood-control project was adopted in the act of 1917, together with Mississippi flood-control legislation. Under the plan as adopted the contribution of the Federal Government was reduced to one-sixth of the cost, with a specific limit of $5,600,000. Landowners had to accept what the act of 1917 provided. In 1925 the California Débris Commission again reported in favor of the division of responsibility, substantially in accordance with the original report of 1910. Several years' experience had demonstrated that the contribution required from the landowners was out of proportion to the benefits they received and more than could justly be required of them.

In the next place, I might say that the Sacramento River carries a commerce of over 1,250,000 tons per year, with an average value of over $75,000,000 per year.

There are five distinct features of the flood-control plan of the Sacramento Valley. The first is channel enlargement. One-half of that cost was to be paid by the Federal Government, and one-half by the State. River levees were to be built and 520 miles of river levees have been constructed. Some of them are 30 feet high, but the average height is 20 feet. They have been constructed at local expense. Weirs were constructed, so that the surplus waters might escape from the stream and run down these side channels instead of breaking through the main channel and destroying navigation and the channel. Those weirs were constructed by the United States. One of the most effective parts of the control of the Sacramento River is the by-passes. The Sacramento River has a capacity in its own channel to carry only one-fifth of these flood waters. In other words, when we have a flood in the Sacramento Valley, five-sixths, and in some places seven-eighths, of the water flows down the by-passes instead of in the central stream. Those by-passes are from 2,000 feet to 14,000 feet wide, so that we have a river in the by-pass from five to eight times the size of the main river. The flowage rights in the by-passes are furnished at local expense. There are 190 miles of levees along these by-passes. There are built by local contributions. There are also levees for short distances up certain tributaries that enter the Sacramento River. This is the scheme as it is provided to-day. The Federal Government's cost of this project was limited specifically to $5,600,000. Since that estimate was made in 1910 the total estimated cost of the project has increased from $33,000,000 to $51,000,000. The plan proposed is that the Federal Government shall assume one-third of that cost, which is a little over $17,000,000. The landowners in that project have contributed over $22,000,000. It was originally estimated that $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 would be their total cost.

The project to-day is only 60 per cent completed. The burden is so heavy on many of these landowners that the California Débris Commission reports that the burden on those landowners is unjust and beyond the benefits they receive, and that it is doubtful if the plan can be completed unless those landowners are relieved of part of the responsibility that now rests upon them. At the present time the State and landowners are paying five-sixths of the cost of this project. The landowners in this flood area in the Sacramento Valley have paid and obligated themselves to pay $100,000,000 to pay for and utilize those 1,100,000 acres of land. Much of that expense, of course, is for protective works not part of the project, but necessary to realize their benefits from the plan. The result is that they are now so burdened that they are unable to go ahead and contribute to the increased funds necessary to complete the plan.

We people of California will be satisfied with the two-thirds contribution required of California and the landowners under the provisions of this bill. There is a special benefit to landowners by reason of this protection for which they are able and willing to pay. Neither do we find fault, as intimated we might, with the more favorable terms provided for the Mississippi. Doubtless the circumstances of the Mississippi vary from those of California. We are satisfied to assume that portion of the expense which our people are able and willing to pay as a just liability.

I understand that negotiations are being carried on looking toward a compromise as to contributions from the Mississippi Valley. The primary consideration as to the Mississippi is to see that the work is done and done well. One year has passed since the Mississippi flood. No new plan has been adopted. No plan of making an economic survey as to the equity of local contributions should delay the progress of the work. Our experience with the excessive contributions against the landowners in California suggests that no plan of oppressive contributions should be adopted for the Mississippi. If any contributions are agreed upon, they should be confined to cases where the special benefits conferred by the improvement are equal to any assessments that may be imposed.

We people of California are in sympathy with the early and complete protection of the Mississippi Valley. We desire to support this and any supplementary proposals that may be offered to legitimately accomplish that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the people of the district that I have the honor to represent fully appreciate the seriousness of the Mississippi flood disaster, and desire that their Representative vote for adequate legislation and appropriation to prevent its recurrence. I have carefully listened to the debate on the floor of this House, and I am at a loss to understand just where some of the Members who have spoken stand on the legislation.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] delivered a splendid oration for one hour in which he criticized my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] for opposing the bill as reported by the committee, and yet the gentleman himself opposed the provisions of section 4. I hope this House will carefully consider amendments which will be offered, so that we will pass a bill that will be satisfactory to the entire membership. I have a great deal of faith in the Engineer Corps of the Army. The Army engineers have demonstrated their ability in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Some of the previous speakers lauded the mayor of the city of Chicago, Mr. Thompson, who came down to Washington with a number of special trains filled with people in favor of "flood relief" and led by brass bands. The unofficial hearings at which the Thompson caravan testified do not contain any facts which would be useful to solve the flood-control problem, as nearly all the "testimony" presented consisted of vague generalities or the singing of praises of Mayor Thompson of the great city of Chicago.

Mr. Chairman, we must consider this flood-control question from a great many angles.

The creating of adequate levees and spillways alone will not solve this problem. We must consider the reforestation and the building of reservoirs in the upper river and tributaries, to impound and regulate the waters which flow into the valley. We must also consider the diversion of waters from other bodies, such as the diversion from Lake Michigan by the Chicago Sanitary District which not alone lowers the lake level to the detriment of shipping interests, the municipalities, and people of the Great Lakes district, but also to no small degree contributed to the increase of waters in the Mississippi and its tributaries, thereby being a contributing factor to the recent flood disaster.

Mayor Thompson, of Chicago, who has spent a great deal of his time fighting King George of England at long range has been in the forefront of the forces responsible for this diversion and its continuance. If Mr. Thompson really wants legislation to prevent a recurrence of the recent disaster, he should bend his efforts toward stopping the diversion of water from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago. [Applause.]

I shall vote for the pending bill if certain amendments are incorporated, some of which will be offered by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. I am in favor of flood relief, but opposed to pork-barrel legislation and unwarranted raids on the Treasury in the name of flood relief.

I realize that each individual Member can not carefully study every angle of all of the legislation pending in Congress. My colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is a member of the committee which considered this legislation. He has spent a great deal of time and effort in its consideration. I shall look, for leadership and information, to my distinguished colleague [Mr. FREAR] and the Chief of Engineers of the Army, rather than to those who will reap large and unwarranted financial benefits from the enactment of the bill as reported by the committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 3740) for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on Senate bill 3740.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks upon this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I have the distinguished honor of representing in this House the eleventh congressional district of the great State of New York.

The eleventh district embraces the lower part of Manhattan, which is a part of the old city of New York, Staten Island, known as the Borough of Richmond, an integral part of the city of New York, Governors Island, Bedloes Island, and Ellis Island, in the bay of New York.

While the people of this district are far removed from any part of the Mississippi River flood area, I assure you they are sincerely sympathetic with and interested in Senate bill 3740, now under discussion in the House, and which is designed to forever prevent a recurrence of the horrible disaster of 1927.

I am not in favor of some of the provisions of this bill but will support it and vote for its passage.

It was in the eleventh district I first saw the light of day. I have never lived elsewhere. Having been in close personal contact with its people all my life I believe I know them.

Its electorate is perhaps the most heterogeneous of any political subdivision in the United States and is therefore the most interesting. Its daily turnover in business far exceeds that of any other like area in the world, therefore it stands out and must be considered the most important.

Staten Island, or the Borough of Richmond, the lower portion of the district, is one of New York City's fastest growing boroughs. It has a population of nearly 150,000, 70 per cent of which own and occupy their own homes. It is essentially a borough of homes. It forms a part of the gateway to New York Harbor and the Nation. It was first discovered by the Florentine explorer Verrazano for France in 1524, and later by Hendrik Hudson for the Netherlands in 1609. At about that time it was settled by the Dutch and the Huguenots and its claim to fame was established.

George William Curtis once said, "God may have made a more beautiful place than Staten Island but he never did." To-day it is one of New York City's greatest assets.

Its people have ever been God-fearing, patriotic, thrifty, and progressive. During the days of the Civil, Spanish-American, and World Wars, its quota of fighting men was furnished in almost inconceivable time. They excel in community spirit and enthusiasm, leading to good citizenship. They are generous to a fault when the call comes. They are tolerant. They love their neighbors, their homes, and their country. They are in sympathy with their suffering fellow Americans of the Mississippi River States in this hour of their misfortune.

The upper or northern portion of the eleventh district includes Bedloes Island, famous for its Statue of Liberty, a gift of France, facing the gateway of the Nation at the entrance to New York Harbor to welcome the newcomer to our shores.

Just north of Bedloes lies Ellis Island where the alien first steps foot on the land of freedom and just beyond Ellis one finds the historic Governors Island fortified years ago for the protection of New York City against enemy forces.

The southerly end of Manhattan Island (the old city of New York) from Fourteenth Street to the Battery on the west, and from Market Street to the Battery on the East Side completes its boundary lines.

This portion of the district presents the greatest range and variety of racial groups and business enterprise, more, perhaps, than any similar area in the world.

It is here we see the "melting pot" of the Nation. It is here one public school, whose capable principal is Mr. Joseph T. Griffin, a brother of my colleague Mr. GRIFFIN of New York, boasts of having on its rolls the children of more than 28 distinct nationalities. It is here the toiler in the trades educates and Americanizes his family, and as success and prosperity crown his efforts he moves on to make room for another. Within this part of the district there is a population of approximately 150,000 people.

Men, women, and children who thrive on the opportunities offered in this land of liberty whose statue they can see from their homes. Men, women, and children of understanding inculcated in them by the hard knocks received in the school of experience. Men, women, and children whose hearts overflow with sympathetic affection for those in distress and for those overtaken by misfortune and disaster regardless whether it be those of their own community or beyond it. Men, women, and children who during the stress of war and in times of peace have ever been real red, white, and blue Americans.

Devastation, destruction, disaster, and death followed in the wake of the Mississippi flood of 1927.

From Arkansas to Louisiana the raging waters carried human beings, domestic animals, homes, outbuildings, bridges; in fact, everything in its path to destruction. The human suffering and anguish was indescribable—the personal losses were incalculable. The sympathetic interest of the whole Nation was aroused. The Red Cross Society performed, perhaps, its greatest service in this disaster.

Had this bill been before Congress at that time I doubt if there would have been a single vote cast in opposition. But there is opposition—there seems to be a question of its national status. It has developed, however, in this debate that 31 of the 48 States contribute directly or indirectly to the flow of water in the Mississippi River. It therefore appears to be a national responsibility—a responsibility which is ours—a problem to be solved by Congress. Seven hundred thousand people were driven from their homes. Think of it! They were made objects of charity overnight, dependent upon the Red Cross Society and other agencies for food and clothing. Eighteen thousand square miles of land were inundated; 1,500,000 farm animals and cattle were destroyed—land was laid bare and ruined for farming purposes—all causing a total loss of many hundreds of millions of dollars. Is it a national problem? Certainly it is. Should we solve it? Of course we should. The provisions of the bill have been ably discussed. I will not discuss them. It is not a perfect bill. Some of the objectionable features will undoubtedly be removed by amendment. But the bill has merit. It should pass with some changes. The prevention of future national disasters is a national problem which should be solved by the National Government.

I have discussed the provisions of the bill with the men on the street, with the big business man, and the small business man. In the eleventh district big and little business abound—Wall Street and the great banking and financial corporations are located in the heart of it. Every known trade and business in the country is represented here. Here the largest business turnover in the Nation is made every working-day in the year.

The trans-Atlantic and coastwise shipping port along the Hudson and East Rivers is largely located in my district. Great steamships arrive and depart daily with their cargoes of passengers and freight which has been gathered from the production plants, mills, and factories of every State in the Union for shipment to foreign countries and coastwise ports. There are thousands of smaller business men represented by the retailers and storekeepers everywhere throughout the district. I have discussed this question with many of them from the executive heads to the man on the street; and they are in agreement that it is a national problem.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois, in order that the membership of the House may have some information on the subject, since I have had a number of inquiries about it to-day, when it is hoped to reach a vote on this bill?

Mr. REID of Illinois. In view of the unanimity of intention to offer amendments, I do not know, but I think we will begin reading the bill on Friday.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. When do you expect you will arrive at a vote on the bill in the House of Representatives?

Mr. TILSON. That will depend on the number of amendments offered and the amount of debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Do I understand, then, that you hope to arrive at a vote on this bill by Saturday?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I hope so.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. You expect to do that?

Mr. TILSON. I expect so, and I shall urge all I can in that direction.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I understood there was some arrangement being made by certain gentlemen, including the gentleman from Connecticut, whereby they hoped to reach an agreement not later than Monday.

Mr. TILSON. I have heard nothing of it. What the gentleman states is news to me, because I can assure him that his statement is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then you expect to vote on the bill on Saturday?

Mr. TILSON. That is the expectation, and I suppose the gentleman from Illinois agrees with me.

Mr. REID of Illinois. I follow my leader.

HAWAII, A TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain correspondence that passed to and fro between the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. HOUSTON] and myself concerning Hawaii, one of our Territories.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting certain correspondence between himself and the Delegate from Hawaii on the subject of Hawaii. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to insert correspondence which has passed to and from Hon. V. S. K. HOUSTON, Delegate to Congress from Hawaii, and myself. The contention of the Delegate from Hawaii is quite sound and it is wrong to classify Hawaii in any way other than that of a Territory of the United States.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1928.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I note from the RECORD of yesterday that during the debate on the legislative appropriation bill you were yielded 10 minutes by Congressman SANDLIN for the purpose of making some remarks on foreign investments made by American banks.

In the figures that you have inserted there appears a paragraph headed "American financing of her Territories," in which there is a confusion of Territories and possessions, in fact, you use the terms "Territorial possessions" in two places. Then there is listed in the tabulation under the term "Country" both Alaska and Hawaii.

I must protest most energetically against the confusion that follows as a consequence of any classification that would list the organized Territory of Hawaii along with the possessions under the American flag. By decision of the United States Supreme Court, Hawaii is an integral part of the United States, and therefore any classification, be it only for convenience, which segregates Hawaii under the general heading of "foreign investments" is wholly wrong and liable to do damage to the interests of the Territory, which I have the honor to represent in Congress.

I ask that you will be so good as to have reference thereto made, because it is all too common for the mistake to be made of confusing the possessions, which are not in fact integral parts of the United States, with the two Territories of the United States, Alaska and Hawaii, which, in effect, are integral parts of the country.

Very sincerely yours,

V. S. K. HOUSTON,
Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

APRIL 14, 1928.

Hon. V. S. K. HOUSTON,
Delegate to Congress from Hawaii,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I believe your point is well taken that the Territory of Hawaii is really an integral part of the United States. However, before making the change in the RECORD I would like to have the citation of the decision of the Supreme Court to which you refer, after the receipt of which I shall be pleased to insert in the RECORD the appropriate change, and along with it pertinent portions of that decision.

I accepted the classification of loans as given me by the Department of Commerce and simply inserted them in the RECORD as received.

Very truly yours,

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 16, 1928.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CELLER: In reply to your letter of April 14 asking for the citation of the decision of the United States Supreme Court as to the Territory of Hawaii, may I quote you the following:

"In 1903 the Supreme Court of the United States decided unanimously in the case of Hawaii v. Mankichi (190 United States Supreme Court Reports, 197) that Hawaii had been incorporated as an 'integral part of the United States.'"

Several opinions were announced, but on this point the only difference of opinion was as to when such incorporation became complete.

Chief Justice White, speaking for himself and Justices Harlan, Brewer, and Peckham, said, among other things, referring to the McKinley treaty and the joint resolution accepting its terms:

"The preamble of this treaty expressed 'the desire of the Government of the Republic of Hawaii that those islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof and under its sovereignty,' and that the governments 'have determined to accomplish by treaty an object so important to their mutual and permanent welfare.'"

(See p. 224; also separate opinion of Justice Harlan, p. 227; also p. 225: "By the resolution the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands became complete and the object of the proposed treaty, that 'those islands should be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof and under its sovereignty,' was accomplished.")

The above is from the Revised Laws, from page 142, Bill of Rights, Chapter XVII, of 1925, entitled: "Decision of the United States Supreme Court concerning the status of Hawaii in the Union."

Besides the above decision, the United States Congress in providing for the organic act creating the Territory of Hawaii passed the following specific section:

"SEC. 5. That the Constitution, and except as herein otherwise provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States."

That there is a basic difference between the organized Territories and the possessions should be evident from the fact that the Federal income tax laws are applicable in the Territories but not in the possessions. Customs duties collected in the Territories go to the Federal Treasury, but in the possessions go to the island treasuries.

I believe the above fact should be sufficient to support the position taken by the Territory in the matter.

With kindest regards,

V. S. K. HOUSTON,
Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

APRIL 16, 1928.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
Secretary of Commerce, Commerce Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On Friday, April 13, 1928, the Hon. EMANUEL CELLER, Member of Congress, in a speech on the floor of the House commenting on foreign loans, made use of a report from the Department of Commerce of recent date, quoted on pages 6445–6446, in which the organized Territories of the United States are classed under the heading of foreign securities and foreign finance.

I append for your ready reference copies of my correspondence with the Speaker on the subject.

I most earnestly protest against the continuance of the above classification. The inclusion of possessions under the heading "Territories" in the first place is conducive to the subsequent errors. The paragraph of page 6446 headed "America financing her Territories" makes use of the term "Territorial possessions." It is probably as a consequence of such terms that the erroneous inclusion of "organized Territories" followed.

May I not remind the department that Hawaii by a unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court is an "integral part of the United States," and that by section 5 of the organic act passed by the Federal Congress, the Constitution, and except as herein otherwise provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States.

I had the occasion to bring a similar matter to the notice of the department by my letter of January 25, 1928, in which I referred specifically to the census of agriculture.

May I not hope that appropriate steps may be taken throughout the department to assure correct classification in all matters referring to Hawaii, so that (a) Hawaii as a Territory may not be confused with a possession, (b) Hawaii as an integral part of the United States may be included as under a domestic—not foreign—heading?

Very respectfully,

V. S. K. HOUSTON,
Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like permission of the House to include in my remarks on the flood control bill a resolution passed by seven large business organizations in reference to the pending measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, my purpose in asking your attention at this time is to read a resolution adopted by seven organizations of St. Louis on the subject of flood control. Included in the membership of the organizations will be found the name of practically every large business concern in St. Louis, as well as the largest taxpayers of my city.

These men represent the great industries for which St. Louis is famous, and I might add at least 80 per cent of them have voted the Republican ticket in the past. They are ready to do their share toward carrying out the provisions of such flood-control legislation as may be enacted. The resolution follows:

Whereas flood control on the lower Mississippi is a matter of the utmost importance and of the greatest urgency not only to the Mississippi Valley region but to the entire country, a matter which involves the economic welfare as well as the humanitarian obligations of the Nation, and which lays upon the Government of the United States an exclusive and inescapable responsibility: Be it

Resolved, That the undersigned organizations representing the business interests and activities of the city of St. Louis convey to the President of the United States and the Members of Congress their firm conviction that the problem is one which the United States Government alone can solve; that any division of responsibility is impractical and can only serve to impede the effort; and that it is essential to the expeditious and effective completion of the great work immediately necessary for the alluvial valley between Cape Girardeau and the Gulf that the Federal Government assume the full obligation the situation imposes; that in view of the magnitude and extraordinary expense of the undertaking it is highly important that the best engineering talent of the country be called upon for the primary determination of the plan, and to that end civilian engineers of the highest competency should be associated with the engineers of the Army and river service; and, finally, it is above all important in the emergency which unquestionably exists affecting such a large proportion of the country, that this pressing need for constructive and comprehensive flood-control legislation at this session of Congress be not jeopardized or endangered by a failure to consort and agree upon the major relief principles; and be it further

Resolved, That in view of the fact that flood control is a to-day need of the Mississippi Valley, that the Representatives in Congress be earnestly urged to insist upon the passage of a measure in which the general principles herein set forth are given concrete expression, and that his excellency the President of the United States be memorialized in the highest interests of our country to continue his assistance in every possible manner toward the effective working out of flood-control relief now.

SENATE

THURSDAY, April 19, 1928

Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, Thou God of hope, praise be to Thee for the hope that lives with us and for the hope that is set before us, for the assurance through faith both in things seen and temporal and in things unseen and eternal.

We thank Thee that we as a nation may calmly face the future now we have proved the past; that under Thy teaching we have learned that patience worketh experience and experience hope.

Grant, O God, that Thy love may be spread abroad in our hearts through the Holy Ghost which is given us. Keep undimmed the bright skies of hope that shine upon our brave young Nation. Teach us that naught can shadow our far-flung horizon, beckoning to still happier and more glorious days, save sin, which is the ruin and shame of every people. Save us from sordid manhood and besoiled womanhood, from the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life.

And may the God of hope fill us with all joy and peace in believing that we may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the other day when the migratory bird bill was before the Senate I stated that the game warden of Maryland was opposed to the $1 license fee. I had had a talk with him, and he stated that he was for the purposes of the bill, but, as I understood it, he was not particular about raising the money in that way. I have a letter from him this morning in which he states that I must have misunderstood him. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF MARYLAND,
CONSERVATION DEPARTMENT, GAME DIVISION,
Baltimore, Md., April 18, 1928.

Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: I have been informed that on April 17 there was an amendment offered to the game refuge bill, S. 1271, to eliminate the $1 license feature, and provided for an appropriation by Congress of $1,000,000 for this work.

I understand that you, on the floor of the United States Senate, quoted me as having changed my opinion relative to the game refuge bill. I can not understand how you received this impression. As you are aware, you received a letter from me written on March 28 relative to this bill and requesting your support. I received a reply on March 29, and answered same immediately regarding same, at which time I stated if the $1 license feature was the only objection and would cause the defeat of the bill, and Congress would make the proper appropriation, I had no objection to same; however, still feel that the $1 license feature of the bill is very essential, and believe in placing the burden of financing conservation work on the shoulders of those who receive the benefit of same, and am sure the $1 license feature would more adequately finance the work required by this bill than the money which Congress would appropriate, as I do not believe Congress would make a sufficient appropriation annually, where, I am sure, the $1 license feature would bring in adequate revenue to take care of same.

Therefore, knowing you as I do, I am sure you did not intend to misquote me, but feel you have misunderstood me, and sincerely hope the game refuge bill, providing for the $1 hunters' license system, will be enacted into law and placed on the Federal statute books, thereby keeping our faith with Canada and placing the United States Government in a position to carry out their part of the treaty between the United States and Canada.

Assuring you of my sincere friendship and thanking you for your cooperation, I am,

Yours very truly,

E. LEE LeCOMPTE,
State Game Warden.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have here a letter from Mr. A. W. Lafferty, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and I also ask to have printed in the RECORD my reply to it.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, March 31, 1928.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A week ago to-day, March 24, you placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a letter written by me February 11, 1928, to G. Siegel & Co., Stuttgart, Germany, regarding the recent alien property legislation.

You said the letter was "filled with falsehoods" and that you thought it advisable to let the German owners interested know that "Mr. Lafferty is writing to his clients making a number of statements which are absolutely untrue."

I hereby denounce as untrue your accusations and ask that you offer this letter for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as my answer thereto.

When you were asked by a Senator to point out in detail wherein my letter was untrue, you failed utterly. You did no more than to read the first paragraph of my letter, wherein I claimed to have succeeded in my fight for an 80 per cent release for my clients, instead of a mere 60 per cent release, as was proposed in the bill reported by you in the first instance, and then your sole comment in refutation of my claim of success was as follows:

"The fact of the matter is that the House of Representatives agreed upon 80 per cent and there was no question in the minds of the members of the Finance Committee to change it in the least. Mr. Lafferty had nothing whatever to do with it."

Will you deny that last session the House also passed an 80 per cent bill and that your committee did change it and reported a 60 per cent bill? Such is the record.

Will you deny that I filed four major briefs and many smaller briefs before you and each member of your committee the past winter protesting against your committee taking the same action this session that it took last in regard to cutting the bill down from an 80 per cent bill to a 60 per cent bill?

Will you deny that I appeared personally before your committee in January, speaking longer than any other person at the public hearings, as the record will show, and that I there repeated my protests against cutting the bill down from an 80 per cent release to a mere 60 per cent release, as was done by your committee last session?

Just when did your committee make up its mind not to cut the bill down from an 80 per cent release to a mere 60 per cent release at the present session? And just why did your committee change its 60 per cent program of last session?

You say I had absolutely nothing to do with it. I ask you to state who did. And when did the change take place? If you will answer these questions, then you will be in a better position to point out, if you can, wherein my letter was "filled with falsehoods."

Personally, I do not care a snap of my finger for your accusations. But I served four long years in the very Congress of which you were then and now are a distinguished upper-branch Member, and I owe it to you and to every man who has ever served in Congress or ever will, and to my relatives now living and yet unborn, to refute your charge that I have signed my name to falsehoods. When I signed that letter I believed it was true, and I still believe it was absolutely and wholly true, and for that reason it was not a falsehood, even though I may have been grossly mistaken as to just what part I played, if any part at all, in changing your committee from the attitude it took last session for a mere 60 per cent release to its final attitude for an 80 per cent release.

You reported last session's bill, Senator SMOOT. Therefore it is conclusive that you favored only a 60 per cent release at that time. Just when did you, personally, change your mind, and why? I thought you changed—partly, at least—as a result of the more thorough and patient hearings you gave the subject this session, and I learn from your denunciation of my letter for the first time that "there was no question in the minds of the members of the Finance Committee" even suggesting a change this year from an 80 per cent release to a 60 per cent release. If you had given us that information before the hearings this year it would have saved a lot of time and work. But I can not yet see how that would have been possible, since five members of the Finance Committee are new this session and had never even heard the subject discussed before. And none of the older members had publicly made it known that they had undergone a change of mind from the 60 per cent commitment, not even yourself.

August 10, 1927, you were quoted in the press throughout Germany, in a dispatch from Washington, as follows:

"Senator SMOOT stated that the German properties would be returned, but he said the House bill providing for an 80 per cent release would have no chance to pass, and that under no circumstances would more than 60 per cent of the German properties be returned, and that the Finance Committee would stand firm for their last year's proposal."

Besides, the bill which you reported last session confiscated outright the interest on German moneys earned before March 4, 1923, a sum of more than $25,000,000. That was changed this year, and the owners are given certificates for that interest money. You were good enough to give me a personal hearing in your office this year on this subject, and at the public hearings the record shows that you requested me to repeat for the benefit of the full committee the arguments I had made in your office, which I did, citing a Supreme Court decision in favor of my contention. I appreciated your courtesy and patience more than I could express, and I wired and wrote all my clients of your great assistance. But if I had nothing whatever to do with the outcome of the bill, it seems to me that it were idle for you to have spent the time of yourself and your committee in the manner here shown.

The answer to this whole riddle is jealousy. I have very few German clients, but certain individuals imagine I have a great many, and they want these clients for themselves and their friends. Many efforts have been made in the past to take my few clients away from me but without success, except in a very few cases. I doubt not that the Siegel letter was handed to you by certain selfish individuals who hope to profit at my expense, and I was probably represented to you as claiming the credit for the work of yourself and your committee in order to stir your ire against me. If so, nothing could be further from the truth. The Senate Finance Committee and its chairman are entitled to all the credit for the 80 per cent release of seized private German property in America, in cash and kind, and 5 per cent interest-bearing certificates for the 20 per cent temporarily withheld to help pay American claims, so far as the bill as reported this year to the Senate and as it subsequently passed is concerned. No advocate, without the help of the committee, could do anything. The committee held the power, and the credit is all due the committee.

I did my best for my few clients. I am grateful to the Finance Committee and to the Senate and to Congress for what my clients will receive under the law, and I am satisfied. But I do not propose to rest under the charge of being the author of "falsehoods" either in connection with the long and arduous work that has been performed by all faithfully connected with it either during its performance or after its completion.

With all due regard, very truly yours,

D. W. LAFFERTY.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
April 18, 1928.

Mr. A. W. LAFFERTY,
510 Park Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. LAFFERTY: I am in receipt of your letter of April 7, 1928, in answer to my letter of the 5th.

I have been tied up night and day with the consideration of the pending revenue bill and for that reason you must excuse me for not answering your letter before this.

First, the statement to which I referred as being untrue, is as follows:

"You may have heard that I generated some warmth at Washington in regard to the alien property bill. I did, and if I had not done so the capital release would have been only 60 per cent this year instead of 80 per cent. I let the big American damage-award holders, as well as the big German shipping companies and banks, understand that unless my clients got at least an 80 per cent release this year I would point out to the Senate Finance Committee some of the weaknesses of the larger claimants on both sides. As a result, hearings were ordered before the Senate Finance Committee and the large American claimants then agreed to an 80 per cent release of capital at this session to all German property owners."

In justification of my statement I want to say to you that I, myself, had been convinced that the 80 per cent release of the property this year instead of 60 per cent, as provided in the Senate bill a year ago, was the proper thing to do. I had discussed it with other members of the committee before even the hearings began and I can truthfully say that a majority of the committee agreed to that proposition prior to the holding of hearings. In the hearings, however, we heard others on this subject besides yourself. This was done for the record and to secure, if possible, a united vote on the question.

The bill would have been reported to the Senate with the 80 per cent provision if you or any other witness had not appeared before the committee on the subject of the 80 per cent. So your statement that the 60 per cent program would have gone through except for the aggressive fight you put up at Washington for the upstanding German property claimants was not the truth.

You state that your strategy, which you believed would win before the Senate Finance Committee, did win. That is not the case.

You also state that they will receive 5 per cent interest-bearing certificates for the 20 per cent of their capital withheld, and they will receive also certificates for the interest earned by their custodianized cash prior to March 4, 1923, a period of five years, and that interest item will amount to another 20 per cent of the capital, and the last-named item would have been lost entirely this year to the German property claimants if it had not been for the hearings which you alone demanded and procured before the Senate Finance Committee.

This is another exaggerated statement, and I want to say not the truth.

I had a number of briefs on this same subject. It had been discussed between the committee and the Alien Property Custodian, and an expression had been made on the part of the committee against it on the basis that it would never amount to much, as it depended upon the German payments continuing for over 25 years.

If I remember correctly, when Senator KING offered this amendment on the floor of the Senate, I accepted it as chairman of the Finance Committee.

As stated in my letter to you of April 5, 1928, I shall have your letter of March 31, 1928, addressed to me, inserted in the RECORD together with this letter.

With best wishes, I remain, yours truly,

REED SMOOT.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask that the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LOCHER] be designated as a member of the following committees: Education and Labor, Post Offices and Post Roads, and Pensions, there being a vacancy on each of those committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. LOCHER be assigned to service on the following committees: Education and Labor, Post Offices and Post Roads, and Pensions.

INVESTIGATION OF SALT CREEK OIL LEASES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask to have the clerk read a Senate resolution which I send to the desk. Then I would like to have the judgment of the Chair as to whether it is necessary that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, since it is in the nature of an amendment to an existing resolution. I call the attention of the Chair to its reading. I ask that the clerk may read the resolution, and then I shall ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 202), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, or any subcommittee thereof, in addition to the authority conferred upon it by Senate Resolutions 282 and 294 in the Sixty-seventh Congress, and Senate Resolution 101 in the Seventieth Congress, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation as to the leasing of the oil lands in the Salt Creek field in the State of Wyoming, for the purpose of ascertaining whether said leases, or any of them, were illegal or fraudulent and whether the assigning of any such leases or the operation under said leases has given to any individual or corporation a monopoly in the production of oil, or whether the said leasing or assignment of leases or operation thereof has tended toward the creation or organization of any monopoly in the production of oil; and to ascertain and report to the Senate whether said leases, or any of them, are fraudulent and could or should be annulled or canceled by the United States Government; and, if the said leasing or the assignment of any of said leases or the operation thereof has been fraudulent or illegal or has resulted in a monopoly or tending toward a monopoly, to report to the Senate what, if any, legislation should be enacted by Congress for the purpose of curing such evils.

The authority conferred upon said committee by said Senate Resolutions 282 and 294 in the Sixty-seventh Congress and Senate Resolution 101 in the Seventieth Congress are hereby extended and continued for the purpose of the additional investigation herein provided for to the same extent and as fully as though they were incorporated herein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. After consultation with the parliamentarian, the Chair holds that since the resolution, if adopted, will create a charge against the contingent fund and provide for a new investigation, the resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I ask that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred.

UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Independent for April 14, 1928, written by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

SOUND POLICY TO BREAK THE BREAD LINES

I can not believe that it is just sentimental sympathy which has called forth so tremendous a response to the suggestion made in the United States Senate that the Nation begin to attack its unemployment problem. I might have ascribed it to the feeling of charity and human kindness if it were not for the fact that it has been taken up by hard and weather-beaten editors who are not ordinarily swayed by the soft emotion. There is something real and fundamental underneath the present unemployment problem which radically distinguishes it from the romantic episodes of the old General Coxey's army.

Unemployment to-day is of vastly greater significance than it was half a century ago, primarily for the reason that we have become a Nation of wage earners. First, the disappearance of the western frontier; second, the drift of population from the farm to the city; and, third, the growth and development of large corporate business have transformed a nation of independent enterprisers into a people largely dependent upon wages and employment for gaining a livelihood.

All the signs point to the continuance of these economic tendencies. Farm land is naturally limited in quantity, and the size of the tract which the farmer is capable of handling is, through the use of machinery, rapidly increasing. The farm is, consequently, bound to continue to send increments of population to the cities, there to seek industrial and commercial employment in competition with those displayed by machinery and the expanded productivity of labor.

Upon the availability of work and wages, therefore, depends the primary happiness of an ever-increasing proportion of the American people, and the periodic failure of work is the most vicious threat to their security. So far the problem has received but scant attention in the formation of our national economic policies. But in the economic life of every family it has long played a leading rôle. Even in times of plentiful employment, the fear of the loss of work haunts the hearth of every wage earner. It is a dread fear which can not be overcome by courage alone, for over it the worker has no control.

In its struggle for recognition as the major national problem, unemployment must overcome two dangerous attitudes, both of which have found expression in high places. The first is that doses of unemployment are healthful because they serve to teach labor "its place." It is almost superfluous to add that those who subscribe to this view are also of the opinion that the "place of labor" is very low. They look with disfavor upon anything which may enable labor to bargain more effectively for its fair and adequate share of the products of industry.

The second attitude that must be overcome is that which tearfully acknowledges the existence of unemployment and regretfully concludes that it must be so. Such a philosophy of inaction and despair is less malignant than the other, but no less dangerous. Its followers regularly preach the creed that unemployment must be allowed to adjust itself. Even if self-adjustment were to be expected, the question is, Who is to bear the great cost and the terrific losses during the period of adjustment? Are we going to continue to load that burden upon the shoulders of those least able to bear it? For a long time the total loss of industrial accidents was borne by the poor unfortunates who were injured, until workmen's compensation was conceived and the cost was transferred to the industry where it rightfully belonged. Incidentally, that has proved to be a great stimulant to the introduction of safety devices and safety methods. It may well be that a similar result would follow if industry were compelled to bear the cost of its seasonal and cyclical unemployment.

Self-adjustment is but an apologetic title for a do-nothing policy and for a condition of mental sterility. Only those who can complacently see poverty, misery, wretchedness, falling standards, and declining ideals will urge its adoption as a national policy.

How unemployment affects the man who is out of work is fairly well known. His savings are exhausted, his buying power destroyed, and his self-respect undermined. If the idleness is prolonged, not only he but his wife and children suffer actual want and privation until finally they submit to the humiliation of receiving charitable relief.

Is the man at work entirely free from the influence of unemployment? By no means. One of the grave dangers of slavery was that it subjected free workingmen to the unfair competition of slaves. That same unfair competition is inherent in the existence of a standing army of unemployed who are ready to accept employment at any price. It is the presence of this competition which makes the unemployment problem way and beyond more significant than the question of relief to the wageless men, for by causing competition with employed labor enforced idleness serves as a great lever to depress the standard of living of those employed, and to deprive them of any sense of security.

Both the man on the job and the man involuntarily idle look to their Government for protection, and the national welfare demands that it respond at least to the extent of taking the initiative in a campaign against unemployment that will give no quarter to the enemy. Those who are presumably speaking for the present administration are already busy at the task of comforting the public into its smug complacency toward unemployment, and thereby excusing their own failure of accomplishment in stemming the tide of idleness.

One Federal department announces that the presence of 1,000,000 who are out of work is "normal," and, therefore, nothing to be alarmed about. To my way of thinking, there is an unashamed callousness in the logic which reasons that because it is statistically "normal" for a million workers to be compelled to go without work and wages that, therefore, there is no ground for alarm. Do the families whose breadwinners belong to the unlucky million likewise feel that alarm is unwarranted? What peace of mind can the other workers enjoy when they know that, through no fault of theirs, they may be at any time drafted to join the ranks of the idle million? Fully to realize the significance of a statistical million of idle men imagination is necessary—imagination which can read into those digits the anxiety, the cruelly crushing anxiety which they record for a million homes.

The spokesman for another Federal department has declared that relief will come only from the creation of new industries, and he has appealed to the inventive genius of the Nation to exert itself in that direction. Here again a policy is laid down which is no policy at all. Instead of suggesting affirmative action, it relies on the hope that somehow invention will come at the right time and take up just the necessary amount of slack in the industrial machine. It is a truism that the development of new industries is desirable, but the far-reaching inventions and discoveries upon which new industries are founded come into being out of the untapped genius of mankind and do not at all respond to exhortation. No one can foretell when they will come. No one can frame a policy of unemployment relief which relies upon so uncertain a method of solution.

What a confession of defeat it is to admit that there is nothing we can do about unemployment. True enough, there is no ready-made panacea for sustained or periodic idleness, but certainly we shall never find a cure so long as we believe either that nothing can be done about it or that nothing should be done about it; in other words, so long as we despair of discovering a solution or rest upon the pious hope that all will be well. A policy of deliberate experimentation must be substituted for these prevailing attitudes.

The experiments must be along several lines: Increasing wages, thereby enlarging the purchasing power of the working population; decreasing hours to compensate for the expanding productivity of labor; distribution of the risk and burden of unemployment so as to minimize the hardship resulting from idleness; perfecting the channel between the workman and his job through a system of employment agencies; gathering of the pertinent information and data as to employment, unemployment, wages, and prices so as to permit business to be guided intelligently by reference to the facts, and the utilization of the tremendous spending power of government as a great balance wheel to stabilize the vibration of the entire industrial machinery.

These projects must be experimented with vigorously and with a zealous determination to eradicate joblessness. No such experiment will be undertaken or prove successful so long as those who are in charge of the laboratory are of the mind that all is well in our economic household.

CERTAIN OFFICIALS OF PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in accordance with the understanding reached several days ago, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2292) providing for the employment of certain civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands and fixing salaries of certain officials, being the bill which was introduced by the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Willis.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana objects to the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. McNARY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Has morning business been concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has been concluded.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator from Connecticut withhold his motion for just a moment in order that I may submit a report?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

(The report submitted by Mr. McNARY appears elsewhere in the RECORD under the proper heading.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2292.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the bill may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 29 of the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 29. That, except as in this act otherwise provided, the salaries of all the officials of the Philippines not appointed by the President, including deputies, assistants, and other employees, shall be such and be so paid out of the revenues of the Philippines as shall from time to time be determined by the Philippine Legislature; and if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries, the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor. The salaries of all officers and all expenses of the offices of the various officials of the Philippines appointed as herein provided by the President shall also be paid out of the revenues of the Philippines. The annual salaries of the following-named officials appointed by the President and so to be paid shall be: The Governor General, $25,000; in addition thereto he shall be entitled to the occupancy of the buildings heretofore used by the chief executive of the Philippines, with the furniture and effects therein, free of rental; vice governor, $15,000; chief justice of the supreme court, $10,500; associate justices of the supreme court, $10,000; auditor, $15,000; one assistant auditor, $7,500; one assistant auditor, $6,000: Provided, however, That no officer whose salary is so paid under this section shall receive either from the treasury of the Philippine Islands or from any other source whatever any additional salary unless specifically provided by law."

SEC. 2. That a new section is hereby inserted between sections 29 and 30 of the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands," approved August 29, 1916, as follows:

"SEC. 29½. That from and after the passage of this act all taxes levied, collected, and paid in accordance with law upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall, as heretofore, accrue intact to the general government of the Philippine Islands, and of the amounts so accruing the Governor General may, with the prior approval of the Secretary of War, expend not to exceed $125,000 per annum, without the necessity of further appropriation, for salary, travel, and other expenses of such civilian assistants and technical advisers, or such emergency assistants, as he may see fit to employ on contracts calling for whole-time or part-time service."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. I have a pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. I am informed that if present he would vote "yea" on this motion. I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON];

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. CARAWAY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 20, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2292) providing for the employment of certain civilian assistants in the office of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands and fixing salaries of certain officials, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions with amendments.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask that the committee amendments may be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the first committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the nature of this proposed legislation, and then I shall ask the Senate to permit to be heard concerning this matter representatives of the Philippine people who are without representation in this body.

The gist of the bill is in the first few lines. It provides:

That, except as in this act otherwise provided, the salaries of all the officials of the Philippines not appointed by the President, including deputies, assistants, and other employees, shall be such and be so paid out of the revenues of the Philippines as shall from time to time be determined by the Philippine Legislature—

That is a very sensible provision.

Then it continues:

and if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries, the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor.

That is to say, to that extent we propose to take out of the hands of the Philippine people the power to regulate their own affairs even with respect to the matter of appropriations for minor offices of the civil government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the Senator will find that that is the law at present. The only change made in the first paragraph is the change in the amounts of the salaries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, that is the matter of which we complain. We started in with a military government in the Philippines, and, pursuant to sound American principles, we got rid of that just as speedily as we could. The government then consisted of a commission appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, without any participation in the government on the part of the Philippine people.

Later on we established a legislature for the Philippines, the lower branch of the legislature consisting of members elected by the Philippine people themselves, the other branch consisting of members appointed by the President of the United States. When, however, Mr. Wilson became President in 1913 he recognized the right of self-government so far as to appoint a majority of the upper house from the Philippine people themselves; and then under the Jones Act, passed in 1915, the Philippine people were given the power to elect members of both branches of their legislature, and to regulate their own affairs just as we do our own affairs.

This bill attempts to fix the salaries of these officers, and provides that if the Philippine people do not make any appropriation, the thing goes on.

Mr. BINGHAM. But, Mr. President, those are the words of the Jones Act to which the Senator has just referred. There is no change in existing law in that respect. Did the Senator vote for the Jones Act when it became a law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I voted for the Jones Act.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then the Senator voted for the sentence to which he is objecting.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the statement of Mr. GUEVARA, Resident Commissioner of the United States from the Philippines, be read in explanation of the attitude of the Philippine people respecting this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the statement, and after having read for about 20 minutes——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this document be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I move that the further reading be dispensed with. There is not a Senator in this body listening to it. It is a great, long document, House committee hearings, I understand, and the reading is consuming time and no one is listening to it. What is the use in having it read at the desk? Why not print it in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [putting the question].

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for a division.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the question is voted on, I want to observe that the statement so far is a discussion by Mr. GUEVARA of the general principles which ought to control our legislation. He has not yet reached the specific discussion of the provisions of this bill, which commences on page 13. I trust, at least, that the Philippine people will have an opportunity to be heard with respect to the specific provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

On a division, the motion was rejected.

The clerk will continue the reading.

Mr. KING. I am very glad to know that there are only one or two Members of this body opposed to the Filipinos being heard.

Mr. HEFLIN. Nobody is opposed to their being heard. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	La Follette	Sheppard
Bayard	Frazier	Locher	Shipstead
Bingham	George	McLean	Shortridge
Black	Gerry	McMaster	Simmons
Blaine	Glass	McNary	Smith
Blease	Gooding	Mayfield	Smoot
Borah	Gould	Metcalf	Steiwer
Brookhart	Greene	Moses	Stephens
Broussard	Hale	Neely	Swanson
Bruce	Harris	Norbeck	Thomas
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Tydings
Caraway	Hawes	Nye	Tyson
Copeland	Hayden	Oddie	Vandenberg
Couzens	Heflin	Overman	Wagner
Curtis	Howell	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Cutting	Johnson	Ransdell	Warren
Dale	Jones	Reed, Mo.	Waterman
Dill	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.	Watson
Edge	Keyes	Sackett	Wheeler
Fess	King	Schall

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have just been advised that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] expected to address the Senate at this hour. In view of that fact, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the remarks of the representative from the Philippine Islands be suspended until the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will not the Senator couple with that a request that the matter may be inserted in the RECORD without being read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I would like to have those portions read which relate to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The senior Senator from Alabama will proceed.

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States provides that there shall be no "abridging of the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

The New York World on April 16, on the front page contained an article sent by a New York World correspondent who is now sojourning in Asheville, N. C. I suppose he accompanied Governor Smith to that beautiful and charming place. This man is named Frank L. Hopkins, staff correspondent of the World. The headlines read as follows:

HEFLIN'S fight on Smith hits official snag. Winston-Salem bars the use of courthouse as speaking place to lash New York executive. Asheville also likely to clamp lid on Senator.

Then the article reads:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., April 15.—"Just watch what TOM HEFLIN is going to do to Smith."

This was the word quietly passed around the anti-Catholic group of North Carolina last Friday when they saw the warm reception that Governor Smith received on his arrival at Biltmore. HEFLIN, they boasted, was going to follow Governor Smith into the State and after that the New Yorker might just as well go home. The Alabaman was advertised to speak at Winston-Salem.

Word came to-day that the commissioners of Forsyth County had denied to HEFLIN the use of the county courthouse in Winston-Salem as a speaking place. If he wants a hall he will have to go out and hire one. And while specific details are lacking there are strong intimations that he may have difficulty even then.

ASHEVILLE WON'T HAVE HEFLIN

The chairman of the county commissioners was quoted as saying this body was fully convinced that HEFLIN'S intention was to "injure the reputation of respectable citizens" and they did not propose to permit any public property to be used for that purpose. It is declared by those in the know in Asheville that Senator HEFLIN would have equal or greater difficulty in getting in here.

Mr. President, that is a remarkable statement coming from the Old North State by one who has gone down there with Governor Smith, of New York, taking the Tammany tactics with him and carrying the atmosphere of intolerance, bitterness, coercion, and intimidation. This suggestion comes without warrant. I dare say there is not a decent official in North Carolina who would sanction such a suggestion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the able Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think, after more than 45 years in politics in North Carolina, that I know very well the people of that State. Whatever may be said by partisans about their "intolerance," as a matter of fact there is not a more liberal-minded population in America than inhabits the State of North Carolina. I do not believe there is a word of truth in the statement that the board of commissioners of Forsyth County have indicated a purpose to deny the Senator from Alabama the privilege to speak in the courthouse. I do not believe that under any conditions the board of commissioners of any county in North Carolina would deny the eloquent Senator from Alabama that privilege, a Senator who has visited and spoken in North Carolina many times and never without delighting the people of the State. I believe that not only is the statement untrue as to Forsyth County, but I believe there is not a county in the State of North Carolina that would not heartily accord him or any other Senator in this body the use of its courthouse for the purpose of discussing any question that he might see fit to discuss, especially questions relating to public affairs.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I was sure that such a sentiment prevails among the people in that State which he and his noble colleague, Senator OVERMAN, so ably represent in the Senate.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just long enough to say that the most beautiful tribute that I have ever heard in my life to the people of the State of North Carolina was paid by the late Cardinal Gibbons, who at one time lived in that State, in an address which I heard on one occasion at the Hotel Rennert, in the city of Baltimore, when delivered by him before the Maryland Society of the State of North Carolina? Never have I known portrayed in more striking and effective terms the pure domestic lives and the general personal virtues of the people of North Carolina, with which I myself happen to be so well acquainted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I repudiate and scorn this newspaper man, and denounce and spurn those who inspired him to send such a misleading untruth and villainous statement to the New York World. I have made no plans to speak at Asheville. That Smith crowd there knew that. I have accepted an invitation to speak at Winston-Salem and at Durham, N. C., and I am going to speak at those two places.

My grandfather, Wyatt Heflin, was born in North Carolina, in Orange County, and, as one who has a right to speak for the old stock which helped to start that State upon the road which led to the high eminence which that great State occupies to-day, I say that this man Hopkins and those who inspired his statement insult the people of North Carolina when they send out a statement like that contained in the New York World, to the effect that the people of North Carolina are ready to indorse and employ the intolerant tactics employed by Tammany in New York City; when they do not want a speech made they prevent it by force.

Since this matter has arisen I am going to relate to the Senate and to the country an experience I had in the State of New York last summer. I was booked to speak at White Plains, N. Y., on the Mexican question just as I had discussed it in the Senate. The day before I was to speak there, being already in the State, having made one or two speeches, and being on my way to White Plains, I was notified that the janitor or superintendent of the State armory at White Plains, who held his position under Governor Smith, had told them that if I spoke in that hall and discussed the Mexican question he would lose his job, and that he would have to withdraw the permit for the people to use that hall for my speech. A patriotic American said, "Go and get the theater. Here is $200. I will pay the rent for the theater. I will not submit to this sort of thing. No such brutal and intolerant tactics will go here." He was told that the theater had been closed for two or three weeks and was undergoing repairs and that it was impossible to put it in order in time. I canceled the engagement and did not speak in White Plains, N. Y., over which State presides a man as governor who is seeking to be President of the United States.

Does that man believe in free speech? Does he believe in the first amendment to the Constitution? Does he believe in the right of peaceful assemblage? Does he believe in the right of petition to the Government of the United States? No! I hold in my hand another document written by the editor and publisher of The Fourth Estate, March 31, 1928, New York. The headlines read:

Reporter dismissed. Charles C. White discharged from New York Herald-Tribune for writing letter to Senator Nye involving Governor Smith in oil probe.

The only offense that this young man committed was daring to write to a Senator making some suggestion about a matter that was being investigated by the Government of the United States. I believe I know just what occurred. Knowing the tactics of that bunch as I do, I believe they went down to see this manager and editor and said, "If you do not fire that fellow we will boycott your paper." After a service of 25 years White was discharged because he ran amuck of the Roman Catholic political machine in New York State, the head of which is Gov. Alfred E. Smith, now visiting in North Carolina.

Senators, what do you think of a man and a governor who will permit such miserable and un-American tactics as these to be employed? I have waited until this time for him to repudiate that Hopkins statement sent out from Asheville, N. C., and to hear from him to the effect that Senator HEFLIN, so far as he was concerned, was at liberty to speak anywhere on any subject that he chooses to discuss. But no statement has come from him. No repudiation of this unwarranted and false statement has come from this ambitious man—Governor Smith—now visiting in Asheville, N. C. What would you think of the President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, if he were to permit those going with him on his tour or his vacation to put out a statement that a man who was going to speak in the State where he was visiting was going to speak and take issue with him on the things that he stands for, and therefore he will be refused a place in which to speak? What would you think if you heard that Calvin Coolidge had permitted a statement to go out that a hall would be denied the man to speak in, and that if he got a hall and paid for it, physical violence would be used upon him?

That is the threat against me, Senators, coming from Governor Smith's friends, who went with him from New York to Asheville, N. C. An American, born on her soil, nurtured at the breast of a Protestant mother, sired by a Protestant father, proud of the religion of both and of the tenets of the Constitution and the fundamental principles of my Government, I would be willing to die for the free institutions of America. And yet, this visit of Governor Smith is made to North Carolina for political purposes. We are told that the governor is down there resting. He is having a nice vacation. Can it be that they have determined that all discussion of matters in which the country is interested must and shall be suspended until Governor Smith's vacation is ended? I do not know whether he got an edict from the Pope to that effect or not. Sometimes the Pope's edicts vitally and injuriously affect American citizens. One of them which the Pope, or college of cardinals, at his instance, issued the other day vitally concerns my country. We have a proposition right now before the Senate to withdraw from Nicaragua our soldiers, who are down there defending and keeping in office Diaz, a Roman Catholic impostor and usurper. He has abolished half of the public schools and has turned the money over to Roman Catholic priests, who ride the streets of the capital city in the limousines of the government. Diaz's troops have retired to places of safety, while our boys are out fighting and dying in the mountain fastnesses of that far-away land.

The money of the Government of the United States is being poured out without stint or limit to carry out this ill-advised and unfortunate foreign program, while our soldiers down there are protecting the property of reckless investors who have gone in there from the United States and put their money in questionable and hazardous situations. This Government, without protest, has permitted an American citizen's property right here at home in the State of Rhode Island to be condemned and injured by a foreign power. This man is the owner and editor of an American newspaper. An order has been issued by the Pope of Rome demanding that he stop publishing his paper. Think of that! In a speech in the Senate last Friday I gave the facts about that case. This intolerant spirit is in the atmosphere around those who believe that the Pope is infallible. Governor Smith has carried that spirit with him to Asheville. It was with him in the governor's office when his appointee at White Plains, N. Y., denied American citizens the right to hear an American Senator tell of the Roman Catholic effort to get us in war with Mexico to restore the Catholic Church to power there.

Senators, the time is coming in this body—and it is not far distant—when there will be more Senators besides myself standing here calling attention to the dangerous and un-American activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. There will be more of them in the House over yonder standing up fighting to preserve in all its integrity this Government in its true American form. We have got this boasting, threatening, colossus in the country; this foreign political machine that now boldly presents its grim front to all public men and all others who aspire to office in the United States, and it says to them, "If you refuse to obey me, if you cross my path, I will destroy you." We have many public men in this country who are lacking in courage and backbone. They are afraid to open their mouths and say what they know ought to be said in order to protect and preserve our American rights and liberties.

What are we going to do, Senators? Are we going to tamely submit to those who would Europeanize our American institutions and make of our country a dumping ground for those foreigners whose plan and program is to completely change our form of government?

Are the principles of the American Government to remain in full force and effect—the pride and hope of liberty-loving Americans—or are the principles of the Roman Catholic government to triumph and be substituted here for the Government of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and McKinley?

These are the questions that confront us. When a bishop of the Catholic Church can take the names of sixty-odd American citizens from Rhode Island, as was done in the case to which I have referred, and carry them to the college of cardinals at the Vatican in Rome and try them in their absence and get a Roman tribunal to pass on their case, conclude it, and condemn them, and excommunicate them, while they are appealing in a court of justice in America asking that justice be done them as American citizens under the flag of the United States—when they can do that, Senators, and get away with it, this country is in a very precarious and dangerous situation. The question naturally arises which one of these governments has exclusive jurisdiction over all citizens in the United States? Watch the newspapers to-morrow. See how they report my speech. You will see some fair reports from some of the boys in the press gallery and some of the reports will not be fair; they will be very unfair.

They will say that Senator HEFLIN exhibited religious intolerance. They have said that many times before. It is not true. I have said before and I want to say again that I am willing for the Catholic to worship as he pleases; nobody will protect him more in that right than I will. If he wants to kneel and worship one way, in a manner entirely different and distinct from the way I worship, I am willing for him to do so. I believe in letting every human being worship God as his or her conscience dictates. I have no religious intolerance in my nature. I am not attacking religious freedom. I am defending it. I am attacking the miserable, insidious, and dangerous tactics of the Roman Catholic political machine. It has boldly and defiantly thrust itself into the political arena of the United States. We have got to combat it and conquer it if this Government is to continue in its present form. The issue is here. I repeat, Senators, that issue is here. The great Democratic Party of the country is threatened by the Irish World, a Roman Catholic newspaper.

It tells the Democratic Party that we have got to nominate Governor Smith, and with other Roman Catholic periodicals throughout the country boldly asserts that if we do not nominate him Roman Catholics will bolt the national Democratic ticket. What is the great Democratic Party going to do when such disgusting, miserable, and insulting methods are employed by those who tried to defeat the Democratic nominee for President in 1916 and 1924? When we consider the fact that this same Roman Catholic group did its best to defeat Woodrow Wilson for reelection in 1916 because he flatly refused to have American boys killed in a war with Mexico on behalf of the Catholic Church, do you wonder that real American Democrats resent such dictatorial and coercive tactics on their part? In view of the fact that Al Smith's bunch bolted John Davis in the last presidential election and delivered the Roman Catholic vote over to Mr. Coolidge, what is the Democratic Party now to do in its own convention with such recalcitrant and renegade political beings who call themselves Democrats?

Shall those who betrayed and left the Democratic Party then be permitted now to come in and take charge of the party and shape its future destiny?

What is the Democratic South to do—the Gibraltar of the Democratic Party, standing with head erect and light upon her face, the courageous and unintimidated Southland? A new, strange, and dangerous political doctrine has been carried from New York into the South by Governor Smith and his friends. The trail of intolerance and bigotry is over it all. From that beautiful, romantic, picturesque region of Asheville, amongst as brave and patriotic a people as ever breathed the breath of life, the strange doctrine enunciated by a Roman Catholic agent from New York, emanates "that HEFLIN, a United States Senator," called by the Democracy of North Carolina many times in the past to come and speak there—and I have never failed to respond and I will respond again—an Alabama Senator, an American Senator dare not come; he can not get a hall, and even if he does obtain one there will be serious trouble and disturbance there.

Think of such an announcement in this enlightened age in which we live.

Senators, little by little and bit by bit, that is the way a country loses its liberty; that is the way that great group of dear things you see out yonder got there. They are increasing in number every year. They are properly called "lost liberties." If the Pope's edict can destroy a man's property in Rhode Island; if he can sit in his Vatican in Rome, in a foreign government, and tell an American citizen "You can not publish your paper in the United States for another day," where is the constitutional right and liberty of that man as an American citizen? Our Constitution provides that a man shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law. That means American law, not Roman law; but here is a man being deprived of his property by having it destroyed under the American flag before his very eyes by the edict of the Pope of Rome.

What are you going to do about it, Senators? Day by day Governor Smith is having what is called his life story told in this little Washington News. That paper, of course, is getting a lot of "sweetening" in its coffee from the Roman Catholic political machine. He must be serving them ice cream and strawberry shortcake, and the like. They have got a story about him every day.

"Up from the streets," by Norman Hapgood and somebody else. The editor of the La Fayette Sun in my home town suggested the other day that after the primary it would be "Back to the streets by the pee-pul."

This little News has a story by a Roman pen pusher called Tracy. I do not know what all they are doing to Tracy, but what they have done to him is a-plenty. Some people would sell their soul for money; some people have no ear for music; the only thing that attracts their attention and charms their ear is the clink of dollars and dimes. They must have recently fed Tracy well. Tracy took his pen in hand, after the World correspondent, Hopkins, of New York, Governor Smith's friend, sent out from Asheville that misleading and untruthful statement. Tracy said:

> It is quite in keeping with Senator HEFLIN'S character that he should hit on the idea of going to North Carolina and insulting the Governor of New York, who is spending a vacation in that State, with his odious claptrap. It is also in keeping with the southern sense of propriety that he should be denied the use of the courthouse at Winston-Salem for such a purpose.

Mr. President, what influence caused this man on the Washington News to say such a thing? Why has that paper picked out Hoover for the Republicans and Al Smith for the Democrats? I will give you some information on those subjects jointly a little later on. They have already had in the Washington News a long story about Hoover, telling things about him from his boyhood. I am satisfied that if Herbert Hoover read some of those little chapters in the story of his life he would not recognize himself as the hero of the story. So Alfred Smith is reading a good deal now that never happened in his brilliant and romantic east side youth time.

But, Mr. President, a strange political campaign is on—political tricks of the trade that Mark Hanna in his palmiest days never thought of are being employed by the Smith forces. In my judgment, a large corruption fund is back of Al Smith in this campaign. His leaders are quietly moving around and quietly and strangely slipping over delegates in States where the rank and file of the party in those States stand against him usually 8 out of every 10 votes. How are they reaching and influencing these delegate manipulators? How are they getting them? Listen to this from the Trenton Evening Times:

> Hague ties up delegates by agreeing to pay bills. Expense may be $100,000, but mayor assumes it in exchange for Smith votes. All go free to the convention.
> In exchange for a written pledge to stand by Gov. Al Smith for President to the bitter end, Mayor Frank Hague, of Jersey City, has agreed to defray all traveling and hotel expenses for the New Jersey delegates to the Democratic National Convention at Houston, Tex., in June. The list is to include not only delegates and alternates, but wives and friends to the number of approximately 75. The party may go by special train or by boat, and a conservative estimate of the cost will be from $75,000 to $100,000.
> There is naturally some interest as to how Hague, whose salary is only $10,000 a year, will be able to foot such a bill. Whether the signing by the delegates of a written pledge to take orders from Hague at Houston in return for having their bills all paid is in violation of the corrupt practice act is another matter for speculation. The corrupt practice act contemplates that the only money that can be expended in the interest of a candidate must be spent by the officially named manager for such candidate.

Senators, are you learning any politics from this bold and brazen eastern escapade? Hague is not Smith's manager. That is, he has not been designated as such publicly. It seems that anybody they can reach in the East is attending to this thing. A few people are gotten in a room. Delegates and their families are gathered up; a State is traded off and hog-tied. They sign on the dotted line. They pledge themselves to vote for Smith to the bitter end if so much money is put up, and so forth, expenses, hotel bills, taken on a trip to Houston, and stand ready to come at the beck and call of the mayor, Mr. Hague, for Al Smith.

Mr. President, I repeat, I want that resolution introduced—we are discussing it very seriously now, and I think it will be forthcoming soon—to investigate these campaign expenditures. I want to call in these people back of every candidate, call in Mr. Hoover, Governor Lowden, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and the various other candidates, and interrogate them and others as to the money they are expending to achieve this high honor of being President of the United States.

I want Governor Smith's henchmen summoned to bring down Mayor Hague and ask him where he got this money; ask him who authorized him to expend $100,000 for one delegation to a national convention; ask them why they are violating the corrupt practices act, if they are violating it. Let us be the judges of that; and ask them what they are doing, and let us decide whether or not they are violating it.

Let me remind you of another thing in connection with this. Governor Smith has not formally declared himself a candidate.

All these things that have been going on, if anything should be dug up and exposed, to his hurt and injury, he could very easily say, "Why, I have never announced that I am a candidate. I do not know anything about what they are doing." This would be done in the hope that he might escape any odium that might attach. Well, let us bring them down here and see. Let us find out what all of them and their friends are doing. Let us find out who is furnishing the money, where it is coming from, how much is being furnished by the Roman Catholic political machine here and elsewhere, and how much is being furnished by the European whisky interests that are fighting to break down the Constitution of the United States and the statutes that seek to enforce it. Let us find that out.

Now let us see something about their tactics before I close.

This is from the Washington Post, from a Mr. Bargeron. The staff correspondent of the Post, a Mr. Fox, who, I believe, is a staff correspondent—he is a fox, too—is slipping around the country to these various States and claiming everything for Smith. I have understood that he knows a good deal about how the Arkansas delegation was selected. I should like to have him come before this committee that we are going to raise by a resolution in the Senate and let him tell them if he was present when this delegation was selected, and what was said when they were selected.

Mr. Fox is one of the fellows who was mixed up in the Hearst-Catholic-Mexican scandal. He had some correspondence with one of the crooks and scoundrels in that matter, Mr. Gonzales. He showed me a letter in which Gonzales told him that he had had paid to me certain amounts of money through somebody in New Orleans last summer. "Why," I said, "I have not been in New Orleans in the last two or three years." I said, "This fellow is a son of a gun." He said, "What would you do with the letter?" I said, "Take it to Senator ROBINSON and the special committee appointed to investigate this question, and turn it over to them, and tell them to investigate it"; and I have not heard any more from it—not a word, either from Mr. Fox or from Senator ROBINSON.

Mr. Fox is one of Governor Smith's main boosters. I wonder how much they are putting in his flanks to go around the country and write this fiction that he is writing, claiming everything in sight for Governor Smith.

Here is the Washington Post this morning. Listen to these headlines. This article is from Mr. Bargeron of the Post:

Reed men confer to-day on resisting rising Smith tide.

Is not that a glorious picture—the "rising Smith tide"? Well, Mr. President, they may be able to go up and pluck off a few delegates in the States where the Roman Catholics are in charge of the Democratic organization and where 45 or 50 per cent of the party in some of those non-Democratic States are Catholics. They have done that in several of them recently; and they may be able to pull them off and throw them into the newspaper columns and throw them in our faces at the Capitol in an effort to deceive us into believing that Smith is running away with the nomination and hoping to have us say there is no use to oppose him, you can not defeat him.

That is what they are seeking to do with this miserable and false propaganda. They are not carrying Democratic States. They are plucking off these Smith delegates in States that have no more chance to go Democratic than a snowball has to retain its cold and snow-white appearance down yonder in Pluto's infernal regions. While every Democratic delegate should count, Smith has no right to threaten the Democrats who are opposed to him in States that are normally Democratic. Why should he threaten the Democratic South, that has always held the ark of the covenant when the party completely lost out in the East, the North, and the West? The South, God bless her, stood devotedly and loyally at the altar places of the party, true to the principles of Jefferson, retaining the ark of the covenant; and now comes Governor Smith's henchman in his cabinet at Albany, Tremaine, a State officer, who dares to go into the South and tell the South if she does not truckle and bow her knee to Smith, surrender her convictions, and fall in line, they will punish the South when she asks to have measures passed through Congress—needful, meritorious measures.

And now, on top of that, we find them coming with this spirit of intolerance right down into the South, in North Carolina, where Governor Smith himself has gone; and his friendly correspondent, representing his views and his principles, is sending out a statement that if an American Senator dares to come into that State to speak against what Governor Smith stands for, he is liable to be "mobbed." That is what they are threatening, that they will not let him have a hall to speak in, and he is liable to have trouble, because they will "attack" him if he comes. My God, is that spirit to be tolerated in America? Senators, that spirit has got to be put down. In putting that down we are not interfering with the Catholic's right to worship. Let him repair to his church and worship as he pleases; but let him know that he can not set up the tenets of the Pope of Rome against the fundamental principles of constitutional government in America. Every loyal American is with me on that; and if there is a Senator here who does not agree with me on that vital question, let him have the courage to stand up here and now and say so.

I am glad to see that my friend from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has come into the Chamber. In this article that I am reading—and I should like to have the Senator's attention just here—in this remarkable article this morning in the Post, they are boosting Smith and knocking REED. They say:

As to the situation in Arkansas, there is no disposition in any quarter now to challenge the first reports that the Arkansas delegation as a whole favors the New York governor, and that it will vote for him the first opportunity it gets.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator gladly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator say he was reading from the Washington Post?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator get unanimous consent to read that paper in the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not get any unanimous consent, but I am reading what they say about the Senator's State, and the Senator himself, I understand, is on that delegation. This paper now is saying that the Arkansas delegation is for Smith and that it will vote for him the first chance it gets. I wish my friend, speaking for four-fifths of the Democrats of his State, who never had an opportunity to vote in a primary on this very important question, would rise up and tell the Senate and the country whether or not that is true.

The Senator from Arkansas, who is sitting before me, fails to respond.

So much for that. I am going to call a general roll here one of these days pretty soon.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is fixing to break a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. I may break a quorum; but if I do, I will make the point of no quorum and bring them back and ask them when they come in to tell the people back home how they stand on this question.

You know that story they tell about the drunken fellow in church. The preacher was preaching away, on hypocrites and drunkards, and he said, "You hypocrite, where are you to-day?" and no one answered. After a while he said, "You drunkard, where are you to-day?" He said, "Here I am, Parson, and I ask your prayers." The preacher said, "I repeat my other question: Hypocrite, where are you to-day?" This drunken fellow reached over and took the hypocrite by the shoulder and shook him and said, "Corson, why don't you answer to your name?" [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this article goes on:

Reed chiefs stirred by claims for governor they call propaganda. Senator expected to stay candidate.

You know, it takes a heap of coin to write these nice little sentences, seeking to turn and hook JIM REED off in the ditch instanter.

Speeches and shouts are not enough.

These Smith fellows are right about that if they are going to pay a hundred thousand dollars for a single State delegation. If they are going to pay a hundred thousand dollars for a delegation in New Jersey—and this paper of New Jersey says so—$100,000 to take them to Houston. Then the Post is right, speeches and shouts are not enough. Is this nomination to be bartered to the highest bidder?

NEED ORGANIZATION, FRIENDS ASSERT

By Carlisle Bargeron

Leaders of Senator JAMES A. REED'S presidential campaign are to confer here to-day on what is to be done about his candidacy in the face of the apparent rising tide of Smith sentiment.

There is no suggestion that the Senator contemplates withdrawing from the race. Rather, he is said to be coming back in a fighting mood. But there is a realization in his camp that something must be done to cope with what at least might be described as the surcharged Smith atmosphere.

It is surcharged with coin all right. I would like to have them help me pass a resolution to bring them in here and inquire into this whole matter. That is the way to find that out. Instead of these Catholic papers and Smith's henchmen abusing me for my speeches here, let their friends stand on this floor and answer them, or answer them truthfully in the press. They do not do it. They dare not undertake it. They can not do it.

Listen to this:

Called pure propaganda.

This is what the Reed crowd is saying:

CALLED PURE PROPAGANDA

The deluge of claims being daily put out by Governor Smith's supporters is pure propaganda, the purpose of which is obvious.

They are trying to stampede the Houston delegates for their candidate. To achieve this, these overzealous men go even to the absurd length of putting Missouri in the Smith column. Everybody, of course, knows that Missouri's delegates were not only instructed by the State convention to vote for Senator REED until released by him, but also that the delegates are personally devoted to him.

Listen to this:

REPORTS AFFECT REED MORALE

It is the reports coming up from the South of crumbling anti-Smith sentiment, especially from around Asheville and Arkansas way, that is causing most alarm in the Reed camp.

They gave out a statement the other day that Senator SIMMONS and Senator OVERMAN had withdrawn their opposition to Smith in North Carolina, and I ask those Senators if such a report was true?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I answer the Senator that such a report was printed in a certain daily newspaper of North Carolina supposed to be friendly to Governor Smith, and on the day on which the report appeared in print I denounced it in proper terms.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator. I wonder if my good friend the other Senator was also misrepresented by them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have never seen the misrepresentation. There is no truth in it if there is such a representation.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to hear the Senator say that, for such a misrepresentation was made. I knew it was not true, but it is in line with the tactics talked about in this column by the Reed supporters.

Listen how boldly this fellow talks, and I am going to reread it for the RECORD, and I shall have something more to say about it from time to time. Because for months it was understood that Senator ROBINSON would be the favorite-son candidate from that State. But just before the delegates were selected I understand he withdrew as such a candidate.

As to the situation in Arkansas, there is no disposition in any quarter now to challenge the first reports that the Arkansas delegation as a whole favors the New York governor and that it will vote for him the first opportunity it gets.

In view of the position of the Democrats of Arkansas on this question that statement is exceedingly strange. Mr. President, I have no brief to speak for the people of Arkansas. I know them to be a fine and great people. I have spoken in many places in that State. I have now a number of invitations to speak there, and I will do so when Congress adjourns. I assert that the Democrats of Arkansas would, if they had an opportunity to vote in a primary, register at least two-thirds, and maybe four-fifths, of their votes in opposition to Governor Smith for President of the United States, and I challenge anybody here to dispute that statement. It is accepted as the truth.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I want to reiterate what I said a little while ago, that I am not fighting anybody's religion. I am for religious freedom. I am an enthusiastic champion of religious freedom. What I am fighting for is the right to worship as I please, and the right of every Protestant organization to worship as it pleases, as well as Jews and Catholics.

I am informed on this subject. I have had more books and periodicals sent to me in the last 18 months, since I challenged the right of the Knights of Columbus to use our Army to restore the Pope to power in Mexico, than I had ever read in all my lifetime. I challenge anyone here to dispute this statement, that Pope Pius IX lays it down as a cardinal principle of the Catholic Church that the citizen has no right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, that the State has no right to permit the citizen to have the religion of his choice. I lay down this charge, that he asserts that the Roman Catholic Church has the right to drive out all other religions and set up a Catholic state and declare the Catholic religion to the exclusion of all other religions.

Cardinal Gibbons, to whom the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] referred, a very able cardinal, too, said in a speech in substance that—

Nowhere in recorded history can it be found that any Pope ever changed the doctrine or edict of another Pope. The doctrine of anyone of them is the doctrine of all of them.

That is true. The last book that they have sent out to instruct "the faithful" is one written by Doctor Ryan, professor of moral theology right here in the Catholic University of America, a book called "State and Church." He sets out in that book that when the Roman Catholics become strong enough in the United States, they will set up the Catholic state, and will proscribe other denominations, and he asks this question, "What chance will they have then against a Catholic state?" That is a thrust at the heart of religious freedom.

God deliver my country from such a day. It is against the hideous, dangerous, and deadly approach of such doctrines to the Capitol and the White House that I am fighting to the uttermost. I will continue to fight them. I want them to worship as they please, but they have no right to bring the devilish doctrine of the inquisition and of St. Bartholomew's Day into this fair land of liberty of this western world.

Americans, wake up before it is too late, and put none but Americans on guard!

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYSON in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by reason of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

LANDS IN OKLAHOMA

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2725) to extend the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, to certain public lands in the State of Oklahoma, which was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "Statutes," to insert "(section 1171, title 43, U. S. C.)."

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment of the House simply places in the bill a reference to the amended code. It refers to the same section of the law and adds an additional reference to the amended code. I move that the Senate agree to the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the naval appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAINE, to insert, after line 17, page 53, the following proviso:

Provided, That after December 25, 1928, none of the appropriations made in this act shall be used to pay any expenses incurred in connection with acts of hostility against a friendly foreign nation, or any belligerent intervention in the affairs of a foreign nation, or any intervention in the domestic affairs of any foreign nation, unless war has been declared by Congress or unless a state of war actually exists under recognized principles of international law.

The words "acts of hostility" and the words "belligerent intervention" shall include within their meaning the employment of coercion or force in the collection of any pecuniary claim or any claim or right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States against the government of a foreign nation, either upon the initiation of the Government of the United States, or upon the invitation of any foreign government existing de jure or de facto.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the situation in Nicaragua is a distressing one and presents a problem of some difficulty, from whatever viewpoint we approach it. I was opposed to sending troops to Nicaragua in the first place, and I am most anxious to see them brought out of Nicaragua. But I do not feel that we can come out of Nicaragua in disregard of a situation which we ourselves have created and in disregard of obligations which we have assumed. It is from this viewpoint alone that I desire to discuss the pending amendment. One is tempted to digress into a general discussion of what should be our policy toward the Central American countries, but it would lead to a longer discussion than I think it justifiable to indulge in at this time.

Mr. President, as I have said, I was opposed to sending troops to Nicaragua in 1925 and 1926. I was also opposed to the recognition of Diaz as President of Nicaragua. I did not think that Diaz was legally elected President. I thought he was a part of the revolutionary movement to overthrow the legal government, and I am still of that opinion. I did not believe that the facts justified the sending of troops into Nicaragua. Nevertheless the power to recognize is in the President and he undoubtedly has the power to send troops for the purpose for which he said he sent these, to protect the life and property of American citizens. So Diaz was recognized and the troops were sent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator a question, and I am asking for information. I think the Senator's position as chairman of the great committee having to do with these matters places him in a position to know about it. As I understand it, the President said he sent troops in there to protect American lives and property. Was there any danger to American lives or American property at that time, or is there any now, or has there been any for several years past?

Mr. BORAH. I am of the opinion that the facts which were given the President and Secretary of State for the purpose of justifying intercession were not based upon realities. I do not believe that the true facts justified sending the marines; but, of course, the President acted upon the facts as presented to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us where those facts came from?

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to avoid interruptions. In fact, I rather invite them, because I think it the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to answer any question which may be propounded. But I would like, in the first instance, to submit a line of presentation, after which I will answer any questions which may be propounded.

After the troops were sent into Nicaragua and after the recognition of Diaz, on the 13th day of January, 1927, I discussed the matter in the Senate at some length, and in my concluding remarks I said:

It has been said, and properly said, that we are "in." What should we do about it? I have already expressed myself in regard to the recognition of Sacasa. I would recognize him. I do not believe he is unfriendly to American interests. I have no doubt the people would support him, and we could come out. But if it be thought unwise to do that or if other personal reasons interpose which would make it difficult or embarrassing to do that, then it does seem to me that we are under the highest obligation to call upon Diaz and those who are there by virtue of our recognition to give the people of Nicaragua an opportunity by popular choice and a fair election to select their President. We ought to insure the people a fair election and recognize their choice; recognize the people's choice and withdraw our troops. It seems to me that it is not up to us as a Government to keep Mr. Diaz there until 1929, evidently in opposition to the wishes of the vast majority of the people and as against the two men whom they deliberately selected, but again to call for an election and to conduct it as we did practically in 1925, and give the people of Nicaragua an opportunity to pass upon the question of who shall be their ruler. Let us work if we are to help at all with the popular will. Let us cease thinking solely of our own interests and consult the wishes of the people of Nicaragua, in part at least.

Never in the world, Mr. President, can we have peace in Central America if we force upon the people of Nicaragua or the people of other Central American countries those who are not supported by the popular will. It would be well if rulers could understand that once the people of a nation are imbued with a national and independent spirit, if they could only understand that once a people have been imbued with a spirit of freedom and of free power you can not shoot it out of them; you can not crush it out of them; it is there; it may be submerged to-day by force, but in years to come it will return and assert itself.

Again, in a concluding paragraph, speaking of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], I said:

I do not know how the Senator construed what I have said, but I say that what we should do is this: Our marines are there; if we will not recognize Sacasa, we should have an election; we should give the people an opportunity to vote their sentiments; we should, if we are going to stay there with the marines, keep them there in defense of the government which the people themselves want. But while we are now there, I would not stay indefinitely. I would do justice to the people, and then we can safely come out.

Since that time I have been interested in the question of the election and the manner in which it was to be held. On the 24th of September, 1927, I received a letter from a gentleman living in Nicaragua, a Nicaraguan citizen, and among other things in the letter he said:

Now, my dear Senator, regarding the coming election of 1928, which the United States is going to supervise, I beg to inform you the following: The majority of the Nicaraguan citizens are not registered as voters, a trick done by the previous Conservative administrations to insure their place in power; secondly, at the polls, two Conservative members are appointed with only one Liberal member. I believe that it is convenient that a general registration should take place before the election, and that the representatives at the polls must be three members: A Conservative, a Liberal, and a Spanish-speaking American, the American to be the judge of all disputes. By only so doing we could get a fair, free election.

After the receipt of that letter I addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, as follows:

OCTOBER 3, 1927.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I presume the matter has had your attention, or will have. But, by reason of information reaching me from Nicaragua, may I call your attention to the situation there with reference to registration.

I am advised that the majority of the Nicaraguan citizens are not registered as voters. That by reason of manipulation heretofore had at some previous time in the history of the country registration has not been had to any marked extent.

If it is possible to arrange for a full registration or for an opportunity for all to register who desire to do so, it seems to me that action ought to be taken.

I call this to your attention because it has been particularly called to mine.

I am, my dear Mr. Secretary, very respectfully,

WM. E. BORAH.

On October 4, 1927, I received the following letter from the Secretary of State:

I have your letter of October 3 concerning the subject of registration for the coming election in Nicaragua. As I understand the situation, the chief obligation which we have assumed in connection with the supervision of this election is to see that every citizen of Nicaragua entitled to vote has a full opportunity to do so. Supervision means not merely the preservation of order at the time of the election, but a sufficient control over the preliminary steps, including registration, to see that everybody entitled to vote has an opportunity to register. In other words, the registration is vital. We can not, of course, contemplate the holding of an election in Nicaragua on the basis of previous registration lists. So far as the department and General McCoy are concerned this matter seems vital to us as it does to you. Naturally nobody can guarantee ideal results in any country, but you may depend upon it that every effort will be made on our part to eliminate fraud and intimidation, and to guarantee to every citizen of Nicaragua his rights in this matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, May I ask the Senator a question before he proceeds further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. We sent our troops down here originally for what purpose?

Mr. BORAH. As stated by the President, to protect the life and property of American citizens.

Mr. CARAWAY. When was it that we decided, then, that we would hold an election?

Mr. BORAH. I am coming to that in a few moments.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator another question? When did we change the object of having the marines there?

Mr. BORAH. I am going to cover that point. The contention of the Government is that they have never changed their object. The contention of the Government is that the holding of an election is one of the steps by which they restore order and thereby insure safety and security to American life and property.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it the purpose, then, to keep the marines there until the people accept, as fair and valid and binding, an election which we hold? Suppose some people refuse to accept that election, do we propose to make them do so with bayonets?

Mr. BORAH. I do not believe that that is a matter as to which I can interpret the mind of the Government, but, so far as I am concerned, I would not be in favor of such a course.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator, then, after the election is held, is in favor of removing the marines, whether the people of Nicaragua are satisfied with the election or not?

Mr. BORAH. I feel, although, as I have said, I am going to cover that in a few moments, I feel we will be able to come out and should do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand, but I merely wanted to get the Senator's position.

Mr. BORAH. If I am permitted, I will cover that in a few minutes and cover it fully.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator another question. What part of the election is chasing the alleged bandit down there? Has that anything to do with the election? I refer to the bandit who has been killed four or five times and who refuses to be so obliging as to stay dead after we have killed him.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is a part of holding the election—that is maintaining order, without which there can be no fair election.

Mr. CARAWAY. So that shooting people is a part of the election?

Mr. BORAH. That is so in this country sometimes.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is true in Chicago; but I thought that that system had been repudiated even in Chicago.

Mr. BORAH. Chicago is not the only place.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator approve shooting people in order to hold an election?

Mr. BORAH. I am not in favor of that, if it can be avoided—nevertheless I would carry out our agreement and hold the election.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would the Senator be in favor of sending marines to any community in America to prevent shooting at the polls or to encourage it—either one?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator wishes to go into that, let me say that if a Representative or a Senator or presidential electors were being elected, and it was impossible to have order and protect the polls without doing so, if riot and disorder were such as to prevent an election, I would be in favor of sending troops, if it were necessary to preserve order.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I am trying to get at. Then, the Senator's view is that, whenever the administration makes up its mind that an election is not going to be fair, he is in favor of sending armed forces there to make it so?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not say that. What I say is that if a Federal election were being held, and it was evident that order could not be maintained without the assistance of the Federal Government, and Federal officers were being elected, I would undertake to protect that situation and preserve order. The Federal Government has the right of self-preservation.

Mr. CARAWAY. If there was as much disorder in some place in this country as apparently is occurring in Nicaragua, would the Senator be in favor of sending armed forces to hold the election?

Mr. BORAH. I think they are two entirely different propositions. In this country we have our States to depend upon to maintain order; they are depended upon; and I should always depend upon them so long as they could do so; I would rely upon them. But if States break down I would certainly maintain order for the election of Federal officials.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would not the Senator be willing to rely upon the government of a foreign country as much as he would on a State of the Union? I am expressing no hostility to the Senator's view. I am merely trying to find out from some one who knows just what we are trying to do in Nicaragua.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to cover the ground entirely as I see it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am just afraid I might not follow the Senator's speech, and I know I would understand the Senator if he should answer the question.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to impose upon the Senator by asking him to remain in the Chamber while I am speaking.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, I shall do that, but sometimes a speech fails to hit the point I have in mind.

Mr. BORAH. It sometimes fails to hit the other Senator's point.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and evidently the question also missed; so I will wait for the speech.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator's question has not missed. I assure the Senator that in good faith I am going to cover this entire question. I have no desire to avoid any part of the facts or the discussion as I see the situation. I should like, as I have said, to go ahead and present——

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not want to divert the Senator; I am perfectly willing that he should proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. President, since this correspondence with the Secretary of State I have had letters and communications from Nicaragua which convince me that every effort is being made to have a fair election and to have a registration which shall insure the right to vote to every Nicaraguan who is qualified to vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, at that point may I ask the Senator what are the qualifications for voters in Nicaragua? Is there any property qualification, or age limit, or is there female suffrage?

Mr. BORAH. They have not female suffrage, as I remember, and I do not think they have any property qualifications. We do not seek to define the qualifications; they are defined by the constitution and laws of Nicaragua.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I may ask the Senator a question, Who is going to determine the question of whether or not the electors in Nicaragua are qualified?

Mr. BORAH. That is to be determined under the constitution and laws of Nicaragua. We do not undertake to determine that question ourselves at all. We simply carry out the constitution and laws as to qualification.

Mr. CARAWAY. So that if one party or the other shall deny the right to vote on the ground of qualifications or on the ground that a person lacks the qualifications to vote, we are going to accept that?

Mr. BORAH. We are going to have a representative on the board, and that representative will undoubtedly have to be satisfied that under the laws and constitution of Nicaragua the individual is entitled to vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he differs with the Nicaraguans, then what steps are we going to take?

Mr. BORAH. My understanding is that under the present law as it is promulgated the ultimate decision is with the American representative.

Mr. CARAWAY. So that we would then be the final registration board in Nicaragua?

Mr. BORAH. That is practically true. The Senator will understand that we have at various times undertaken to carry on elections in Nicaragua and in Haiti and in Santo Domingo and Panama and in other places; and unless the power is sufficient to enable this Government to determine under the laws of the country involved who are entitled to vote, of course, there is no justification for us having anything to do with the election.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator another question. I do not want the Senator to think I am even differing with him, but I feel strongly about it. Under what constitutional power do we undertake to hold an election in any country outside of continental United States?

Mr. BORAH. I have that question on my list to discuss, and I am going to try to cover that as well as other questions.

I was going to say, Mr. President, that after this correspondence I became convinced that every step possible was being taken to insure a fair registration and a fair election. I think anyone who will take the time to look into the acts and conduct of General McCoy will conclude that General McCoy is determined that there shall be a fair election; that he is entirely impartial as between the Conservatives and the Liberals; and, as I shall undertake to show in a few moments, the very fact that General McCoy is determined that there shall be a fair election is one of the reasons why certain parties in Nicaragua have concluded they do not want an election. It is our good faith and honesty of purpose that is disturbing certain parties.

Mr. President, let us go back——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to explain to the Senate at this time that General McCoy was selected by the government which we recognized in Nicaragua, on the recommendation of the President, to have supervision of the election. He is not to perform that office, as I understand, as a marine officer, but General McCoy has been selected to have supervision of the election, and the marines are simply to keep the peace. General McCoy, under the authority of the Nicaraguan Government, will have control of the election. I think that is true; at any rate, that is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. That is my understanding also.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I ask the Senator a question, do I understand, then, that we have turned over to the authorities in Nicaragua the right to command our forces there?

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, no.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, our forces are commanded by the marine officers, and they are to keep order and keep the peace.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who commands General McCoy? I think the Senator said that he was turned over to the Nicaraguan Government.

Mr. SWANSON. General McCoy, as I understand, has charge of the election and was appointed to supervise the election by the Nicaraguan Government on the recommendation of the President. The Nicaraguan Government pays the expenses of the election.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I am coming to. Do we let somebody else appoint one of our marine officers to office in some foreign country? Does the Senator from Idaho so understand?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, General McCoy has been appointed by the President of Nicaragua as one of the supervisors of the election.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he has been thus appointed, to whom does he look for his orders—the people who appointed him to the office or to the United States?

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly, he would look in the first instance to the appointing power.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, we have turned over a marine officer to be appointed by a foreign government, and he owes his position to that government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, we have done that repeatedly.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I am asking about. I did not know that that had ever been done before.

Mr. SWANSON. We have sent officers to other governments at their request to aid them in the management and building up of their naval forces, to aid them in connection with their military affairs, to aid them in diplomatic affairs, to aid them in their customs affairs. That has been done heretofore in the interest of peace and a conciliatory spirit as between governments; but we have done it repeatedly. We sent on request officers of the United States to administer the customs affairs of Persia, as I recall, and of Haiti.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if we have ever sent our officers into foreign countries when there was really a state of war or revolution in the country to which we sent such officers?

Mr. SWANSON. I think some of our officers are in Haiti now.

Mr. BORAH. What was the question of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GEORGE. I asked if we had sent our officers to any other country when a state of revolution was in existence.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes. I think I shall be able to cite instances.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the Senator cite such an instance.

Mr. BORAH. President Wilson did that in the case of Haiti and Santo Domingo.

Mr. GEORGE. To train the army there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; to train the army; at least to cooperate with local forces.

Mr. CARAWAY. And to organize forces?

Mr. GEORGE. And to organize forces?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and to write a constitution for the people and to supervise elections.

Mr. BINGHAM. And to supervise elections; and if the election in the country failed to satisfy the Democratic administration, then to hold another election.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Connecticut approve of that course?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask if the Senator from Idaho approves of that course.

Mr. BORAH. I was opposed to going into Haiti. I spoke against it both here and before the public. I was opposed to going into Santo Domingo, but, after we had gone in, I would use the ballot box any time in preference to a Gatling gun.

Mr. CARAWAY. We seem to be using both in the case of Nicaragua.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to using the ballot box, but I do not want to superimpose a Gatling gun on the ballot box.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to do so either, but I would carry out the agreement and hold the election according to agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. However, that is not the point in regard to which I wish to ask. I am asking for information whether or not our Government has sent its naval or military officers to any foreign country when that country was in an actual state of revolution for the purpose of assisting or training or organizing the troops of that country.

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that we have. I will recur to instances later.

Mr. GEORGE. I so understood the Senator from Virginia, and I wished to know if that is true.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that that is exactly what took place in Haiti and Santo Domingo. I do not think there is any difference in principle between what we did in Haiti and Santo Domingo and what we are doing now in Nicaragua, although the details may differ.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, if Senators will read the correspondence between Mr. Bryan as Secretary of State and the Government of Santo Domingo they will find that there was a protest against our supervising the election. Mr. Bryan then accommodated the situation by saying that we would only send observers—he used the word "observers"—to report to the Government as to whether the election was fair or not and whether the government so elected should be recognized. Mr. Bryan, however, refused to send agents. I want simply to state the facts in connection with this matter. As I understand, General McCoy was sent there—I do not know whether he belongs to the Marine Corps or the Army; I do not remember. He was selected by President Coolidge, I do not know whether at the suggestion or at the request of the Nicaraguan Government, but he has charge of the election in Nicaragua. As I understand, the Nicaraguan Government will pay all the expenses incident to the election; and what troops we may keep there are kept for the purpose of maintaining order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from Idaho let me ask the Senator from Virginia a question? If Nicaragua shall not pay the expenses, how are we going to get our money for holding the election for them in Nicaragua?

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, Nicaragua does not pay anything for the Marine Corps to keep order; but Nicaragua pays the expenses of the election. Nicaragua pays the salary of General McCoy, as I understand, and pays those appointed by him; at least that is what I was told, and I think that was testified before the committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. If they shall not pay that expense, what are we going to do about it?

Mr. SWANSON. Then they will not get their pay unless Congress appropriates it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If they do not get their money, we are going to let them lose it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should really like to proceed, and I give the assurance to Senators that before I sit down I will yield myself to any questions which may be asked. I should like, in the first place, to get out of the way some of the facts and some of the history in connection with this matter which I think form the background necessary to a correct understanding of the present situation.

We went into Nicaragua first in 1910 and 1911. At that time Zelaya was President of Nicaragua. He was known as the representative of the Liberal forces of Nicaragua. The result of our intervention in Nicaragua was the downfall of Zelaya. At that time Emiliano Chamorro and Diaz came upon the scene. Ultimately, without going into detail, Diaz was made president. Chamorro was the driving power in public affairs. From 1911 until 1925 through three different administrations the marines were encamped on the white-house grounds at Managua.

The Government of Nicaragua would not have lasted overnight without the presence of the marines in Nicaragua. During that time, for the 15 years intervening, the Liberals contended that they represented from 75 to 80 per cent of the people of that country, and that if they could have a fair election—an election in which the registrations could be had and the vote had in accordance with the rights of the people—they would undoubtedly elect their candidates for President and Vice President; but during the entire period from 1911 to 1924 the elections were controlled by those who were in power. The Chamorro family and the Diaz followers passed the Presidency and the Vice Presidency about to each other; and during that time the people, or 80 per cent of them, were practically disfranchised.

In 1920 the Liberals sought the aid of the United States Government in holding an election. They did not receive it.

In 1924 a request was again made that the United States aid in giving the people of Nicaragua a fair election. To some extent the aid was granted. Americans supervised the election. Americans had written the election laws; and afterward to a certain extent, though unofficially, they supervised the election. The result of that election was that Solarzano was elected President and Sacasa was elected Vice President.

Within a few weeks after the election, Chamorro and Diaz began their movement for the overthrow of the legally constituted Government of Nicaragua. Within a few months they were in control of the Government; Solarzano, the President, was driven out; Sacasa was driven out; three members of the supreme bench were forced to leave the country; and a number of the members of the legislative body were compelled to go into exile.

This was the history of Nicaragua at the time I called for an election in 1927, at the time I spoke upon the subject here in the Senate. I did not make that declaration without full knowledge of the history of Nicaragua, and without regard to what I thought would be the future of Nicaragua without an election. For 15 years the marines had kept in power those who represented not the people of Nicaragua so much as foreign capitalists who were investing in Nicaragua; and it was my opinion that if we did not give the people an opportunity to express their views and record their views, we would again sit down in the white-house grounds at Managua and maintain in power those who were opposed by the people of Nicaragua. It was for that reason—the troops being there, and Diaz being recognized, and the program apparently provided for—that it seemed to me that the only way in which we could in any sense compensate the people of Nicaragua for the injustice that had been done them was to give them an opportunity to elect their own officers and have their own government. Secondly, it was further my view—and is still my view—that there was no possible way by which we could get out of Nicaragua, under the policy which obtained, other than to give the people of Nicaragua a chance to elect their officials, and give the officials the backing of the public opinion of the country and give them our recognition and thereby our moral support, and thus establish something in the nature of a stable government in Nicaragua. It seemed to me the only possible way to do justice to the great body of the people, and the only probable hope of establishing a stable government. I therefore, under the circumstances, favored an election, and I favor it now.

In March, 1927, after our troops had been there for some months, the President sent his personal representative, Mr. Stimson, to Nicaragua for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, if possible, and restoring law and order. Mr. Stimson met first, of course, with the representatives of the government of Mr. Diaz, and obtained from Diaz an understanding as to a program involving the granting of amnesty to those who had been placed under condemnation by the Conservative government, the restoring of the officers who had been driven out, and providing in the future for Liberals to be represented in the Conservative government. After meeting with the President of Nicaragua he next met with a committee appointed by Sacasa. I should like the Senate to bear in mind that the first contact with the Liberal forces was through a committee of three representing the Liberal forces, one of them being the secretary of Sacasa, another a member of his cabinet, and the other a prominent Liberal leader.

After meeting with this committee the committee indicated their desire to have the views of General Moncada, who was in charge of the military forces, and finally a meeting was had between Mr. Stimson and Moncada. I desire at this time, Mr. President, to read some of the communications which passed between the representative of this Government and the representatives of the Liberal forces and the representatives of the Conservative forces.

On May 4, 1927, Mr. Stimson addressed the following communication to General Moncada:

DEAR GENERAL MONCADA: Confirming our conversation of this morning, I have the honor to inform you that I am authorized to say that the President of the United States intends to accept the request of the Nicaraguan Government to supervise the election of 1928; that the retention of President Diaz during the remainder of his term is regarded as essential to that plan and will be insisted upon—

The only matter in controversy between Stimson and the representatives of the Liberals was the question of maintaining Diaz in power until the election in 1928. The Liberals were anxious—indeed, had been requesting our Government—to supervise the election. As far back as October, 1926, General Moncada had made a statement to the effect that in his opinion quiet and order could not be established in Nicaragua without the supervision of an election upon the part of the United States. The only question about which they could not arrive at an agreement in the first instance, and the only matter which in my judgment our Government imposed upon them, was that of maintaining Diaz in power until after the election of 1928.

As to the holding of the election, the Liberals were not only willing to have the election supervised by the United States but it had been one of the things which they had been asking the United States to do since 1910 and 1911.

that a general disarmament of the country is also regarded as necessary for the proper and successful conduct of such election; and that the forces of the United States will be authorized to accept the custody of the arms of those willing to lay them down, including the Government, and to disarm forcibly those who will not do so.

Very respectfully,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

On May 11 General Moncada replied as follows:

MY DEAR GENERAL STIMSON: It has been my expressed opinion since 1912 that free and fair elections were the one thing most needed in Nicaragua to free it from revolution and to permit its peaceful development. I have further expressed my opinion that free and fair elections could not be obtained except upon the supervision and with the aid of the United States. I so expressed myself to Admiral Latimer on the U. S. S. Rochester in October, 1926.

To which Admiral Latimer testified before the committee.

It is because of this often-expressed belief, and the confidence that I now feel that we will get such fair election in 1928, that I shall be able to persuade my army to disarm.

Very respectfully,

J. M. MONCADA.

This letter was written after consultation between General Moncada and the representatives of Sacasa, the vice president under the former election.

Moncada was of the opinion that he would have some difficulty in satisfying the generals under his command; and later Mr. Stimson wrote him the following letter, dated May 11, 1927:

DEAR GENERAL MONCADA: I am glad to learn of the authority that has been placed in you by your army to arrange for a general disarmament. I am also glad to make clear to you and to your army the attitude of the President of the United States as to this matter. In seeking to terminate this war, President Coolidge is actuated only by a desire to benefit the people of Nicaragua and to secure for them a free, fair, and impartial election. He believes that only by such free and fair elections can permanent peace be secured for Nicaragua. To insure this in 1928 he has consented to the request that American representatives selected by him shall supervise the election.

Permit me to interpose here a statement that after Stimson went to Nicaragua our Government telegraphed him asking him if it was not possible to secure an adjustment of the difficulty or controversy in Nicaragua without our taking upon ourselves the obligation of supervising the election.

There had come to the United States a report to the effect that the Conservative forces were gradually winning their military victories; and, based upon that news, our Government was of the opinion that we might be able to restore order, or that order might be restored, without our taking upon ourselves the task of supervising the election. But after consultation with both sides, and especially with the Liberals, it was clearly demonstrated that the Liberals would not lay down their arms, would not cease the conflict, unless we assumed the obligation of supervising the election; and it is my view that the supervision of this election was made absolutely obligatory upon the United States if peace was to be restored through the demands of the Liberal leaders. Indeed, Mr. President, it was the only possible way, except through bloodshed, that the Liberals could secure control of the government; and they represented, it was claimed, from 75 to 80 per cent of the people.

He has also consented to assign American officers to train and command a nonpartisan national constabulary for Nicaragua which will have the duty of securing such a fair election and of preventing any fraud or intimidation of voters. He is willing also to leave in Nicaragua until after the election a sufficient force of marines to support the work of the constabulary and insure peace and freedom at the election.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, there is where I wanted to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator understand from this statement that "after the election" means that as soon as the election is held the marines must come out of Nicaragua?

Mr. BORAH. I would not say as soon as the election is held. The officers who will be elected do not take office until the 1st day of January, 1929; but this is the purpose of the Government as it has been stated to me, and as it has been stated by the representatives of the Government upon public occasions: The intention of the Government is, as soon as the election is held, and the people who go into office as the result of the election are recognized, that we are to bring the troops out of Nicaragua.

Mr. CARAWAY. That does not say that. It says that "as soon as the election is held" we will take our marines out.

Mr. BORAH. That is the exact language here; but I am stating what I understand to be the interpretation of that language by our Government.

I think, Mr. President, I am not overstating the fact when I say that the Government is exceedingly anxious to get out of Nicaragua.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think they are more anxious to get out than they were to get in?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think they are more anxious to get out than they were to get in.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then they must be very anxious to get out.

Mr. BORAH. I am satisfied that whatever be the fact with reference to the going in, they are anxious to get out.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the officers who will be elected in this fair election shall fail to protect certain interests for which we sent the marines there, then are we to send the marines back and repudiate the people we put in office?

Mr. BORAH. I could not foretell what will be done; but I sincerely hope we will not go back. I read further:

As further evidence of the good faith of the American Government and of the present Nicaraguan Government in this matter, I am glad to tell you what has already been done. It will answer the questions contained in the letter of your soldiers which you have shown me. General amnesty has already been granted by the President of Nicaragua. I have recommended to President Diaz that the supreme court be reconstituted by the elimination of the illegal judges placed in that court under Señor Chamorro. President Diaz has already called upon those judges for their resignations, and I believe that those resignations will be obtained. I have already advised that the congress be reconstituted by the holding of special elections in those Liberal districts where elections were not held in 1926 under conditions which will insure that the Liberal voters will be amply protected in their rights. I have also recommended that members of congress illegally expelled by Señor Chamorro whose terms have not yet expired be reinstated. I have been assured that this will be done. I have recommended that the Liberal jefes politicos be appointed in the six Liberal districts of Bluefields, Jinotega, Nueva, Segovia, Esteli, Chinandega, and Leon. I have been assured that this will be done.

In short, I have recommended that steps be taken, so far as possible, to restore the political condition as it existed in Nicaragua before the Chamorro coup d'état, and I believe that so far as possible it will be done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will wait until I finish with this.

I hope that these steps will assure you and your army of the fairness of the United States Government and its desire to see peace, justice, and freedom reestablished in Nicaragua without any unfairness or favoritism toward any party, but being regardful of the rights of Liberals and Conservatives alike.

Very respectfully yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was there any demand for local contributions toward paying the expenses of the marines in Nicaragua?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. We were having a demand for local contributions for flood control, and I thought maybe there might be a demand for local contributions for maintaining peace and order in Nicaragua.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after this letter was delivered to General Moncada, an agreement was reached upon the part of Moncada with his generals that they would surrender their arms upon the promise of the United States to carry out its pledges with reference to the election.

The thing which controls my view of this matter is the fact, whether we had the authority or not, that we went into Nicaragua; that after having been there for a time, we entered into an agreement, and that agreement has been fulfilled upon the part of those with whom we made the agreement. They have discharged the promise which they entered into with the Government of the United States, to wit, to lay down their arms, to surrender their military protection, and to rely entirely upon the United States for their future rights, political and military.

I am going to discuss a little later the question of our authority to make that agreement, but if we had no authority, if we shall find when we come to examine and analyze the powers of the President that the action was without authority, we are estopped at this time, as a Government and as a people, from saying that we did not have the authority, because others have acted on our assurance to their disadvantage, and at the present time if we should refuse to carry out our agreement, we would leave the Liberals in Nicaragua absolutely subject to the dictation and the power of those who had driven them out prior to the time that Diaz became President. I feel that the condition which we superinduced compels us to fulfill our agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand from this correspondence that it was the intention—and I suppose it was carried out—to disarm both sides. If that be true, then I do not see why the Liberals would be under any disadvantage as compared with the Conservatives, if the Conservatives were also disarmed.

Mr. BORAH. I think in a measure, and I think in good faith, both sides were disarmed; but this fact must be borne in mind, that the Conservatives are in power, they are in control of the government, they are in control of the machinery of election, and they have such power, from the very fact that they are in control of the government, as to deprive the Liberals of any probability of protecting themselves in the election.

Mr. EDGE. They have a national guard there.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But they are disarmed.

Mr. BORAH. The Conservatives, I suppose, as far as they can be disarmed have been disarmed; but they are still in the possession of the government.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming we remain in there and supervise the elections, after the elections are over, if the Liberals should be elected, and we should pull out, what is going to happen if Chamorro and Diaz and the same group start another revolution down there?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what will happen, but having given some attention to the Nicaraguan situation now for 16 or 17 years, I have this belief, that if the Liberals elect their President and their Vice President and if they constitute, as I believe they do, 75 or 80 per cent of the people of that country, and will be supported, therefore, by public opinion, and we give them our moral support by recognizing that government, we will have gone the farthest step we could take in restoring stability to the Government of Nicaragua. It may not stand; I do not know. No one can know. But I do know this, that under every rule of democracy and justice the Liberals are entitled to govern Nicaragua if they have the vote; that this election, if fair, will turn the Government of Nicaragua over to those to whom it belongs, that it will take it out of the possession of those who, in my opinion, represent more foreign than domestic interests. Beyond that I do not know. I do not seek to penetrate the veil. I am committed to the proposition of a fair election, hoping, but not knowing, of course, that it will tend to stability and that we may come out.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will we not be considered morally bound to send marines down there and to keep them in power after they are elected?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say this to the Senator: To judge the future by the past, if after they are elected their government falls, if Chamorro and Diaz overthrow it again and our people are placed in danger and property is threatened, we will undoubtedly go back.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator think that the Liberals would be in power now if we had not gone in at all?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know. General Moncada has said that he felt he could have won a military victory, but he said that it was not within his power, or, in his opinion, within the power of any Nicaraguan, under the circumstances, to restore order in Nicaragua. He is a better judge than I am.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said that he believed that the conservative forces were disarmed as much as they could be disarmed and still retain control of the Government. How large is the constabulary which has been set upon under our supervision?

Mr. BORAH. I have the figures here in the hearings, and I would have to recur to the hearings in order to state it accurately. It is not sufficiently large at the present time to maintain order in Nicaragua.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is that constabulary under the control of the Diaz Government, or is it under the control of our officers?

Mr. BORAH. The constabulary at the present time, as I understand, is under the control of our officers. It is supposed to be neutral, neither Conservative nor Liberal, but, of course, the Senator will realize that the moment we step out in all probability it will go under the complete control of the present Government of Nicaragua. I hope those who are studying the Nicaraguan situation will never lose sight of Emiliano Chamorro. I would expect to see him in control if we should come out with the Liberals disarmed and powerless.

After these letters had passed and the communications were had, General Moncada made this statement:

> The Liberals can not believe that the United States Government, through the personal representative of President Coolidge, will give a promise which it will not fulfill.
> Once again the Liberals place their confidence in the United States. The leaders of the army will try to convince their men that this promise of fair elections will be fulfilled. The central point which the army wishes to be assured of is that the United States will do its best to give Nicaragua a fair election in 1928.

To that agreement all generals under General Moncada consented.

It has been said that Sandino did not consent. I think the facts show that Sandino did consent. Afterwards he refused to abide by his agreement, a matter which I need not discuss; but undoubtedly at the time that this obligation was assumed, and at the time that the program was agreed upon, it was understood that Chamorro, now one of the objectors, and Sandino were consenting to the program. It was made, in my opinion, in the utmost good faith upon the part of the Liberal leaders. It was something they had been seeking for 15 years. It was all they desired in order to enable them to take possession of the Government. They agreed to it. They laid down their arms. They are now, in my opinion, at the absolute mercy of the Conservative forces in case we refuse to give them the protection we agreed to give them.

I have a copy of a letter here from Sandino. I have seen the original, and I presume that there is no question about the authenticity of the letter. It will be remembered that the first interview took place at Tipitapa between General Moncada and Mr. Stimson on the 4th of May, and that on the 11th of May the final agreement was reached. Our officers have stated and General Moncada has stated that Sandino agreed to the settlement. This letter is dated May 9, 1927, is addressed to General Moncada and reads:

> EL CACAO DE LOS CHAVARIAS, May 9, 1927.
> Gen. JOSÉ M. MONCADA, > Bouaco (?).
> ESTEEMED GENERAL: I take pleasure in informing you that, having arrived at this place, I have found myself in a difficult position, due to the fact that all of my followers have not joined me, since I have found but a few chiefs, the rest of my troops having gone to Jinotega, the place from whence they came. For this reason I feel that my remaining at this place will avail me nothing, all of my followers having disbanded.
> I have decided to go to Jinotega again to assemble my men in order to collect all the arms. In this case I shall remain there awaiting your orders.
> I likewise delegate my rights in order that you may arrange the matter as may suit you best, informing me of the results at Jinotega, which I shall occupy with my troops.
> The disbanding of my men is due to their not finding anything to eat, and for this reason they have left. However, I assure you that as soon as I arrive they must all come where I am, and then I shall collect all the arms.
> (Signed) A. C. SANDINO.

After this agreement was had an attempt was made to agree upon an election law, which was to be passed by the Congress of Nicaragua and which would give Americans sufficient power to insure a fair election. The law was agreed upon by representatives of the Conservative government and by representatives of the Liberal forces. It passed the Senate and went to the Assembly. At the time it reached the Assembly opposition to it was disclosed, particularly upon the part of Chamorro and his followers.

I digress to read a statement from the last copy of the New York Nation as to why Chamorro came to the conclusion that the law was unconstitutional. Bear in mind, in the first place, that Chamorro did not attach his signature to any paper—there was no occasion for his doing so; he was not an official—yet he was in agreement with the settlement evidently because he felt that the election would be carried on in sympathy with the maintaining of the Conservatives in power, something which had been done for the last 15 years.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not the Senator think that possibly his willingness to agree was his hope that he might be a candidate and was later checkmated by our State Department's desire?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what that had to do with it. I do know, from the most authentic sources, that he came to the conclusion that General McCoy was going to hold a fair election. He made up his mind that General McCoy intended that every man in Nicaragua entitled to vote should have an opportunity to vote, and that being true, that the Liberals would undoubtedly go into power.

In this article Mr. Beale said:

> General Chamorro told me, "I am ardently pro-American."

I think there can be no doubt about that. He is ardently pro-American. He was the gentleman who signed the treaty which transferred the canal to the United States for $3,000,000, when in all probability it was worth many times that. I have no doubt, when, all things considered, ten times that—

> I am ardently pro-American. Nor am I opposed to American intervention in Nicaragua at the present time. I am merely opposed to the form of that intervention lest the supervision proposed seriously violates our constitutional régime.

This is the language of the gentleman who in October, 1926, took possession of Managua and started a revoluion against the duly elected and constituted President and Vice President of Nicaragua. This is the gentleman, so solicitous for the constitution of Nicaragua, who drove three members of the Supreme Court from their places as judges and drove Sacasa from the country and caused a large portion of the assembly to flee for their lives.

Mr. Beale said further:

> This, of course, is quibble. Intervention constitutes, ipso facto, such violation. Chamorro desires to conserve the advantage to his party derived from its control of the Government and hence the election machinery, which McCoy would take out of its hands. The Conservatives were, at first, eager for American intervention and went into the Stimson agreement, thinking that it was a move to disarm and defeat the Liberals; that the United States was actually interested in keeping the Conservative Party in power. But now that it has become apparent that the Stimson agreement actually involves protection for the Liberal Party, the Conservatives are placing every obstacle in the way of the smooth working of the intervention they themselves invited. Chamorro's maneuvering also involves his desire to be a candidate for the Presidency at the forthcoming elections.

That seems to be true. The only opposition in Nicaragua to the carrying out of this agreement is the opposition of Chamorro and the opposition of Sandino.

Mr. President, what will be the effect if we take our troops out at this time? A leader of the Liberals was in my office some three weeks ago on his way to Nicaragua. I was deeply impressed with the sincerity and the fear of the man lest the Liberals be subjected in the future to the dictation of Conservatives by reason of our withdrawing our troops. He stated that if the troops were withdrawn neither he nor his friends nor those associated with them as leaders could stay in Nicaragua, that the feeling was so intense they would be deprived of their residence for the purpose of enabling the Conservatives to effectuate a complete control of the election.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. What is the real fundamental issue between the Liberals and the Conservative Parties in Nicaragua?

Mr. JOHNSON. The offices.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think it is a question of offices.

Mr. WATSON. I did not ask the question in a controversial spirit at all.

Mr. BORAH. I understand. I may be mistaken, but I think the great controversy between Liberals and Conservatives is that the Liberals represent Nicaragua. They represent the people of Nicaragua. They believe in building up their country and maintaining it in the best way possible by the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not true that it is largely a geographical matter?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that enters into it undoubtedly, but the geography does not take away the fundamental principle which Senators will have no difficulty in discovering if they would study the history of Nicaragua from the time Mr. Diaz went into power in 1910 and 1911.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell us who he thinks the Conservatives represent?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I think the Conservatives represent that class of people who believe that Nicaragua can not get along without the aid of foreign capital, and they are perfectly willing to turn the national wealth of Nicaragua over to their direction and dictation in order that they may benefit by that policy.

Mr. BINGHAM. If there is no question of foreign capital involved, will the Senator tell us why it is that when speeches are made here on behalf of Sandino somebody pays for the cablegrams so that they get into the Nicaraguan papers, and when speeches are made here on behalf of the attitude of our Government the Nicaraguan papers do not seem to get any cable dispatches about them at all?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know anything about the inside workings of those things. I can well understand why people would naturally sympathize with Sandino. I think myself that Sandino ought to have kept his agreement. I think it would have been infinitely better for his country if he had kept it. I think it would have placed the Liberal Party in power. I think it was a tremendous error of judgment. Nevertheless, Sandino has been carrying on a fight for what he claims to be the interests of Nicaragua. I can well understand why people would be in sympathy with him and why some of them would pay for telegrams to reach this country.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator does not share the belief that some of those men do, that Sandino is just a bandit?

Mr. BORAH. Not just a bandit, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The thing I do not quite understand in the Senator's statement is that he says it is necessary that this agreement be carried out to hold an election because the Liberals, about 80 per cent of the people, are so anxious to have it carried out and they would be helpless without it, and yet the Senator makes the statement in regard to Sandino that he is acting for and has the sympathy of the Nicaraguan people.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not say that. I was referring to the sympathy of people in this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Has not he the sympathy of the Nicaraguans?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so. I think with the exception of a very few, the people want peace and this election.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the question arises in my mind why it is so difficult to capture a few bandits if there is nobody in the country there who is friendly to them.

Mr. BORAH. It was pretty well pointed out by the gentlemen before our committee why it was difficult, in the recesses of the mountains and in places where it was almost impossible to go, to locate Sandino, and especially when Sandino was seldom in company with his troops. I do not believe that very many people in Nicaragua sympathize with the course which Sandino has taken. I am perfectly satisfied that the great majority of the Liberals, practically all the Liberals, feel that their future welfare in Nicaragua depends upon the faithful carrying out of this agreement. Whatever may be their idea about Sandino as a general proposition, they think that he has made a great mistake in embarrassing the carrying out of this agreement. A number of them have said so. I have had correspondence for the last six months with Liberals and with Americans who reside in Liberal territory. With one single exception they have universally agreed that it was in the interest of the Liberals to carry out the agreement, that Sandino was making a mistake, and that he was not receiving the sympathy of the better element of the Liberals.

Mr. NORRIS. Without questioning the thought that it might be better to carry out the agreement, I think the same writer to whom the Senator has just referred has expressed the opinion in some of his articles that the people of Nicaragua look upon Sandino almost as a god; that he is the George Washington of that country. I could not harmonize that, assuming that he had made a correct statement, with the fact that practically all Liberals were anxious to have Sandino quit.

Mr. BORAH. I read Mr. Beale's statement in which he said that Sandino, in his opinion, had the sympathy of many of the people of Nicaragua. I do not know just how he expressed it, but I know he gave the idea that he had generally the sympathy of the Liberals of Nicaragua. I read from his statement where he said he believed, if he were free, that he could soon raise a large army. I am only placing my judgment against his by reason of the fact that from a reading of the newspapers of Nicaragua—the first time I know of in history that Nicaragua ever had free press—and from other facts I am forced to conclude that the vast majority of the people sympathize with the carrying out of this agreement and want to see it done. I am further supported in that view by letters from Americans living in Liberal territory and from Liberal leaders. It may be that I am in error, but I have no doubt about it in my own mind.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. If it is true that there is such great loyalty to the supervision of Nicaraguan affairs by the United States and that those people are against this so-called bandit, why is there not a veritable uprising of the people of Nicaragua to beat back this alleged rebel?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, if the Senator please. Let me answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Sandino has been located in a part of Nicaragua, so far as his active operations are concerned, where there are very few Nicaraguans. It is altogether probable, as the Nicaraguans have been disarmed and are without any means for carrying on war with Sandino, that they would not volunteer to go in search of him. I can readily understand why they would not do so in view of the treatment which Sandino has given them in two or three instances where they did not subscribe to his program with sufficient satisfaction to himself.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if that be true, would it not be better for the United States Government to permit the people of Nicaragua to organize their government than to beat back this alleged bandit and so-called rebel?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I remember correctly, Admiral Latimer, when asked his opinion of Sandino, as to whether or not he was a bandit, said that he himself personally did not like to have Sandino called a bandit. Does the Senator from Idaho remember that?

Mr. BORAH. I think the admiral said something to the effect that he did not regard Sandino as a bandit in the true sense of the term. I have not called Sandino a bandit. My criticism of Sandino is that he did not go along with the agreement. I feel as the Liberals of Nicaragua that he would have better served his country. I do not find it necessary to go further in attacking Sandino.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit an inquiry? I do not want to interrupt the continuity of his argument.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator could do that.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Idaho may have covered the point I have in mind. As I understand the statement of the Senator—I have only heard a small part of his address, having been detained in the Finance Committee on official business—the Senator is defending our activities in Nicaragua upon the ground that an agreement was entered into respecting the election. Nothing that the Senator has said, as I take it, condones the United States Government going into Nicaragua years ago and our continued occupation of Nicaragua and the use of force there in the past, including the maintenance of marines for a considerable number of years?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President. I have not changed my views which I have expressed from time to time with reference to our policy toward Nicaragua. I said in my opening remarks to-day that I proposed to discuss this matter solely from the standpoint of the condition which we ourselves have superinduced in Nicaragua. I feel very strongly that if we should withdraw from Nicaragua under the present circumstances and conditions we would not only leave Nicaragua to turmoil and strife and bloodshed and leave the Liberals to the mercy of those who have been engaged in depriving them of their rights for the last 15 or 20 years, in ony way and another, but we would forfeit whatever respect we may have among the Central American people generally. Whatever they may think as to our having gone into Nicaragua in the first instance without justification, they now feel, as I believe, that we have entered into an agreement which gives the Liberals of Nicaragua an opportunity to have a hearing. The Liberal sentiment throughout Central America is in sympathy with the Liberals of Nicaragua securing a hearing, and, in my opinion, we should forfeit all respect which we may have in other parts of Central America by betraying the agreement which we made, whether we had any power to make it or not.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Are we not predicating our policy according to the effect that our act has upon Latin America rather than controlling it by what ought to be a proper policy for us to pursue?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the Senator from Georgia will understand that I do not contend that is the only reason. I say that that is one of the things which we should consider. I would take that position if all Central America was opposed to it. We made this agreement, and we are in honor bound to carry it out.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator from Idaho to lay down as a basis of his entire argument—if I misapprehended him, I regret it—that whether we were right in going in or not, whether we were justified and were acting within our power in entering into the agreement to supervise the election, since others have acted upon our undertaking, upon our assurance that we would supervise the election, we were morally bound, and that we were estopped—I think the Senator used that word——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and I take that exact position.

Mr. GEORGE. Then it follows, as a mere corollary to that, that we are formulating our foreign policy upon its effect on the opinion of the Central American people.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President, I do not regard it in that light at all. We went to Nicaragua; we entered into an agreement with those people; we had a reason for doing so. We desired to restore order in Nicaragua, and we made the agreement in good faith.

Now, as to the technical power to make the agreement, I am not at this time discussing it, and I am willing to admit for the sake of the argument that the technical power does not exist; but we made the agreement; the people of Nicaragua relied upon it; they disarmed in consequence of it; and we must carry it out whether the technical power to make it existed or not. That is the position I take. It does not establish a general policy.

Mr. GEORGE. Because to fail to do so would put us in bad repute in every Central American and South American State?

Mr. BORAH. Not alone that, but as a nation we are bound to carry out our agreement which we have made and upon which others have relied.

Mr. GEORGE. Whether we had any right to make the agreement or not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; when others have fulfilled their part of the agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. And whether it should have been made or not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Whether it was even a fair or just agreement?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, I can not quite follow the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I am sorry that the Senator can not follow me. But in view of that agreement and what these people have done under the agreement, I would carry it out whether we had the technical power to make it. It would be an act of dishonor to plead want of power in such circumstances.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think that the approval and carrying forward of an agreement not authorized by Congress, and when it is admitted that it was made without any authorization at all, will encourage Presidents in the future to disregard the law and to make other agreements which may involve us in international troubles even worse than this?

Mr. BORAH. I have not reached that proposition as yet. I have not said, however, that we did not have the power. I said I was assuming for the sake of the argument in presenting this question that we did not have the technical power to make the agreement. I have not admitted, as a matter of fact, that we have not the power, and I am going to discuss that question in a few moments.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are two ways to look at the question of holding an election in a foreign country. I think we are justified, in the first instance, in considering the precedents. In the second place, I think it is fair to examine the proposition upon its merits as to whether or not we would have the power to make such an agreement even if there were no precedents to justify it. But we have been holding elections and supervising elections in the Central American countries for the last twenty-odd years. We have been holding them as a result of agreements upon the part of the Executive. I shall have something to say in a few moments as to whether or not the Executive should consult Congress in regard to them, but, so far as the precedents are concerned, Congress has never been consulted; the President has sent his own representatives, made his own agreements, and has carried them out.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. If the President of the United States has power to enter into an agreement to supervise an election in Nicaragua, he would have the right to agree with the King of England to supervise an election in Ireland or any other place under the British flag. There would not be any distinction, would there?

Mr. BORAH. That is a conclusion at which the Senator arrives but which I do not accept.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask, is there any distinction?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think there is a distinction, a broad distinction, the conditions could never be similar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest it is probably a question of propinquity.

Mr. BORAH. In 1908 the opposition party invited Mr. Taft, the then Secretary of War, to arrange some form of American supervision which would insure free and fair elections in Panama. As a result Mr. Taft suggested to the President of Panama that two American witnesses be present in the booths in every polling district in the Republic to watch the voting and witness the count. A joint commission was also appointed of Americans and Pan Americans to make a thorough investigation of the electoral situation and to confer as to measures to be taken to prevent fraud. So far as I have been able to ascertain, that is the first instance in which we undertook to supervise an election in a foreign country.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator approve the idea of putting Americans into the polling booths in foreign countries?

Mr. BORAH. I am going to discuss that question in a few moments. I said a while ago that if the election in Nicaragua can be associated with the right of the President to protect life and property in a foreign country, if it is one of the methods by which to restore order and to give security and stability to the government, and thereby protection to American lives and property in the foreign country, I think it is one of the methods which may be adopted, when adopted by consent of all parties.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, it will be equally applicable to any country?

Mr. EDGE. It would be considered one of the most peaceful methods, would it not, rather than the method of armed intervention?

Mr. BORAH. It would be applicable to any country where the same conditions prevailed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Where does the right come from, then, to go into any country? If it does not apply to all countries, why is it right in the case of some particular country?

Mr. BORAH. We have got to take into consideration the question of whether or not under the circumstance which existed this is one of the methods by which we can best secure security for our own people and protection to their lives, and whether it is agreeable to all parties.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, if this country shall determine that the best way to preserve the life and property of American citizens is to go into a foreign country and supervise their elections, the Senator says we have got a right to go into any country to do that, if we determine that is the best way to protect their lives?

Mr. BORAH. Not if we determine it; and we did not make the determination in this instance. We took into consideration the consent and acquiescence of those who were interested and the conditions prevailing.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator just before that, however, declared Diaz was a usurper, and, therefore, that he had no right to speak for Nicaragua, did he not?

Mr. BORAH. He was president and he had a right to speak for a part of the people of Nicaragua, as the Liberals had a right to speak for the other part.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator concede that a usurper has a right to speak for the country?

Mr. BORAH. No; but he has the right to speak for those whom he represents, and he speaks for his government so long as he holds the office.

Mr. CARAWAY. Whom does he represent?

Mr. BORAH. He represents the conservative forces in Nicaragua, and he represents the government as he still holds the office.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I understood the Senator correctly a while ago, he said Diaz represented the foreign investors.

Mr. BORAH. He represents the conservative sentiment in Nicaragua.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did not the Senator say he represented foreign investors?

Mr. BORAH. I think he is in sympathy with them and represents them in the respect in which I used the term.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator said he represented them; that is what he represented in Nicaragua. Was not that the Senator's statement?

Mr. BORAH. I said he represented them, in the tense in which I was using the term.

Mr. CARAWAY. Foreign investors have not any right to make an agreement as to what we shall do in Nicaragua, have they?

Mr. BORAH. The Liberals consented to our action.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Liberals consent to it or not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; they did consent to it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, why are we fighting some of them down there now?

Mr. BORAH. Because one who consented to it broke his word.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did not Mr. Stimson, in the Saturday Evening Post, boast that he and the general of the Liberal forces double-crossed their own forces?

Mr. BORAH. I do not so understand.

Mr. CARAWAY. He said, "My men will not agree to it unless we make a certain condition appear to exist when it did not exist."

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not remember that.

Mr. CARAWAY. It would be interesting to read what he said about it.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator has it, I will be glad to have him read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have not it; but I was certain that the Senator, who is so well informed on this question, had read it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think Mr. Stimson said that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; he said that.

Mr. BORAH. I have it here. Will the Senator turn to it?

Mr. CARAWAY. I can not do that now, but I will get it. The Senator, who is so well informed on this matter ought to have known that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a minute?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to make this distinction: The Senator draws a parallel between holding an election in Panama and holding an election in Nicaragua. I do not think we had any right to make any agreement to hold an election in Nicaragua; but I agree with the Senator that since it was made, and the situation has changed, and under this agreement the Liberals have put themselves at the mercy of their enemies we ought to carry out the agreement and keep national faith.

When the Senator speaks of Panama, however, we have a treaty with Panama under which we have a right to enforce law and order there, as we had in the case of Cuba; and if that becomes a part of it, I can see where there would be a good excuse for holding an election as part of the methods of guaranteeing law and order. When the Bryan treaties came to the Senate, however, as I understand, there was a provision in these treaties authorizing us to have the same right in Nicaragua to enforce law and order that we have in Cuba, but it was eliminated. The Senate refused to agree to it, and there is no treaty in the case of Nicaragua that provides that this Government has any authority to enforce law and order there; and, consequently, we stand exactly where we stand with other nations.

In Panama we have a right. In Cuba we have a right under the Platt amendment, but in Nicaragua no such right as that exists; and in passing I only want to emphasize the fact that I disagree with the Senator as to the right of holding an election in Nicaragua similar to our right in either Cuba or Panama.

Mr. BORAH. If we have a right to make a treaty to hold an election, we have a right to make an agreement to hold an election, if the holding of an election is a part of the program of protecting life and property.

Mr. SWANSON. I differ with the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. One moment, Mr. President. I think there is one thing that should be made clear.

Mr. SWANSON. The Constitution says that any treaty made by the President in regard to foreign affairs, and ratified by the Senate, is the law of the land. I think Congress could pass an act authorizing us, as an act of grace or otherwise, to agree with certain people to do certain things——

Mr. BORAH. I said that we could make an agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. But I deny the right of the Executive to do it. Now, I am going to vote against this amendment. I do not think it ought to pass. I think the honor and faith of this Nation is involved with the entire Liberal party, comprising 80 per cent of those people, who trusted us, surrendered their arms, and put themselves at the mercy of their enemies under an agreement with us by which we were to supervise an election. Now, I think good faith requires us to carry it out. I am not going to quibble over whether we had a constitutional right or a legal right or a technical right to make that agreement or not. I think it would be bad faith to refuse to carry out the agreement now.

Some people differed with me as to whether President Wilson had a right, in the Fourteen Points, to agree to autonomy to the Armenians. I stood here in that case as I stand in this. Whether he made the declaration under authority or not, those people trusted to that declaration. Those people sacrificed all and put themselves at the mercy of their enemies, relying on our aid. I, for one, am for carrying out national faith and not making a mere technical argument as to whether or not it is constitutional. I think it would be bad faith not to have that election. I believe it would prevent the Liberals from getting in power. Feeling that way, I am not going to vote to take the marines out until that election is held.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator and I do not disagree about national faith; but I feel that if we are going to pass upon this question of national faith because of the fact that the President of the United States has entered into an agreement which he did not have any right to make we ought to go back a little bit further, because when we first sent the marines down to Nicaragua the President of the United States issued a statement saying that we were going to be neutral, and there has not been any neutrality about it at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me another minute? I do not want to detain the Senate too long.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The way I feel about the matter is this: I think the Administration made a mistake in going into Nicaragua, and I think the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee agrees with me. I think there was no American property in jeopardy there, to be frank and candid with you. I think we had ample means to protect that property. I think the Government, when it recognized Diaz, did not carry out the understanding of the five treaties made with the Central American States, that they would not recognize a government that came into power by revolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield later, if the Senator will permit me to state my views. I do not wish to make a speech and delay a vote.

I feel that when the Secretary of State and the President recognized Diaz they should have recognized Sacasa, as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee thinks. I think he was the constitutional president when the President resigned. We had supervised an election. The Liberal Party and its candidate had won by 48,000 to 28,000. These nations had agreed that they would not recognize a government that came into power by revolution or a coup d'état. The troops went out in August, and in October this revolution occurred. Then we resorted to the little subterfuge of refusing to recognize Chamorro, but we recognized somebody agreeable to his party that brought about the revolution. I think we ought to have refused to recognize anybody in the Conservative Party that stood behind him and forced this revolution. Consequently, we ought to have refused to recognize Diaz and ought substantially to have recognized Sacasa. If that had been done I do not believe any trouble would have occurred there.

To my mind, the administration made a mistake. They realized that three-fourths of the people in Nicaragua were with Sacasa and the Liberals. Chamorro and Diaz had been sustained there heretofore by United States troops, held there for a long time. To withdraw, it was necessary for them to get these Liberals disarmed, because it would take thousands of troops to overpower the Liberals. I believe all this movement about neutral territory was simply a means to help the Conservatives.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask just one question of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Virginia expressed it as his opinion that the troops were not originally sent into Nicaragua for the reasons stated by the President. Is the Senator willing to state to the Senate what reason he believes motivated the Chief Executive in ordering those troops into Nicaragua?

Mr. SWANSON. I stated that I did not believe property was in sufficient jeopardy to justify that excuse for sending them. I think the administration was desirous of recognizing a government dominated by the Conservatives, and by recognition would give them an opportunity to be in power. I think they realized that that was a mistake, that the Liberals had the majority there, and a big majority, and now they are willing to have an election, and that election will put in power the people that they refused to recognize at the beginning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the Senator believe that those troops were sent into Nicaragua for the purpose of sustaining Diaz in his office as President?

Mr. SWANSON. I have an idea that it was under a policy announced by President Coolidge, which I do not agree with, that when we recognize anybody in Central America we ought to make that recognition valuable, and ought to sustain them and give them our support. I have an idea that they went down there because they had recognized Diaz, and felt that they ought to make good any government they recognized in Central America, with which I do not agree.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I trust I shall be permitted to go ahead now, because I do not want to occupy too much time.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator certainly will, as far as I am concerned; and I apologize for having interrupted him at such length.

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to have the Senator's suggestions with regard to the matter, but I do not want to hold the floor very much longer.

This was in 1912, in regard to Panama:

> Both parties requested the supervision of the United States Government in the congressional elections, and the American Government consented to intervene and supervise the registration, and, if necessary, the voting. A committee composed of the Governor of the Canal Zone and two American Army officers was designated for the general supervision of the registration and election. One supervisor was appointed for each of the 61 electoral districts, with one or more assistant supervisors, according to the size of the district, 228 supervisors and assistants being appointed in all. The registration was supervised and the American minister reported that the supervisors had little difficulty in maintaining order and in settling amicably the large majority of the controversies which arose.

That election was not held by reason of a treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. What election was it?

Mr. BORAH. The election of 1912. It was held upon the request of both parties or factions in Panama and was, so far as I have been able to ascertain, purely a voluntary matter upon the part of our Government, based upon their request.

Mr. SWANSON. But, if the Senator will permit me, while I do not like to interrupt him too much, in the case of Panama and Cuba, has not our Government authority, under a treaty, where it thinks order can be restored and maintained by certain action, to take a different course than in cases where no such authority exists?

Mr. BORAH. There is no provision in the Panama treaty providing for holding an election.

Mr. SWANSON. No; but, as I stated, if that is conceived to be the best way to keep order down there, we have an obligation to do that under the treaty, and the President can take that means of doing it.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly my position. I take the position that if through an election we can best establish order and protect life, in which we are interested, our citizens and their property being there, we have the right to conduct an election instead of using gatling guns. I take the further position, however, that it is the obligation of the President, when he desires to hold an election, to consult the Congress of the United States with regard to it. I take that position for this reason: It is the exercise of a sovereign power within the territory of another Government. It is the exercise of a power which is calculated to make trouble; and, therefore, whatever may be the technical right of the President to protect life and property in a foreign country, when it comes to holding an election or comes to doing that which may result in war, the obligation rests upon him to consult the Congress of the United States; but bear in mind that no President has ever done so.

Mr. EDGE. From 1908 up to the present time.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator will concede that in those countries where we have a treaty——

Mr. BORAH. I am going to refer to countries where we did not have any.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before the Senator takes up that matter, how and when are Presidents to be compelled to come to Congress for this authority?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that presents a legal proposition. I wish I knew the exact solution of it. The President has the power, and it is his duty, to protect American life and property in foreign countries. So long as that protection consists of merely defensive acts for the protection of that life and property, I think it belongs to the President exclusively. When it takes the form of aggressive action, taking possession of territory or carrying on a conflict with forces in that country, I think it is carrying on war. I think then the President ought to consult Congress.

I have no doubt at all but that under the Constitution we carried on war in 1910 and 1911 in Nicaragua. I have not any doubt but that in 1915 and 1916 we carried on war in Haiti and San Domingo. I have no doubt but that we are carrying on war now in Nicaragua. In my judgment, the true rule is that which was laid down by one so aggressive as Andrew Jackson, that whenever it takes the form of aggressive action, taking possession of territory or carrying on a conflict with forces in that country, I think it is carrying on war. I think in such cases the President should consult the Congress of the United States, the war-making power. But bear in mind again, my friends, that no President has ever done so since 1903.

Mr. DILL. And as long as Congress ratifies his illegal acts no President ever will come to Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a historical correction, President Buchanan in two messages requested Congress to give him power to enforce the neutrality of the railroad in Panama, which he had the authority to do.

Mr. BORAH. I did not dispute that proposition. I said since 1903. Prior to 1903, so far as I know, no President ever assumed to use our troops in foreign countries in aggressive action without the authority of Congress. I agree perfectly with those Senators who feel that the power of the President ought to be defined and restrained. I will support any proposition which will bring the President to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of getting authority to use the troops in foreign countries whenever we use troops for any kind of aggressive action.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not absolutely possible, and not only possible, but has it not occurred in the present disturbance in Nicaragua, that under certain circumstances a purely defensive movement necessarily becomes an offensive movement overnight?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. Certainly the commandant of the marines, when his marines are attacked by an enemy, must, in the ordinary protection of life, take the offensive, rather than huddle in headquarters while those who are attacking them are getting ready for further attack. Can it not even happen that Congress may not be in session when such an occurrence comes about?

Mr. BORAH. Of course that may happen, and that is the exception. I am supporting in good faith and in all sincerity the action of the administration in carrying out this agreement which was made, but I do not modify my view at all as to our policy toward Central America, and I do not modify my view at all that the President of the United States should never employ the troops in foreign countries when the Congress of the United States is available for consultation, without coming to the Congress, except in purely a defensive way to protect life and property.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have a resolution pending now which provides that the President shall either withdraw the armed forces from Nicaragua, or come to Congress and obtain consent to keep them there. Does not the Senator think that is a sound resolution?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not, for the reason that I do not think we ought to withdraw those troops from Nicaragua.

Mr. HEFLIN. But it provides that in that event he shall come to Congress and consult Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I would be glad to have the President of the United States establish the precedent of consulting Congress whenever Congress is in session or is available, when he desires to employ the troops or keep the troops in a foreign country. But I am not going to vote to bring the troops out of Nicaragua under the present circumstances in order to express my view to the President as to what his policy should be. I will seek a different way than that of violating our pledge to the people who have implicitly trusted our Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. But if Congress should decide that we are in a state of war in Nicaragua, and that the President should obtain an act of Congress declaring war before he should use the troops in Nicaragua, would not Congress have a right to say whether or not it thought the troops were properly there?

Mr. BORAH. That is what we are going to say to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. So the Senator does agree in part with my proposition, that the President should obtain the consent of Congress to keep them there?

Mr. BORAH. My idea, if I my state it again, is this: That the President may employ the troops in a foreign country for the purpose of protecting life and property, as a defensive act, or, I think, he may employ them even when Congress is in session, purely for the purpose of throwing protection about the life and property of our people in a foreign country. But the moment the action takes on the nature of an aggressive action, the seizing of territory, the carrying on of armed conflict, a controversy with any faction or any part of the Government; when it becomes war, as war is defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, a conflict between two opposing forces, I think the President, when Congress is available, should also consult the Congress, and have his authority confirmed by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has simply restated what he said directly a while ago, as I understood it, that in his judgment the President is now carrying on a war in Nicaragua. If that be true, and the Senator believes that he should not do it without the consent of Congress, how can we ever reach a point where we can bring that desirable condition about, as long as we continue to vote to approve those actions which we think are wrong?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would vote right now, this minute, to authorize the President of the United States to employ the troops in Nicaragua for the purpose of carrying out that election agreement. I would not hesitate a moment to do so. I think whatever force is necessary to do that under the circumstances we ought to use, and I would vote to authorize the President, and I believe the Congress would vote to authorize the President, to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not that be a declaration of war, in effect?

Mr. BORAH. It might have that effect.

Mr. EDGE. Against whom?

Mr. NORRIS. Against Nicaragua.

Mr. EDGE. Sandino does not represent any government. As I understand it, he is repudiated by everybody in the government.

Mr. BORAH. Under international law, and under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, in order to carry on war you do not have to have a government to fight. You can carry on war against a faction in a country, you can carry on war against a part of the people of a country. It is not necessary to have a government in order to declare war, or to authorize the use of troops.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, as I understand it, the Senator from Idaho thinks that the President has been wrong in his attitude in sending marines down there, practically waging war against Nicaragua, and yet he states that he would vote now to authorize the President to send troops down there; in other words, because the President has made a mistake, he should be backed up by the Congress of the United States, regardless of the mistake.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have stated my position, perhaps inadequately. It is this: The President has made an agreement with the different factions of Nicaragua. That agreement, in my judgment, was entered into in good faith upon the part of the people of Nicaragua, as well as ourselves. As the result of that agreement, the people of Nicaragua have done certain things. In the first place, the Liberals have disarmed, they have laid down their arms, they are now absolutely without protection, either political or military, except what protection the people of the United States give them. Under those circumstances I would vote unhesitatingly to authorize the President to use the troops for the purpose of doing whatever is necessary to carry out that agreement. In other words, I am perfectly willing to share the responsibility with the President, my view being that, the agreement having been made, the President ought to carry it out. I would not urge him to do that unless as a Senator I was willing to share the responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, would the Senator be willing, as a corollary to that, to vote for a proposition here to give to the President the authority to make agreements with other countries to supervise elections in those countries?

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not. I feel about that just exactly as I do about the question of war. I do not know that anything is to be gained by my expressing my dissent from the policy of the President at this time, but I think that whenever we undertake to exercise the kind of power we must exercise in carrying on elections, the authority of Congress ought to be had.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, as a matter of fact, this agreement was entered into as the result of an act of war, was it not?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When Mr. Stimson told those people that if they did not disarm they would be forcibly disarmed, he stood on their own soil. He had armed forces of the United States back of him, and he said, "If you do not disarm, we will forcibly disarm you." Was not that in itself an act of war?

Mr. BORAH. Standing as the naked proposition which the Senator makes it, it would be so construed, perhaps; but I do not know whether the Senator is familiar with the facts as to why that statement was made.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is enough that it was made.

Mr. BORAH. Well, everybody down there was striving to bring the different people together. There were certain maneuvers which were thought necessary in order to bring them together. I do not think Mr. Stimson had any authority whatever to actually use the troops for the purpose which he indicated.

Mr. EDGE. It at least stopped bloodshed?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I will now proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. So that there may be no misunderstanding—and I think there might be some from the answer the Senator made to the Senator from Minnesota—does the Senator mean that Mr. Stimson overstepped the authority granted him by the President?

Mr. BORAH. Stimson has said publicly, and I have read the statement, that he did not feel it was necessary to make that statement so far as the Liberals were concerned, but that there were certain banditti, or certain people who were not ready to listen to reason, and they thought it would have effect rather upon those who were not represented by any organization or represented by any particular party, but were what you might call the lawless element.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been laboring under the impression, in good faith, all the time that Mr. Stimson was correctly interpreting the intention of the President of the United States. I could not think for a moment that he would make that statement down there, and I can not really believe now that the President would permit it to go uncontradicted, if he said to Moncada and his followers, "If you do not disarm we are going to force you to disarm, we are going to insist that Diaz stay in until the next election." If the President of the United States did not mean he should do that, I should think he would have repudiated it at once.

Mr. BORAH. This is what I had reference to. Mr. Stimson said:

> I included the last sentence not as a threat to Moncada's organized and loyal troops, who, I was confident, would follow their leader's direction, but as a needed warning to the bandit fringe who were watching for any sign that we were not in earnest in order to indulge their taste for pillage once the government troops had laid down their arms and there remained no force in the country other than the Americans able to restrain them.

That is what I had reference to. Just what it means, I do not know. Unless it refers to the lawless element found in all strife-ridden communities.

In 1920 the department, while asked to do so by the opposition, declined to exercise any supervision over the Panama presidential elections of that year.

HAITI

In 1916 Dartiguenave was chosen President by the Congress of Haiti under the protection of American marines, who patrolled the entire city and prevented disorders in Congress during the elections.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I do not want that statement to go unchallenged. He was elected, not by the people of Haiti, but we elected him. We put him in office.

Mr. BORAH. That is very much stronger for my contention.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Our marines elected him.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I accept the Senator's statement. He has been there, and he has made a personal investigation. I have no desire to state it less fully than the facts would justify. Then I will say that in 1916 Dartiguenave was chosen President under the supervision and by the direction and through the influence of the marines. Is that correct?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is correct.

Mr. EDGE. During the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. BORAH. I read further:

In 1920 a new Haitian constitution was adopted by a plebiscite. To insure against any possible demonstration or disorders the Haitian gendarmerie, officered by American marines, was authorized to maintain order and to superintend the voting.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

The gendarmerie officers were instructed to take such measures as would insure (1) that none but citizens of the district voted; (2) that all qualified citizens had an opportunity to vote; (3) that each voter was free to vote "yes" or "no," as he might desire; (4) that all votes were counted; and (5) that the procès-verbal was exact, unambiguous, and honest.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I simply wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that constitution was written in Washington for the Haitian people.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I know. I think that is correct. I think that constitution was written by Mr. Franklin Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and was sent down to Haiti to be adopted by the Haitian people, and that it was adopted under the direction and authority of our marines.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I see some Senators laughing. As a matter of fact, the marine officers went out and addressed the people, and told them to go and vote for this constitution, because, they said, the Government of the United States wanted them to adopt it. The Haitian people did not want it, because it had a provision in it that they had always been opposed to; that is, that outsiders and foreigners could own land in Haiti.

In the constitution we wrote for them we incorporated a provision that foreigners could own land, and it was necessary to have marines at the polling places to keep the people quiet.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has several times addressed the Senate on that subject, and I remember very distinctly his telling how the election was held. I have read and heard of others who told the same story. So that I think it is historically true that what the Senator has said, or read, in his statement, is absolutely correct—that the people of Haiti as a matter of fact had not anything to do with it.

There was a form of election held, but the result of the election was known beforehand and there was only one way in which that election could result.

The elections for a constituent assembly in 1913 were watched by a commission appointed by the department—consisting of Messrs. Gibson, Stabler, and Sterling—but this commission does not appear to have had any jurisdiction or authority.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not think the President should act without our advice?

Mr. BORAH. No; the President ought to consult the Congress, it seems to me, when we come to making agreements such as this.

In 1914 the elections were observed by American officials, both civil and military.

In May, 1920, the American legation was directed to suggest to the President of Nicaragua the desirability of extending an invitation to General Crowder to proceed to Nicaragua for the purpose of undertaking an expert study of the election laws and of proposing such revision or amendments as he might deem necessary. The President replied that such a course would be inconvenient at that time because of the proximity of elections, and continued by stating that the existing election laws amply provided for free elections.

In September, 1920, Maj. Jesse I. Miller proceeded to Nicaragua and became military attaché to the legation at Managua to serve during the electoral period. Major Miller's instructions were to visit various parts of the Republic and after a study of the situation, if he had reason to believe that steps were being taken by Nicaraguan officials to prevent free elections, or for the practice of fraud or intimidation, that he secure an audience with President Chamorro and bring to the latter's attention the gravest concern with which the United States viewed such actions. He was further to state that the sole interest of the Government of the United States lay in its deep concern in all matters affecting the welfare of the people of Nicaragua and its interest to see that the elections were characterized by entire fairness and freedom.

In 1920, elections having been concluded, the Nicaraguan Government on December 18, 1920, formally requested the assistance of the United States in obtaining the services of General Crowder or some other expert to assist in a reform of the electoral laws, stating that the person so selected would receive from the Nicaraguan Government all the necessary help for the best fulfillment of his mission.

The Secretary of State thereupon suggested the name of Dr. Harold W. Dodds, who entered into an agreement with the Nicaraguan Government, resulting from direct negotiations with that Republic's minister in Washington, and proceeded to Nicaragua, where he drafted an electoral law which was passed by the Nicaraguan Congress on March 16, 1923.

In September, 1923, the executive council of the Liberal Party passed a resolution to request the Government of the United States to supervise the forthcoming elections.

Many difficulties were encountered in carrying out the registration and election under the provisions of the Dodds's electoral law. Four United States marines in civilian dress were assigned to assist Doctor Dodds in the registration of voters at Chinandega in March, 1923. The Nicaraguan Government stated at that time that it not only had no objection to the use of marines for this purpose but would give its consent to similar action in other places.

I may say that this is the election in which Solorzano and Sacasa were elected, an election wherein the election law had been drawn by Americans, an election which was in fact supervised by Americans and which resulted in the election of Solorzano and Sacasa, who were the duly elected president and vice president at the time that Chamorro and Diaz organized their revolution in 1925.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not fair to state right there that they would probably have continued to serve throughout their term had not the marines been withdrawn, and that the revolution to which the Senator refers, which was continued by General Chamorro, came very soon after we withdrew our marines?

Mr. BORAH. My view is that the Senator is correct in his statement of facts. As to his conclusion, of course, I could not say. It may be a fair presumption that they would have remained in power had our marines stayed there.

Aside from precedents, by what authority do we obligate ourselves to supervise an election in Nicaragua? It can not be defended as a right or authority in and of itself. It must be associated with and grow out of our right and authority to protect the lives and property of our nationals. It must spring from our duty to protect our people in a foreign country. We were in Nicaragua. We were there to protect the lives and property of our people, which under international law we had a right to do. Turmoil and bloodshed and internecine war prevailed. The Government of Nicaragua seemed powerless to restore order and thereby give security to life and property. It was believed by all parties that order could be restored by the holding of a fair election, but that that fair election could not be held without the interposition of the United States. The restoration of order brought about in this way would bring security to life and property. It seems to me that the method adopted can reasonably be associated with the protection which we are authorized to give to the lives and property of our nationals. In other words, instead of using weapons of warfare, we use the ballot. It was the method believed to be effective by all parties. This is my view of this authority. I can not argue it at this late hour. But I am bound to say that this matter of holding elections involves an agreement with somebody and an agreement which imposes certain obligations upon our Government. I believe that the Senate of the United States ought to be consulted with reference to that agreement. I would not under the circumstances repudiate this agreement because the Senate was not consulted. But I feel that such course would be the proper course to pursue. It is the exercise of sovereignty within another country. All of which seems to argue most conclusively that the Senate, or perhaps the Congress, should authorize the action; that at least the Executive and the treaty-making power ought to cooperate. Furthermore, the holding of an election can never be of an exigent nature so as to preclude the consideration of the matter by the Congress.

Mr. President, I want briefly to call attention to some views expressed by people now in Nicaragua, who have been there for some time, as to what the effect would be of our withdrawing our troops. I first quote from Mr. Denny, who is a correspondent of the New York Times. I have read his reports for the last several months and my impression is that he is very fair, very accurate, that he is not a protagonist of any faction but seems to be desirous of giving the situation as it really exists. He said:

> The Nicaraguans themselves, Conservatives and Liberals alike, declare unreservedly that anarchy would descend on the country again if the United States withdrew its forces.
> When Col. Henry L. Stimson intervened as the personal representative of President Coolidge last May and ended the revolution he induced General José Moncada, the Liberal leader, to lay down his arms at the moment when he felt within sight of victory by promising free presidential elections this autumn.
> Both the Diaz government and the Liberals agreed upon United States supervision as the best means to obtain such an election. Since the word of the United States has been given, no well-informed person here except the Chamorristas sees how it can turn aside from complete fulfillment of that pledge and retain a vestige of Latin America's respect.
> CONSERVATIVES OPPOSE SUPERVISION
> General Chamorro and the considerable portion of the Conservative Party, which he controls completely, are now trying tooth and nail to block effective supervision by the United States and the Sandinistos have become an invaluable aid to them whether or not Chamorro and Sandino themselves desired to be allies. The Chamorro bloc seems to have almost forgotten its earlier argument that the transitory electoral provision now before the Nicaraguan Congress was unconstitutional and in place of this is objecting that free elections can not be held with the northern departments torn by the disorder due to Sandino's operations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator think that if we allow a precedent to be established, whereby the President of the United States through his representatives can make certain agreements which may make it necessary to go to war without a declaration of Congress to that effect, it is a very dangerous precedent to establish?

Mr. BORAH. Under the circumstances I should not regard this case as a precedent at all. I have stated my views about the proposition and would be perfectly willing to support any measure which would establish a principle or put upon the statute books a law which would be indicative of the views of Congress in regard to it. However unfortunate it may be, does not the Senator think that we take great chances, after having done what we have done, in withdrawing our troops and leaving the Nicaraguan situation without any stabilizing force whatever? That would establish a precedent we should never think of establishing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I shall express my views on that subject later.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I shall wait until the Senator expresses his view.

I now desire to read a paragraph from a letter from a gentleman long residing in Nicaragua, an American pursuing his profession and his business in that country. He resides at Bluefields. For manifest reasons I will not give his name to the public, although I would be perfectly willing to give it to Senators. I have had letters from him from time to time since this trouble began last year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. This gentleman says, referring to the Chamorro faction:

> The faction is much afraid that Gen. Frank R. McCoy will have the power and really intends to give the country a free and fair election this fall; and, as all such emotions as well as the inspiration of certain actions emanate, where the gang is concerned, from Wall Street, the fact that the Nicaraguan Congress, a Diaz-Chamorro hand-picked body, despite anything you have heard or may hear to the contrary, has recently refused its sanction of the promised election supervision on the ground that to allow such a procedure would be beneath its dignity as the supreme legislative body of a free and sovereign state, arouses the suspicion that this farcical action may have received its impetus from other sources.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator, in view of his statement in reply to the Senator from Minnesota, whether he believes, even if we remain to conduct the election, that we will not be compelled, under the same principles of honor for which the Senator is contending, to remain indefinitely, because, from the information I have received from those who have been there recently and letters from that vicinity, there is a strong feeling upon the part of many that the presence of the United States is an insult to the honor and integrity of that country, and those who would perhaps be satisfied with the result of the election would feel it was unjust and improper for the United States to take charge of their election, and that, therefore, the result will be, unless we maintain the marines there indefinitely, a revolt and we will be compelled to remain longer and keep our marines there for the purpose of pacification and the maintenance of peace. Does not the Senator think that by conducting the election we are merely laying the foundation for remaining there indefinitely?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, there may be and undoubtedly are people in Nicaragua, at least a few of them, who do not desire to see us hold this election. But I have no doubt at all that outside of the forces which Chamorro has now been able to organize, the great mass of the people of Nicaragua want this election. They believe it is the beginning of a possible stable government in Nicaragua. I do not know and no one this side of heaven knows what the actual result will be in the future, but that does not seem to me to be the sole controlling proposition. We have a situation which we superinduced. We have an obligation which we have assumed. The obligation seems to point, if it is possible, to a better condition of affairs. We must carry out our obligation. If we carry out our obligation in good faith, if the unfortunate results nevertheless, we will be, it seems to me, with a clear conscience and a just position before the world. But if we do not carry out the obligation, if we leave the Liberals to the mercy of those who control the situation, if we turn the situation back to those who have controlled it for the last 15 years, it seems to me that we are inviting disaster there, and certainly inviting criticism for ourselves.

I do not know what the future has in store. In 1910 and 1911 I made the same protest against the situation that I have made in 1927, but three administrations remained in Nicaragua. The marines camped on the white house grounds during the administration of three Presidents. It may happen again. I do not know. I hope to the contrary. I should like to see us get out of Nicaragua and stay out, as soon as we can do so honorably.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may interrupt the Senator there, I desire to say that I thoroughly agree with the last statement he has made, but I want to suggest a danger, as it appears to me. Even on the theory that we ought to get out of Nicaragua, if we can, and we ought to get out honorably, there may be a disagreement as to whether we are not in honor bound to stay in. However, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that one of the dangerous things is the establishment of a precedent that might be used perhaps by a tyrant in the future. Does not the Senator think that the great danger is that every administration is going a little bit further, reaching out just a little bit more, and, the precedent being established, that some President in the future may use it for the purpose of getting us into war with any country with which the President himself thinks we ought to wage war, notwithstanding Congress may be opposed to a declaration of war?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to state that there is an additional reason than the one that has been given by the Senator; namely, that we ought to consider ourselves; that the destiny and the welfare and the future of our own country may be at stake when we tread on such dangerous ground.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the Congress of the United States can exercise its power at any time it may choose to do so against any precedent that may be established. I am unwilling, however, out of fear of the precedent, to violate what I think to be a national obligation resting in honor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If some President in the future should use the precedent established here to bring about a condition of hostilities between this country and some other country, would not the same argument then be made for Congress ratifying the action that the Senator is now making for the continued presence of American marines in Nicaragua?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the same circumstances and conditions should arise, I presume the argument would be raised and undoubtedly raised effectively; but if the Congress wants to control the situation, if Congress wants to define the power of the President and destroy the effect of all of the precedents which have been established, Congress may do so. I venture to say, however, that Congress will not do so.

However much we may disagree with what President Coolidge did, President Coolidge had ample precedents for the action he took. Congress may destroy those precedents as well as this precedent by establishing permanently a rule of action with reference to such situations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion right there. I think the Congress and country are looking to the Senator from Idaho for leadership in that very direction. The Senator from Idaho is chairman of the great committee that is charged with the consideration of questions of this kind. I am not criticising the Senator, but if we had from the Senator from Idaho or his committee some prospect of a bill that would accomplish what the Senator has suggested I do not believe there would be any fight in favor of the pending amendment or any similar amendment. But it almost seems as though we are at sea when the Senator from Idaho, with all of his ability, and his position as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, holding the views that he holds, has not brought before us such proposed legislation as will remedy the situation and destroy these precedents.

I think it is natural that we are filled with a fear when thinking only of the welfare of our own country we realize that to continue to follow these precedents will some time, when there is a more ambitious President, perhaps, in the White House than now, get us into war with a country that may mean much more than a war with Nicaragua would mean.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should be very glad to have the cooperation of those who agree with me upon this matter in framing a policy or framing a measure which might define our position and define the powers of the President, but I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that it is not an easy thing to do.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it is not.

Mr. BORAH. I venture to say that 60 or 70 per cent of my time since the Senator from Nebraska submitted his resolution upon this subject, when I have not actually been engaged in matters on the floor, has been devoted to writing a brief upon that subject. I have what I believe to be the law, but I do not know that any other Senator would take that view. It is a very difficult proposition to deal with. I am deeply interested in the subject and hope with the aid of others to reach some definite program.

I have here a letter written by a gentleman who is a resident of California, and who came to me with a letter of recommendation from Doctor Jordan, and I gave him a letter to my friends in Nicaragua. Writing me under date of January 18, 1928, he says:

> I have lived in this country most of the past six years and I am somewhat familiar with its peculiar politics.
> The fact seems to be that, notwithstanding the explicitness of the treaty, the Conservatives looked upon the return of the marines as a return to the political conditions of 1912–1923, when the elections were entirely in their own hands, and the marines prevented any uprising against them.
> Gradually the belief has been growing upon them that the old conditions are not to prevail; that, on the contrary, the Americans are going to do exactly what they said they would do: Let the majority of the people determine who shall govern. And as they have been coming to see this, a discontent with the American intrusion has taken place among certain of the leaders. This discontent has been accentuated by the results of the municipal elections, which were generally unfavorable to the Conservatives, notwithstanding there was no supervision of the polls, but only a restraint imposed by the simple presence of the marines.
> The latest manifestation of their state of mind is to be seen in the rejection by the chamber of deputies (Conservative) of the transitory election law proposed by the American Government and accepted by President Diaz.

And so forth.

It is very clear to my mind that the objections now being raised to the Americans' supervising the election are being raised by those who do not want a fair election, who are afraid of the results of the election, who believe that it will give the Liberals control of Nicaragua, and that, outside of that objection upon the part of those men or the limited few, the great body of the people of Nicaragua are relying upon the United States to carry out its agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, can the Senator give us any information about the influences that brought about the defeat of the legislation proposed, and how the situation was met?

Mr. BORAH. The defeat was brought about through the activities of Mr. Chamorro. He secured the cooperation of a sufficient number of his friends to defeat the passage of the law. After the law was defeated, the President of Nicaragua, under what he claims to be the sufficient authority of the constitution, issued a decree the practical result of which is to place General McCoy in charge of the elections instead of the particular individuals who would have had charge of it had not the decree been issued.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does that mean that Chamorro still controls the Congress there?

Mr. BORAH. It means that he controls the lower body.

Mr. President, just a word in conclusion.

I said in my opening statement that I did not desire to be understood as discussing the Central American question, or the Central American policy, or the question of the Nicaraguan policy, other than as it relates to the particular situation with which we have to deal. That particular situation, to epitomize, is this:

We went into Nicaragua in 1926 and 1927. It was my judgment that we ought not to have gone, but we did. We recognized Diaz. It was my opinion that he was not the legally elected President of Nicaragua. The executive department was of a different view; so we went into Nicaragua and established the marines in such places as we thought necessary for protecting the lives and property of American citizens.

Things grew worse—more demoralized—until, when Mr. Stimson went there in March, 1927, the country was in a state of civil war. Neither side was any longer taking prisoners. People slain were permitted to rot where they fell; and it was an actual fact that the birds of prey were living upon the carcasses resulting from the warfare that was being carried on in Nicaragua. The condition was such that in order to establish the security which is necessary for the protection of life and property some understanding had to be reached.

Stimson came to an agreement with all the representatives of the different parties, and everyone of any note or prominence in Nicaragua agreed to the program. Chamorro was satisfied; Diaz was satisfied; Moncada was satisfied; Sacasa and his representatives were satisfied; the generals of Moncada were satisfied.

After the election law was defeated, it was revealed that Chamorro had changed his view; and why? It is established beyond peradventure that the reason why he changed his view was because he became convinced that the United States was going to hold a real election in Nicaragua, and that if a real election should result the Liberals, who had been practically disfranchised for 15 years, would take control of Nicaragua. When Admiral Long sent in his report, back in 1910 and 1911, he stated to this Government that 80 per cent of the people of Nicaragua were opposed to the Diaz government; and that has been the condition from that time until now.

This is the first real opportunity the Liberals have had to record their votes for over 16 years. The United States pledged its honor that they should record their votes. Technically, the United States may have gone beyond its power; but the pledge has been made, and, in the language of Lincoln upon a great occasion, the pledge, having been made, must be kept.

If we should withdraw at this time we would leave Nicaragua to turmoil and civil strife and discredit ourselves with the whole of Central America. The path of honor is perfectly plain. There are no two courses open. We must keep our word, and I have no doubt we will keep our word.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho said that he was very willing to answer any questions that might be asked along the line of his argument. I appreciate that he has given years of study to this proposition; and there are two questions that I should like to ask. I am sure that when answered they will afford valuable information.

As I understand, Diaz was elected November 11, 1926, and the American Government recognized that Government on November 17, 1926. The day following American bankers arranged with Diaz for an immediate loan of $300,000 and a future loan of $6,000,000.

I wish to inquire of the Senator to what extent, in his opinion, this matter of foreign loans by American bankers has influenced our foreign policy, and the part which those loans played in the carrying out of that so-called foreign policy.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that this particular loan had anything to do with the actions of our Government with reference to recognizing Diaz or sending troops. I have no knowledge on that subject at all. Of course, our Government is influenced by our investments in Central American countries, because it is for the purpose of protecting those investments and our property interests and the lives of our people who are there that we send marines into those countries. But I have no information whatever as to any bearing which this particular loan had upon our particular policy at this particular time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, another question. The information may not be available, but here is a circumstance that Diaz was elected, and, as the Senator has said, in his opinion, wrongfully elected. Then the Government of the United States recognized that government six days afterwards, and American bankers the next day made arrangements for certain loans. The circumstances are rather incriminating, and I think that Congress has a perfect right to investigate those circumstances, and harmonize a policy which might prevent untoward circumstances that flow out of the present diplomacy of America, which is, in effect, a guaranty of loans made by international bankers.

Mr. President, I would like to ask another question of the Senator. Is it the Senator's opinion that if Congress should pass a resolution expressing its opinion, that resolution would have any binding effect upon the President in the conduct of our foreign affairs?

Mr. BORAH. I could not say that the President would not pay any attention to it, but, of course, the constitutional power of the President could not be controlled by a resolution of Congress. If the President were exercising unconstitutional powers, Congress would undoubtedly have the means of controlling. For instance, in my judgment, the President has the power, under the Constitution, to employ troops for the purpose of protecting lives and property of American citizens in a foreign country. We could not, in my judgment, take that power away from him, because it is granted by the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator refers to the power of the President under the Constitution to employ troops to protect our interests. The fact is, is it not, as a legal conclusion, that under the Constitution the President is merely made the Commander in Chief of an army and navy when that army and navy have once been created by Congress; the rules and regulations for the conduct of that army and navy initiated by Congress, and money appropriated for the support of that army and navy? Without those conditions precedent, the power of the President as Commander in Chief is merely a paper power. As I said yesterday, he might command a navy, but it would be painted ships upon a painted ocean. He might command of an army, but it would be an army of hobbyhorses commanded by a Commander in Chief on a hobbyhorse.

There must be the means by which that power as Commander in Chief may be carried out, and the power does not exist until there is an army and navy, and all the other conditions precedent. Congress may also limit the strength of the Army, the extent to which it may be used, and when Congress so legislates, then the President, as Commander in Chief, has the constitutional power to command the Army and Navy for the purposes designed by the Constitution and within the limits of legislation fixed by Congress; and in war time, in addition to that, the limitations fixed by the rules of international law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Congress does not see fit to create an army, the President has no army to command. If the Congress does not see fit to create a navy, the President has no navy to command, because there is no navy in existence. But once an army and a navy are in existence he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. Whatever relates to command, whatever is incorporated in the idea of command, belongs to the President, and you can not take it away from the President. It is given to him by the Constitution.

That is not the only power the President has which applies in this particular instance. He is not only the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, but it also rests upon him to enforce the laws of the United States. It is not only the domestic law of the United States, but international law is a part of the law of the United States also; and when a citizen goes from this country into a foreign country he is not under the domestic law alone with reference to his rights, but he passes under international law; and whatever right he has under international law the President is also under obligation to see that he enjoys.

Therefore the minute our people go into Nicaragua or into any other country there are certain rights which belong to them by virtue of international law, and one of those rights is the right to life; another is the right to the protection of their property; and it is the duty of the President to enforce international law. That is a part of the oath which he takes when he takes his oath as President of the United States. Not only any law that Congress passes but international law is a part of the law which the President of the United States must enforce.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I propound to the Senator this question. The President must exercise that constitutional power within the law fixed by Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily. If it is a power expressly granted by the Constitution, he enjoys it by virtue of the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. If that is not correct, then the President of the United States has become an unlimited potenate.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAINE. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. No; not at all.

Mr. BLAINE. As absolute as the most absolute absolutism that ever existed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States has delegated certain powers to the President; it has delegated certain powers to Congress and certain powers to the judiciary. Congress can not exercise judicial powers or take them away from the courts. Congress can not exercise executive power specifically granted or take it away from the President. The President's powers are defined by the Constitution. Whatever power belongs to the President by virtue of constitutional provisions, Congress can not take away from him. In other words, Congress can not take away from the President the power to command the Army and the Navy of the United States. Congress can not take away from the President the power to grant pardons, which is a specific power given to the President. Congress can not deprive the President of the primary power to see that the laws of the United States are enforced. Those are powers delegated to the President by the Constitution of the United States, and the Congress is bound by the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. Another question. All that the Senator has said in a general way is sound constitutional law, but before there can be any action on the part of any Government unit requiring the expenditure of funds that are in the Public Treasury, or that may be placed in the Public Treasury, Congress must first act and make an appropriation for every essential purpose. That money so appropriated can be used for no other purpose than that designated by Congress, and there is no power that can coerce Congress into making an appropriation. Therefore, Congress's power over matters respecting the making of war unlawfully, beyond the power of the President, outside of the Constitution or within the Constitution, or conducting hostilities in the nature of war during peace times, can be limited and regulated under the power of Congress to appropriate money.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I do not disagree with the proposition that if Congress does not create an army, or does not provide for an army, or create a navy, the President can not exercise his control or command over an army or navy which does not exist. But once an army is created, once a navy is in existence, the right to command belongs to the President, and the Congress can not take that power away from him.

Mr. BLAINE. Just one other question, and then I will desist. Does the Senator contend that when the Army is created, or when the Navy is created, Congress then must appropriate money, without limit and without restrictions, to meet the demands of the President as Commander in Chief; or must the President exercise his power within the limits fixed by Congress, the only power having the constitutional right to make an appropriation?

Mr. BORAH. Congress is the only power that can appropriate money. The President can not appropriate money, neither can Congress command the Army and the Navy.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have had occasion to look into this question since the resolution was introduced by the Senator from Nebraska. I think the contention made by the Senator about half an hour ago is the correct one. When the question came up in the Constitutional Convention as to making war, as first reported, the Congress had the power to "make" war. It was provided that "Congress alone shall have the power to make war." I think it was on the motion of Madison that the word "make" was stricken out and the word "declare" inserted. He took the ground that if that language remained the President could not conduct a defensive war. After much debate the word "make" was stricken out, and the word "declare" was inserted. The first interpretation ever made of that language was when Jefferson was President, in connection with the War with Tripoli.

Jefferson made this distinction: He said he had a right to defend our commerce, but he had no right to go into Tripoli and pursue the enemy, as he thought that would be an aggressive war. I think it is the opinion of the Senator, if I understood his remarks, that the President has a right, in a defensive way, for defensive purposes alone, to make war, but when it comes to aggressive warfare, going further, as Jefferson said in his message to Congress, if I recollect it aright, he could not go any further than simply to defend American rights, and wage a defensive warfare. As I understand, that has been the distinction most writers have made in connection with that question.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, just one other question of the distinguished Senator from Idaho. I know that ordinarily he does not hedge. I want to press him just once more to give us the value of his training as a constitutional lawyer.

I repeat, assuming that Congress has created an army and has created a navy, after that is all done, then may Congress not limit the uses to which money may be put by the President as Commander in Chief in the operation and in the command of the Army and Navy?

The Senator has said that, of course, if we do not create an army and navy, then there is nothing over which the President has command. But we have an Army and a Navy. Can not Congress limit, by legislation, under its appropriation acts, the purposes for which money may be used by the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the Senator means by "purposes for which it may be used." Undoubtedly the Congress may refuse to appropriate and undoubtedly the Congress may say that an appropriation is for a specific purpose. In that respect the President would undoubtedly be bound by it. But the Congress could not, through the power of appropriation, in my judgment, infringe upon the right of the President to command whatever army he might find. Congress might, by refusing to make an appropriation or by limiting it to a specific purpose, make it physically impossible for the President to discharge his duty in a particular instance. If I understand the Senator, that is my reply.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Suppose the Congress in its judgment limited the appropriation to very moderate figures and the appropriation had been exhausted at a certain time during the fiscal year; that then a situation occurred somewhat similar to that which we now have in Nicaragua, where, at least in the judgment of the President under his constitutional responsibility, troops should be sent to Nicaragua in order to protect American lives or American property. Suppose he had absolutely no money in the appropriation, as an investigation of that situation would disclose. Yet under the Constitution, as the Senator has very definitely stated, it is his responsibility, and his alone, and Congress can not in any way circumscribe that responsibility. Would the President have the power to send the Army or a portion of the Army to Nicaragua even though he knew there was not a dollar in the Treasury; or, to put it in another way, would it be his duty, if he felt that armed troops should be sent to Nicaragua under the Constitution, to protect American lives and property?

Mr. BORAH. That would depend entirely, in my judgment, upon the risk the President was willing to take with reference to compensation for the services rendered by those whom he should send. I can only repeat what I said, that, of course, if we wish to take away from the President the Army or the Navy or the means of sustaining them, we may undoubtedly do so, and the President thereby would be deprived of his power to exercise the authority of command. But if the Army is in existence, if the Navy is in existence, if it is subject to command, he may send it where he will in the discharge of his duty to protect the life and property of American citizens. Undoubtedly he could send it, although the money were not in the Treasury. What the result would be in the future as to appropriations would be another thing. I do not challenge the proposition that by refusing to appropriate, the President may be affected in the exercise of his power to command. The Congress might also refuse to appropriate for the Supreme Court for marshals, but why speculate about fanciful things?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. A few moments ago there was discussion with reference to depriving the President of his power. Of course, no one can be deprived of power he does not possess. What I would like to have the Senator's opinion on is whether or not the President has the power to enter into an agreement with any foreign government, an agreement of any kind that may lead to war or an act of war on the part of the United States, without first consulting the Congress?

Mr. BORAH. No. I do not think the President has power to make an agreement looking to war or which may logically lead to war without consulting Congress.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator agree that the violation of the sovereignty of any foreign power is an act of war?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is an act of war; but I want to make the distinction that I think it is a fairly established rule of international law, that the sending of troops into a country to protect the life and property of a citizen is not an act of war. It is not regarded as intervention.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with the Senator in that and I do not want to take away from the President the power to use the troops to protect American life and property.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator could not take it away from the President even if he wanted to do so. It is a power which belongs to him. We can not take it away from him.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But what I am protesting against is his using a power that he does not have.

Mr. BORAH. The only remedies that I know of for that are two: First, the remedy which the people have of electing somebody else as President; and second, the remedy which the Congress has of impeaching him.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think any American life or property was at stake in Nicaragua last spring upon the facts as they are known?

Mr. BORAH. It was my view at the time the troops went in that the facts did not justify sending them in. I have not had any reason to change that view. But I do want to say, because I desire to be fair to the President——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So do I.

Mr. BORAH. That the facts submitted to the President convinced the President that life and property were in danger, and he was the one who had to judge.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And also that the agents of the Soviet Government of Russia and the Government of Mexico were in there working against our interests. The President and Secretary of State so informed the country and the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the people of Nicaragua had nothing in the world to do with the soviet representatives and the soviet people.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course not.

Mr. BORAH. I do not suppose there is any country anywhere that has in it as little of communism as there is in those Central American countries. Of course the Senator understands——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand the Senator's view very well.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator understands that everything nowadays that we do not agree with is called communism or bolshevism.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand the Senator's point of view. I can not agree with him on the idea that the President has the right to make agreements that Congress at all times is bound to uphold.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to do it, but I can not force myself to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I have not said anything of that kind.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understood the Senator to say in the midst of his closing remarks that, the agreement having been entered into, it must be kept. That in general is a very good policy. The fact, however, that those in charge of the foreign offices of government all over the world having been permitted to pledge their governments to agreements that might lead to war under certain circumstances, has always led to war, or whenever the parties to the agreement have called for fulfillment, as was done at the outbreak of the last World War, on account of secret agreements, countries had to go to war. That is a precedent I do not want the United States Government to establish.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator upon that proposition. I do not want the President of the United States to establish precedents looking to making agreements which may lead to war. I quite agree with that proposition. But I think the agreement which the President of the United States made in this particular instance was an agreement which was not designed to lead to war, but was an agreement which was calculated to lead to peace and did lead to peace. So far as the Liberal forces and the Conservative forces of Nicaragua are concerned, the conflict ceased almost immediately after the making of the agreement. The only exception to that really was the Sandino forces, and we could not anticipate that, because Sandino himself had agreed to come into the agreement. We could not anticipate the breaking of the agreement, and neither am I willing, because some other party has broken the agreement, that the United States shall break it.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD some excerpts from documents which I was prevented from reading by reason of interruptions.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When we go in to protect life and property it has usually been done in this manner: We tell the two contending forces, "You can not fight here. There is some American property here. There are some American citizens here. You will have to go outside of where those Americans live if you want to fight." Does the Senator think that is sound doctrine from the standpoint of international law?

Mr. BORAH. If the Commander in Chief should in good faith arrive at the conclusion that the best way to protect American life and property was to establish a neutral zone as a matter of military tactics or rather as a matter of Executive tactics, he would undoubtedly have the right to do it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If he had the power to do it.

Mr. BORAH. He has the power to do it if it is confined to the mere protecting of American life and property. So long as he acts purely in the defense of American life and property I think he is well within his rights and is exercising a right which we can not take away from him.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let me suggest an illustration to carry out that idea to its ultimate conclusion. Let us assume that when the two great armies that fought at Gettysburg were about to join in combat, there had been an Englishman running a grocery store and a livery stable between the two contending forces; and suppose the British ambassador had said, "Your armies can not fight here; we are going to establish a neutral zone and protect the property and life of English citizens." That is the policy we have been carrying out in Central America. Does the Senator mean to say that that is a sound policy?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I think under the circumstances stated by the Senator that I would regard the Englishman as taking the chances in that instance.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator not think he ought to take the chances as a matter of international law?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; he ought to take the chances; but the Senator is now speaking of a condition——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not speaking facetiously at all.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is not speaking facetiously—not intentionally so—but I think his statement is facetious.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course, I can not control the Senator's opinion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask in this connection that there may be printed in the RECORD the adverse report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the Senate Joint Resolution 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

WITHDRAWAL OF ARMED FORCES FROM NICARAGUA

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following adverse report (to accompany S. J. Res. 57):

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57), having considered the same, report the resolution adversely.

The resolution directs the President to withdraw the troops in Nicaragua in the following language:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to immediately withdraw from Nicaragua the armed forces of the United States."

The committee is of the opinion that under the agreement which this Government made with the Nicaraguan Government and with the leaders of the Liberal Party to hold an election in that country and to protect all parties in their rights to a fair election, we can not in justice withdraw our troops at this time. Upon the strength of this agreement to hold an election, the Liberals laid down their arms and not only laid down their arms but surrendered their arms. They intrusted their affairs, both as to elections and as to their safety, to the promise of the United States. To withdraw our troops at this time would not only leave the entire machinery of the election absolutely in the hands of the Conservatives but leave the Liberals helpless to defend themselves or to protect themselves either in the matter of the election or against the violence of their antagonists.

Whatever may be our views with regard to matters transpiring before the agreement and as to the events which led up to the agreement, nevertheless the agreement was made and places an obligation upon us which we can not at this time escape. The committee would like to see our troops withdrawn from Nicaragua, but can not recommend such action under present circumstances and in view of our solemn agreements. If we can hold a fair election in Nicaragua and then recognize the government resulting from that election, there is reason to hope that we can get out of Nicaragua and stay out. It has been stated that the Liberals constitute 75 or 80 per cent of the people of Nicaragua. It would seem, therefore, that if a fair election is held and the Liberals succeed, the government following such election would have the support of the great majority of the people of Nicaragua. And with the recognition of this government there is a probability of stability. But whatever the future may have in store under the present conditions we are bound to our obligation by an agreement made and upon which agreement practically all the people in Nicaragua are now relying for their protection and for the chance to vote at an orderly and fairly conducted election.

It may be helpful to recall the facts relating to making this agreement. In March, 1927, the President selected Henry L. Stimson as his representative to go to Nicaragua with instructions, if possible, to pacify the situation and bring about an adjustment between the warring factions. Mr. Stimson reached Nicaragua in April, 1927. The two armed forces, those under the direction of the Conservatives and those under the direction of the Liberals, were then engaged in a fierce civil war. After numerous consultations with the leaders of both parties, the Conservatives and the Liberals, an agreement was reached. The substance of this agreement was that the United States would undertake to supervise and conduct a fair election at the time specified in the constitution of Nicaragua, in 1928, and that the armed forces in Nicaragua were to surrender their arms. In the meantime, the United States forces were to remain in Nicaragua for the purpose of keeping the peace, protecting life and property, and policing the election. Mr. Stimson conferred with the leaders not only of the Conservative Party but with the delegation appointed by Doctor Sacasa, which delegation consisted of Dr. Rudolpho Espinosa, Dr. Leonardo Arguello, and Dr. Manuel Cordero Reyes. He also consulted General Moncada, who was in charge, and had been for some time, of the Liberal forces. After conferring with General Moncado, as a result of an understanding between Mr. Stimson and General Moncada, Mr. Stimson addressed to him the following letter:

TIPITAPA, May 4, 1927.

Gen. JOSE MARIA MONCADA,
Tipitapa.

DEAR GENERAL MONCADA: Confirming our conversation of this morning, I have the honor to inform you that I am authorized to say that the President of the United States intends to accept the request of the Nicaraguan Government to supervise the election of 1928; that the retention of President Diaz during the remainder of his term is regarded as essential to that plan and will be insisted upon; that a general disarmament of the country is also regarded as necessary for the proper and successful conduct of such election; and that the forces of the United States will be authorized to accept the custody of the arms of those willing to lay them down, including the Government, and to disarm forcibly those who will not do so.

Very respectfully,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

Thereafter General Moncada consulted with his troops, and his troops raised certain points upon which he sought an expression from Mr. Stimson, whereupon Mr. Stimson addressed him the following letter:

TIPITAPA, NICARAGUA, May 11, 1927.

Gen. JOSE MARIA MONCADA,
Tipitapa.

DEAR GENERAL MONCADA: I am glad to learn of the authority that has been placed in you by your army to arrange for a general disarmament. I am also glad to make clear to you and to your army the attitude of the President of the United States as to this matter. In seeking to terminate this war President Coolidge is actuated only by a desire to benefit the people of Nicaragua and to secure for them a free, fair, and impartial election. He believes that only by such free and fair elections can permanent peace be secured for Nicaragua. To insure this in 1928 he has consented to the request that American representatives selected by him shall supervise the election. He has also consented to assign American officers to train and command a nonpartisan national constabulary for Nicaragua which will have the duty of securing such a fair election and of preventing any fraud or intimidation of voters. He is willing also to leave in Nicaragua until after the election a sufficient force of marines to support the work of the constabulary and insure peace and freedom at the election.

As further evidence of the good faith of the American Government and of the present Nicaraguan Government in this matter, I am glad to tell you what has already been done. It will answer the questions contained in the letter of your soldiers which you have shown me. General amnesty has already been granted by the President of Nicaragua. I have recommended to President Diaz that the supreme court be reconstituted by the elimination of the illegal judges placed in that court under Señor Chamorro. President Diaz has already called upon those judges for their resignations, and I believe that those resignations will be obtained. I have already advised that the Congress be reconstituted by the holding of special elections in those Liberal districts where elections were not held in 1926, under conditions which will insure that the Liberal voters will be amply protected in their rights. I have also recommended that members of Congress illegally expelled by Señor Chamorro whose terms have not yet expired be reinstated. I have been assured that this will be done.

I have recommended that Liberal jefes politicos be appointed in the six Liberal districts of Bluefields, Jinotega, Nueva Segovia, Esteli, Chinandega, and Leon. I have been assured that this will be done.

In short, I have recommended that steps be taken so far as possible to restore the political condition as it existed in Nicaragua before the Chamorro coup d'état, and I believe that so far as possible it will be done.

I hope that these steps will assure you and your army of the fairness of the United States Government and its desire to see peace, justice, and freedom reestablished in Nicaragua without any unfairness or favoritism toward any party, but being regardful of the rights of Liberals and Conservatives alike.

Very respectfully yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON.

Upon the receipt of this letter, General Moncada said that the letter was satisfactory to his army, and then General Moncada dictated the following statement:

"The Liberals can not believe that the United States Government through the personal representative of President Coolidge will give a promise which it will not fulfill.

"Once again the Liberals place their confidence in the United States. The leaders of the army will try to convince their men that this promise of fair elections will be fulfilled. The central point which the army wishes to be assured of is that the United States will do its best to give Nicaragua a fair election in 1928."

It will be seen from this statement that General Moncada calls attention that they, the Liberals, "place their confidence in the United States," saying that "the leaders of the army will try to convince their men that this promise of fair elections will be fulfilled." All of Moncada's lieutenants agreed to this except Sandino, who was represented to Mr. Stimson as having promised to join in the settlement, but afterwards refused to do so, and with from 150 to 200 followers started northward toward the Honduras border.

This brief outline leaves no doubt that all parties, in particular the Liberals, gave up their arms, with the exception of Sandino and his men, and relied upon the honor of the United States for their protection and for an opportunity to voice their wishes and sentiments through the ballot box under an election fairly and honorably conducted.

The committee, in reaching a conclusion upon this particular resolution, expresses no opinion and does not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of any of the steps taken by our Government in sending troops to Nicaragua or in the recognition of the Diaz Government, or of the constitutional questions which may be involved in this matter. It is of the opinion that our responsibility in Nicaragua at the present time arises out of an agreement full and complete and thoroughly relied upon, which agreement brought about a wholly changed condition and situation. Unfortunate and regrettable as the present situation is in Nicaragua, it seems clear that to remove our forces from Nicaragua, after all that has been said and done, would justly subject us to bitter condemnation throughout all Central and South America, and particularly by the more liberal element, as it would be the liberal element we would betray by our action, to say nothing of the discredit to ourselves and the turmoil and bloodshed which would likely follow.

RECEPTION TO CLARENCE D. CHAMBERLIN, AMERICAN AVIATOR

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, Mr. Clarence D. Chamberlin, who was the first aviator to fly across the Atlantic Ocean with a passenger, is in the marble room. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess for five minutes in order that Senators may meet and greet him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senate will stand in recess for five minutes.

The Senate being in recess, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania escorted Mr. Chamberlin into the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT and Mr. Chamberlin stood in the area near the Secretary's desk, and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania personally presented the Members of the Senate to the distinguished visitor, after which he retired from the Chamber, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD certain matter which I send to the desk relative to the Federal farm-loan system.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CANADA AGAIN VOTES AGAINST A SUPERSUBSIDIZED FARM-LOAN SYSTEM SUCH AS WE HAVE IN THE UNITED STATES IN THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN SYSTEM—OPPOSES POLITICAL CONTROL OF FARMERS' LAND-BANK SYSTEM

On page 5719 of the RECORD, April 2, 1928, was inserted a digest of the recent nation-wide investigation of the Federal farm-loan system and an outline of the many shortcomings of the present political banking system. The Royal Bank of Canada recently awarded a prize of $1,000 for the best essay by a university student for a paper entitled, "Does Canada need a federal farm-loan system?" The award was made to Dermot A. Davies, of the University of British Columbia, who, after making a comprehensive statement, declared: "Frankly, I do not think that we are immediately justified in organizing a federal farm-loan board for long-term loans."

Mr. Davies puts his finger on the sore spot of the whole system when he says: "Unfortunately for us our conditions, both economic and psychological, are entirely different from those existing in the European countries mentioned. Of the two, it is perhaps the psychological difference which is greatest, so that we can not expect remedies which suited the French or German peasant, with his peculiar temperament, to suit the diverse characteristics of the Canadian farmer."

CONTRARY TO AMERICAN PRINCIPLE

Every contention of those who copied Europe's farm-loan systems, in inaugurating the presently organized Federal farm-loan system, was that it could be adapted to the needs of the United States. Mr. Davies in the above paragraph shows how it is not adaptable to such needs, although capable of performing a great service if placed in the hands of the rightful owners, the farmers who now own the capital stock of the 12 district Federal land banks, and assume the entire liability which safeguards the system.

Mr. Davies also demonstrates the folly of having provided in the farm loan act for the privately capitalized joint-stock land banks, which operate in direct competition with the farmer-owned banks, and which are found exclusively in those fields which are termed "the cream" of the farm-land and farm-loan territory. Mr. Davies writes:

"From a financial point of view it is undeniable that the Federal land banks have paid. They are operating on a 1 per cent basis, and are accumulating a very satisfactory reserve fund. They have also lowered the rate of interest to the farmer. To those who offer the criticism that they are forcing private enterprise out of business a few figures may be of interest. The Federal Loan Board can authorize private individuals with a certain paid-up capital to form joint-stock land banks in any district, in competition with the Federal loan banks.

21 joint-stock land banks closed 881 loans for a total of	$9,334,900
12 Federal land banks closed 27,153 loans for a total of	91,029,976
In 1922:
43 joint-stock land banks closed 15,916 loans for a total of	138,884,779
12 Federal land banks closed 74,055 loans for a total of	224,301,400
In 1926:
57 joint-stock land banks closed 100,199 loans for a total of	727,748,388
Federal Farm Loan Board closed 409,570 loans for a total of	1,274,855,666

"These figures indicate the early phenomenal growth of the loans made by the joint-stock banks and the subsequent steady growth."

Interesting extracts from Mr. Davies's essay follow:

FAILURES OF THE LAND BANKS TO SERVE FARMERS

"There has been some confusion on the subject of the extension of credit by the land banks. There are those who say that they have failed because they have not made credit easier.

"The Federal Farm Loan Board has also forced the adoption of the amortization scheme for the repayment of loans. This may or may not be a bad policy (there has been much violent controversy on both sides).

"There is one criticism which has been leveled at the banks which is substantially true, and that is that their introduction has not materially altered the number of foreclosures. This criticism has been offered to prove that they are therefore a failure.

"In Canada—and generally speaking for the farmers as a whole—it has been estimated that the farmer's return upon his investment is 4 per cent to 4½ per cent. There are, of course, many who are making a great deal more than that. But the average return may be taken at that figure. With a return so low, it is manifestly impossible for the average farmer to borrow and pay 8 per cent or more. Incidentally, a reduction in the interest rate to even 6 per cent would not enable all the farmers to borrow even if they had the security. It is for this reason that the Federal Farm Loan Board in the United States has failed to materially alter the number of foreclosures.

"A brief glance at the experiences of some of the Provinces in Canada may reveal some information that is helpful. In one particular is this information interesting. That in every Province where the scheme—where operative at all—has proved a burden on the public we find that the largest proportion of the loans have been made for the purpose of clearing previous encumbrances.

"In Ontario, where the idea is considered successful, 47 per cent of the loans have been made for the purchase of new lands.

"In Quebec we have a unique situation due to the unity of nationality, religion, and habits of the people. A condition met with in European countries but nowhere else on the American Continent—on a scale of similar size.

"In British Columbia, certainly, the scheme has been a financial burden on the taxpayer, and here we notice that the majority of the loans have been to clear off previous debts.

"So much for a study of conditions in the past. What, if any, are the conclusions to be drawn? The first is, that any system of government-controlled credits can not be run as a philanthropic enterprise to the detriment of the taxpaying public. It must be on a sound financial basis.

"Frankly, however, I do not think that we are immediately justified in organizing a Federal farm loan board for long-term loans, because the scattered condition of the farmers would not enable it to advance credit in competition with private enterprises at a sufficiently cheap rate to be beneficial to the farmer and yet yield a margin of reserve."

A DUAL SYSTEM OF BANKING

The above statement, made by Mr. Davies, brings home again the error Congress made when it endeavored, by means of a compromise, to erect two distinct systems of banking within the one Federal farm-loan system, namely, the farmer-owned Federal land banks and the privately capitalized joint-stock land bank system, which now threatens to strangle the farmer-owned banks by serious inroads into their territory, and in many States have now more business on the books, and a far better class of business, than the farmer-owned banks enjoy. Too often the Federal land banks have taken a poorer class of loans with the idea of serving the farmer as the act intended, whereas the joint-stock land banks have taken, as above stated, only "the cream" in loans. The following schedule, released by the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, shows a striking comparison, and the reader is urged to compare the loans between the two types of banks in such States as Iowa, where the bankers' banks now hold about $37,000,000 more loans than does the Federal land bank; in Missouri, where they nearly approach the amount; in Ohio, where they exceed it; as in Illinois, North Carolina:

Political appointees in the Federal land banks estimate that by the cooperative principle a saving of more than 1½ per cent per annum is possible under the present type of administration of these banks. That would mean that had the loans above listed with joint-stock land banks been placed in Federal lank banks the borrowing farmer would have had returned to him in the form of earnings more than $12,000,000 a year, or 1½ per cent of the total loans of $839,338,871, which now lines the pockets of the joint-stock land bankers. This is price Congress made the American farmer pay each year as a tribute to their own evasion in sound economic principles at the time the farm loan act was passed in 1916. Many of the former members of the Farm Loan Board, who as members of that board did everything in their power to restrict and wreck the cooperative associations, now officer these joint-stock land banks at fancy salaries—at the expense of farmers.

CALLED THEM ENEMY WITHIN

The president of one of the leading Federal land banks recently advised that he considered the joint-stock land banks "enemies within." He did not wish his name mentioned, for perfectly obvious reasons, but he sees the growing menace of these banks which operate in the best loan territory in direct competition with the farmer-owned banks.

"It is certainly an outrage that these banks, having the tax-free feature of their bonds, are licensed by law to a monopoly of all loans above $25,000, whereby they are enabled to exact a tribute of 1 per cent or better from the farmer wishing to secure the best loans now being made. It also seems almost criminal to me to allow these banks, which are favored by the Government, to loan money to land speculators who scalp the land for profits, and landlords who rent their land on leases which force the tenants to rob the soil. We have not inherited land problems from the feudal times like the European countries have. Instead of encouraging landlordism in this country, with all its attendant evils, the Government should see that no such condition is permitted to grow up."

A Texas farm-loan agent advises that the "last great mortgage war was between the farmer and selfish mortgage interests, but that the next great war is now at hand, and is between the farmer's loan associations and the agents of the joint-stock land banks." Because the Federal land banks are officered by political appointees, and a resultant slowing-up processes is usual in action (?), this means that the farmer's association representatives are helpless before the competition of private bankers, and this opens a wide field of political activity.

[Extract from New York Times]

SENATOR SMOOT OPPOSES THESE BANKS

Senator REED SMOOT, of Utah, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, made plain in a recent address in the Chamber that he strongly opposes the joint-stock land banks enjoying tax-exempt bond privileges, and maintains that private capital is taking to itself all the supposed earnings or savings of these bonds, instead of passing this saving to the farmer borrower through such banks.

"Since the joint-stock land banks were created by act of Congress I have never spoken before an audience calling attention to the privileges granted to individuals in this country under that law, but there has been a favorable response immediately against the injustice of the act," Senator SMOOT said.

"What right have we to say to any man in the United States, 'You and four of your friends may organize a joint-stock land bank; you and your friends may put $1,000,000 capital into it; you and your friends may control it; and the Government of the United States authorizes you to sell tax-exempt securities to the amount of fifteen times $1,000,000, or $15,000,000?' The interest received from those $15,000,000 of bonds is tax free, and so men with large incomes who invest in such bonds are enabled altogether to avoid paying taxes.

"There is a practice going on in the United States to-day that ought to be stopped just as soon as Congress can enact a law for that purpose, for to-day a man can borrow $10,000,000 and purchase $10,000,000 worth of tax-exempt securities, the interest upon which, at 5 per cent, is $500,000 per annum. He can deduct the $500,000 interest he pays on the loan from his income from any other source and pays no tax upon it. Therefore, he can have an income of $500,000 from taxable items and never pay a cent of taxes to the Government of the United States.

"The joint-stock land banks are operating in exactly the same territory that the Federal farm banks are operating in; they are in direct competition with them; and I have not any doubt but that the Federal farm bank would have loaned the money that has been loaned by the joint-stock land banks. If the American people knew the circumstances, I do not believe that they would approve of granting to any individuals in the United States that great power.

"I have been in favor of the Federal farm loan bank. I voted for the bill when it was under consideration in the Senate. I called attention then to the joint-stock land bank provision; it was inserted when the bill was before the Senate, and there was mighty little discussion of it. The only objection that I have had to the whole system, if we are going to have any further tax-exempt securities, is to the power that has been conferred upon individuals through the organization of joint-stock land banks."

The death knell of the joint-stock land banks would be tolled by Senator SMOOT.

LET FARMERS BE THEIR OWN BANKERS—COOPERATIVE FARM-OWNED BANKS WOULD PROVIDE AN IMPROVED FINANCIAL SERVICE FOR AGRICULTURE

By Hon. Myron T. Herrick

The object of the rural credit movement at its start in this country in 1910 was to introduce European methods for long-term and short-term borrowing. They were entirely free from politics and the idea of general social reforms.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, delivered a speech in the Senate which few persons noticed at the time. But it came to the attention of some agricultural societies of New York which distributed copies, and it is now arousing widespread interest among farmers throughout the East. The reason is that it struck rural credits squarely on the head, and made sparks fly which lit up this much discussed but badly misunderstood subject in a very clear way.

LET FARMERS RUN THEIR OWN BANKS

The occasion for this remarkable little speech was given by an amendment of the farm loan act, which would take the management of the land banks from the farmers. Senator CURTIS contended that this amendment is wrong and that the farmers would be the safest and most efficient managers. The senator's facts, figures, and arguments must convince any reasonable person that he is right, and furthermore, that the farmers likewise should not delay in establishing a system of their own.

Mortgaging farms or other real estate is, as distinguished from banking, an investment business. It takes money of persons who have no uses for it of their own and lends it to others who can use it to their advantage at an agreed interest rate. Mortgaging is available only for persons who have land to offer as security of a value greater by one-half or one-third than the amount of money they want. So it can not help anybody, except one who has already got considerable property through his own unaided efforts. Indeed, mortgaging is down right dangerous unless the farm is large and productive enough to enable the owner promptly to pay the debt and taxes when due, besides making necessary repairs and meeting living expenses of himself and family. Moreover, mortgaging is disliked by banks that are really banks, since its terms are too long to let them turn over their funds repeatedly in the quick way required for substantial profits.

"Banking is easy to learn," says an old adage, "if you know what a mortgage is and let it severely alone." Farmers ought to learn what banking is. They could do this without very hard study if they would view it apart from plateglass windows, gilded walls, and mahogany desks, and keep in mind that its operations are not always represented by the delivery of so much cash. Banking involves the use of comparatively little money. It is mostly a means of creating and utilizing credit, or the confidence inspired by good character and financial standing. Its functions are: First, the receiving of deposits; second, the lending of deposits and funds obtained from shares and other sources, and the buying of negotiable paper by what is called discounting; third, the issuing of notes by a bank on its own credit and other security to circulate in place of money. The Federal reserve banks are the great banks of issue.

The credit a bank uses is chiefly that of its customers, and rests more on good character than on anything else. The proof of this is that few banks would dare to lend to a man with a bad reputation, no matter what security he offered, while many of them have financed honest and competent persons to success who hadn't a dollar to their names. Of course, some farmers are not and never will be credit worthy. But the great majority have the best of characters, with property and wealth-producing power out of which the soundest credit and the highest financial standing could be created.

The banks know all this. Indeed, most of the funds which they own and are using for other industries came from agriculture.

For what would become of the banks if they should be deprived of the annual agricultural production which is represented by paper passing through them, or which has been transferred permanently to them? But the farmers should not wait for them to act. The farmers in the aggregate have accumulated $60,000,000,000 of wealth. This and their annual income are more than enough to supply their own banking and financial needs, if they should mobilize the credit value of these stupendous resources. But this mobilization can be accomplished only by forming banks of their own.

With such banks the farmers would have first use of the wealth they create, and avoid much of the necessity of mortgaging farms and all the losses coming from forced sales of their crops. Moreover, they would add strength to their already existing associations, and save the interest they now pay in borrowing from outside sources. They would also help all other industries, because the farmers' needs would be for short terms, in most cases extending no longer than from harvest to harvest, when their returns increased by the resulting improvement would mingle again with the general banking power and swell its volume. Perhaps $10,000,000,000 would have been added to this power if the American farmers in their organizations, splendid though some of them are, had not done the very reverse of what the best cooperative farmers in other countries did, who began by forming banks.

A cooperative bank is an incorporated body owned and managed by members and that confines its credit facilities to them. I wish I had space to describe the indivisible reserve and the other wonderful provisions that assure absolute safety and fairness. But the first thing is that the form must be purely associational. That is to say, there should be no shares; or if these be issued, they must be withdrawable, so that any member may retire at will or be expelled by the majority and his money returned. The next thing is that there must be a system which as it grew would have local, regional, State, and district banks and a great bank at the top. The local banks, which peg the system to the soil, would be without shares or limit to liability. The others might be just the reverse. All would be bound together by unions and a federation, and not only would help individual farmers but would also finance agricultural enterprises from the smallest to the largest scale.

In Germany the farmers have bound themselves together in systems embracing three degrees of organization, through which they conduct not only their commercial, industrial, and financial affairs but also their social relations. The first is the local group, consisting either of one bank with trading features or of a bank and affiliated societies. The second is the provincial organization, consisting of adhering local groups, a central bank, and central associations held together by a union. The third is the imperial organization, consisting of adhering central banks and associations and unions and a national bank and national associations held together by a federation.

This structure rests upon the local banks, which all are of the associational form. That is, they depend upon the collective liability, limited or unlimited, of members for obtaining resources and as a guaranty for their operations. Nobody is admitted unless he has taxable property, or at least a character or standing vouched for by members. The result of this eclectic membership is that the credit of a German local bank is so high that it attracts from its neighborhood a volume of deposits sufficient for its daily transactions and as much more besides as is necessary to invest in the stocks and bonds of the associations higher up. For this latter purpose some of the local associations raise funds by issuing and selling shares in the nature of certificates of long-time deposits, payable either at once or in installments.

But the growing tendency of the local bank is to eliminate capital stock, whether fixed or variable, so as to avoid dividends and maintain their true character as neighborhood clubs of 100 or more mutual acquaintances or friends. The profits all go to the reserve. This is their only permanent fund. It is indivisible. It does not belong absolutely either to the members or to the bank. In the event of dissolution it reverts to the province, to be held for a new bank in the same locality. Some of these funds now are very large. Their presence as foundations scattered throughout the country has contributed greatly to stabilizing the rural population. Since the reserve serves not only as a guaranty but also for a working fund, it takes the place of a capital stock. When its size becomes sufficient for these purposes the bank reduces its profit takings. The aim of a bank is not gain, but to save members costs and expenses of obtaining loans and supplies.

In a country as great as the United States there is room for a number of agricultural systems, and each would embrace five degrees—local, regional, State, departmental organizations. Such systematization of agriculture, based upon local cooperative banks, would enable farmers to utilize all their stupendous collective wealth as a mobilized resource for the benefit of themselves individually and agriculture generally.

[Extract from address by Robert E. Lee Saner, before the annual session of the American Bar Association]

[NOTE.—With the United States at present engaged in operating, with the sanction of Congress, a supersubsidized political farm-loan system, such as found only in Russia, the address of Mr. Saner would prove helpful in revealing to many who have not hitherto appreciated what Russianization of our principles may lead to.]

AMERICA—"STOP, LOOK, LISTEN"

Where railroads cross highways there are signs which read, "Stop, look, listen!" It would be well for our people and their Representatives in our Government to follow that admonition now: To stop and take account of our national strength and our national weaknesses; to look calmly and judiciously, without passion and prejudice, at the momentous changes that have arisen out of the World War—political, social, and economic—fanned in this day to a fever heat by self-seeking politicans, demagogues, socialists, and communists; to listen, not to the words of the traitorous, the querulous, the visionaries, the demagogues, but rather to those of the living and the dead, who through the exercise of patience, courage, loyalty, industry, thrift, and resourcefulness have made this Republic what it is to-day. * * *

My subject might be translated in the form of a quotation from Scripture: "Remove not the ancient landmark which thy fathers have set." It might be said that we have many "landmarks" or guideposts in our wonderful history, but I think we properly may name as the point, both of convergence and divergence, the basic law of our Nation as embodied in the Constitution of the United States. This was a "landmark," indeed, not only in the history of the American Continent, but in the history of the world. It represented the "landmark" toward which all previous efforts for a larger freedom and a better Government had converged and from which all our subsequent history in the marvelous development of America had resulted. Emerging from the oppression and darkness of the Middle Ages a few brave, outstanding spirits—the Huguenots, the Cavaliers, the Pilgrims—sought refuge in this country and eventually founded a government under a written Constitution.

That Constitution is the "ancient landmark which our fathers have set" and which I here and now plead shall not be removed. I reflect, with sentiments of profound admiration, upon the personnel of that little body of big men who drafted our Constitution. There in hot and unpleasant surroundings they worked through the long summer months of 1787, with but one thought in their minds—the welfare of their country. * * * When political expediency raised its brazen head, suggesting a clause that would command the plaudits of the crowd, the great Washington said: "If to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God."

It is well for us in this generation to hark back to that memorable time. Verily there were giants in those days, Titan souls that dowered their country with the legacy of liberty in thought and word and deed.

To those who have studied the history of the genesis and development of the Constitution it is needless here to say that never in the wildest debates that preceded its adoption did its founders dream of establishing on this American Continent a democracy or a democratic form of government. The thought and purpose of those great men was to establish a republic, and a republic was established.

There is as much difference between a republic and a democracy as there is between day and night, and when one speaks of a "representative democracy" he might as well speak of a healthful sickness or a truthful fisherman or an honest golf player.

The men who made the Constitution, even as small and restricted as this country was at that time, wisely foresaw that, with its diversity in population and with the possibility of its unparalleled extension geographically, the theory of pure democracy would not make for either a safe or a suitable form of government. They therefore ordained under the Constitution, which for the first 120 years of the life of this Nation, proved its wisdom and worth, that the only form of government on the one hand safely to swerve from tyranny and on the other hand from mobocracy was a form of government wherein the people, not as individuals but through their representatives chosen for their wisdom, their knowledge, their sincerity, and patriotism, should control that government. That was the conception of the fathers, and that was the form of government under which this Nation became both great and powerful.

AGE OF FEDERAL ENCROACHMENT

It was not until this present generation, when descendants of these sturdy pioneers had learned to live in fattened and complacent ease upon the wealth and the security and the safety bought for them by the blood and the sacrifice of their forefathers, that the idealists, the doctrinaires, and the demagogues became an established institution in our national life and evolved a new theory of government for the American people. The age through which we now are going may well be termed the age of constitutional amendments and Federal encroachment, encroachment upon the rights and powers of both the States of this Republic and its individual citizens.

It is the age of political quacks and political quackery, and any ambitious politician who desires to attract the attention of the discontented, to appeal to the resentment of the failures, and to flatter the sinister ambitions of those men and women who desire, above all other things, to see the American form of government and the American Constitution overthrown.

BLOCS AND BULLDOZERS

And so to-day we have in this country paternalism run mad. We no longer are a united, homogeneous people; we no longer legislate and plan for the welfare and the benefit of the American people as a whole Nation. We now are confronted by "blocs," which means nothing more or less than a sinister kindling of the flames of class consciousness and an attempt by ambitious and weasel-minded demagogues to divide the citizens of this Nation against themselves. We have the uplifters' bloc, the farm bloc, the militant feminist bloc, the labor bloc, the wet bloc, the dry bloc, and so on ad infinitum, each of them combining a minority for their own self-interest, under the marshalship of highly paid professional bulldozers and reformers, not for the purpose of working for the welfare of the American people but for the purpose of gaining for themselves some selfish and unfair advantage over their neighbors and their fellow citizens.

Not only is Constitution tinkering the leading outdoor sport with the typical politician to-day, but hand in hand with it goes the steadily increasing encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the Commonwealths and the individuals who are citizens of those Commonwealths.

Now, if the Constitution creates so perfect a Government as we who love it contend, how is it possible for this situation to exist? Our Government, unlike all other governments of the world, emanates from the people. It is the people who made it, and likewise the repository of its immortal continuity rests in the people. In the Constitution itself and in the tradition which surrounds its creation and which has maintained it throughout the years the repository of legislative and executive power is vested in representatives of the people, chosen by the people.

It manifestly is impossible for these representatives to know what the thousands of people who selected them desire, and it was the theory of the fathers, which in the early days of the Republic was the practice, that representatives should be chosen for their integrity, their ability, and their mental and moral qualifications, so that when a question was presented for their solution the people might be protected by the well-considered conclusions of men selected for these qualifications in whom their confidence was placed.

This theory of the fathers is no longer the practice. To-day most of the representatives of the people have their ears to the ground in an effort to find what a majority of those who vote for them in the forthcoming elections may desire, and their vote and action upon questions of governmental policy are governed accordingly.

Propaganda, seeking governmental action, no longer consists of facts and figures that appeal to the reason, but of much clamor and of volume, which evidence themselves in organized propaganda and concerted petition. It is apparent in any consideration of the tendency of the times that a minority well organized may by telegrams and letters and petitions and personal appeal overcome the manifest good of the people when that good is backed by a dormant majority. The solution, then, of good government no longer reposes in the representatives of the people as now practiced, but in the reviving of a sense of personal responsibility to the Government on the part of the individuals who compose that Government. My appeal is now and continuously has been for an awakening of this spirit among the people as individuals, to the end that every citizen shall recognize his duty to his country as paramount to the demands of any party, bloc, or clique to which he merely formally pledges allegiance.

One asks the Government to take over the transportation of the country; another asks that he be given a subsidy; a third that he be granted a guaranteed loan at a lower rate of interest than his neighbor can get; the fanatic asks that the morals of this entire Nation be placed in the hands of a bureau in the city of Washington; and the bigot asks that the tastes, efforts, habits, thoughts, and ambitions of his neighbor be standardized and controlled by law. * * *

It is time to call a halt; it is time to get back to the beginning of things; back to the fundamentals; back to the real sources of our strength; back to the Republic that the fathers so wisely conceived and so successfully instituted; back to a government of the whole people, by the whole people, and for the whole people. Day by day and year by year, gradually and insidiously, through constitutional amendments and Federal encroachment, the form of this Government of ours is being changed from that Republic into a political and hysterical chaos whose final terms are expressed in the unspeakable Russia of to-day.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT ON FARM FINANCE

We can not permanently shape our course right on any international issue unless we are sound on the domestic issues; and this farm movement is the fundamental social issue, the one issue which is even more basic than the relations of capitalist and workingman. The farm industry can not stop; the world is never more than a year from starvation; this Great War has immensely increased the cost of living without commensurately improving the condition of the men who produce the things on which we live. Even in this country the situation has become grave.

Our object must be (1) to make the tenant farmer a landowner; (2) to eliminate as far as possible the conditions which produce the shifting, seasonal tramp type of labor and to give the farm laborer a permanent status, a career as a farmer, for which his school education shall fit him and which shall open to him the chance of in the end earning the ownership in fee of his own farm; (3) to secure cooperation among the small landowners, so that their energies shall produce the best possible results; (4) by progressive taxation or in other fashion to break up and prevent the formation of great landed estates, especially in so far as they consist of unused agricultural land; (5) to make capital available for the farmers, and thereby put them more on an equality with other men engaged in business; (6) to care for the woman on the farm as much as for the man, and to eliminate the conditions which now so often tend to make her life one of gray and sterile drudgery;

(7) to do this primarily through the farmer himself, but also, when necessary, by the use of the entire collective power of the people of the country; for the welfare of the farmer is the concern of all of us.

Lack of capital on the part of the farmer inevitably means soil exhaustion and therefore diminished production. The farmer who is to prosper must have capital; only the prosperous can really meet the needs of the consumer; and in this, as in every other kind of honest business, the only proper basis of success is benefit to both buyer and seller, producer and consumer.

[Extract of address delivered in United States Senate Chamber at the time the first endeavor was made to permanently take away from the American farmer owners of the 12 Federal land banks, their property rights to control their own land-bank system, the capitalization of which they now own, the entire liabilities of which they assume, but which are now completely dominated by the Republican politicians, who secured control during the Harding administration, which has further been reinforced during the Coolidge administration, with men on the Farm Loan Board whose confirmation by the Senate was opposed by leading farm-organization leaders. Senator CURTIS's plea for farmer management is even more pertinent to-day than when this address was delivered several years ago, for to-day the system is suffering from political domination, with characteristic resultant weakening of the system]

LET FARMERS OPERATE THE LAND BANKS

By Senator CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas

Under the syndicate arrangement adopted for selling farm-loan bonds it looks as if brokers get the premiums and that the land banks are getting no particular advantage from the tax exemptions of their securities. Would it not, therefore, be better to let the farmers themselves manage these banks exactly as the law intends? The only change necessary for this would be to give the farmers the entire responsibility for the system and oblige them to operate on their own unquestionably good credit.

This is the secret of the soundness and success of innumerable borrowers' banks of various kinds, among which failures are rarer than among ordinary banks. The 65,000 cooperative credit societies, with 15,000,000 members and $7,000,000,000 of annual business in the world, are based on this idea of using their own credit and of imposing upon members a liability that is either unlimited or else severe enough to be felt. The cooperative bank with unlimited or limited liability has proved its worth wherever tried, in country, town, or city, for encouraging thrift and extending credit in large or small amounts.

The same idea prevails in all true building and loan associations among the 7,269 with 3,858,612 members and $1,769,142,175 assets in the United States. Any member getting a loan must subscribe for shares up to its full amount. His payments are made not on the mortgage but on the shares. When the shares mature he may turn them in and have his debt canceled. The maturing of the shares depends upon his payments and also upon the association's profit and loss. All his credits could be wiped out by a loss, consequently he is liable to the full amount of his mortgage. Profits would hasten the extinction of his debt; and so he is as deeply interested as are nonborrowing members. As a result these associations can operate even on savings with safety, although the borrowers participate in the management.

The landschafts, started 150 years ago, are composed entirely of borrowers. They now number 23 with about $1,000,000,000 of bonds, and none of them ever defaulted an obligation. The borrowers elect all the officers and appraisers, every one of whom must also be a borrower. The borrowers' payments go into a sinking fund, in which the cash on hand, together with the unpaid principal of the loans, must equal outstanding bonds. If this fund becomes impaired in the old landschafts, any member may be assessed without limit for the deficiency. In some of the newer landschafts the liability is limited to the mortgage or some portion of it. But the basic idea in all is that the borrowers have the direct management, use their own credit, and assume liability large enough to be felt.

Nearly all American districts established under State laws for sanitary, mining, or agricultural drainage embody landschaft features. Their bonded indebtedness amounts to millions of dollars. The bonds are not instruments of the State or Federal Government. They are obligations only of the districts. But through the district's right to levy assessments they are secured by the collective ability of the owners of the benefited property and so are easily marketed at reasonable interest rates, although these beneficiaries of the issue also elect the managers.

With these successful instances of borrowers' banks here and in foreign countries, Congress should not hesitate or delay in placing the Federal land banks under the management and the responsibility of the farmers. By so doing the farmers, and not rich investors, would get the advantage of all premiums on the bonds.

[On page 4554 of the RECORD, March 12, 1928, was printed the exposure of the methods adopted by the Federal farm-loan system in foreclosure of mortgages of members of the Federal land banks, and how attorneys, acting for the banks, as employees of the system, were, contrary to the act, charging commissions which were a real hardship to the farmers, resulting in piling up, in the aggregate, millions of dollars a year in unnecessary extortion against the helpless farmer. Other data and documentary evidence is now available for the committee to consider. Below is printed an extract from the New York Times showing that leaders appreciate that there is a real necessity for a uniform mortgage act, and it is a notable fact that not one of the men back of this movement to relieve the people is identified with the Federal farm-loan system. This demonstrates fully that if any reform measure is expected to relieve farmers it must, of necessity, originate outside the "friends of the farmer" within the folds of that system.]

UNIFORM MORTGAGE ACT NEEDED

Do you know that the mortgage laws vary in different States, as to foreclosure, from a practical forfeiture of the mortgaged lands in 20 days after the mortgage is due (in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Texas, and Missouri) to a period of a year for redemption after foreclosure begins (in some 19 States) and even a much longer time in a few States. Are your borrowing farmers faring as well as those in the most favored States, borrowing money on mortgages? If not, are they not entitled to a favorable mortgage law?

In some States it costs from two to four times as much to foreclose a mortgage as in other States, due to expensive complicated court procedure and failure to limit attorneys' fees by statute. The borrower has this sum to pay if he redeems, and in any case it is a tax on the mortgage business.

The commissioners on uniform State laws are framing a uniform mortgage law designed to standardize and simplify mortgages and their foreclosure, give the borrower a fair time for saving his lands after default, and reduce the expenses of foreclosure. It provides for foreclosure by sheriff's sale on notice, without going into court and incurring the expenses of a lawsuit, except where the mortgage is contested. It provides for a period to redeem after the sale, during which the mortgagor has possession, and other safeguards. It also provides a standard short-form mortgage, the use of which is optional.

Such an act should increase the marketability of mortgages in other States and tend to lower the rate of interest. The present diversity among the States in the form of the mortgage and the procedure to foreclose interferes greatly with placing the mortgages with investors.

Three drafts of the act have already been before the conference. This uniform act to have the indorsement of the conference must be approved by commissioners from all the States, and therefore the attitude of your commissioners on this act is important. Will you inform them as to your attitude on this subject? If the laws in States of your patrons are not as favorable as in the most progressive States, you can materially help in shaping the proposed uniform act to that end and can help get a progressive up-to-date uniform mortgage act adopted.

We wish to learn the borrower's point of view. We have no difficulty in getting that of the loaner, but have much difficulty in getting that of the borrower. You may have valuable suggestions as to how the uniform act could aid the farmer by ameliorating the effect of foreclosures, and we should be glad of these suggestions.

Do "real-estate sharks" thrive under your mortgage system and does your mortgage system incubate "land sharks"? If so, you are interested in our mortgage act. There is not a State from which we do not get reports that their mortgage laws work well, even those States where foreclosure is a practical forfeiture. We would like to reach the borrower who has only 20 days to raise the money and redeem.

These uniform acts are framed by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (made up of three commissioners from each State), affiliated with the American Bar Association. The conference has put out the uniform negotiable instruments act.

[The following extracts from an address by the eminent author and student of economy, Charles Frederick Carter, throw light on what we may expect as a result of Congress turning the farmers' Federal land-bank system over to the politicians to rule. Just replace the word "railroad" by the use of "land banks" and you have a striking picture of the present condition of this banking system as pictured by Mr. Carter for the railroads and other privately owned business enterprises.]

SWAT THE DEMAGOGUE

"The fantastic schemes are nothing more than variations on hallucinations that have run their course in the past.

"If all the fool laws which benefit neither the public nor the railroads were repealed, and railroads permitted to conduct their affairs according to the dictates of common sense, it is my firm belief that they could pay an extra dividend out of half the savings thus made possible and give the public a reduction in rates of the other half.

"Emulating the historic example of the nine tailors of Toley Street, an equally illustrious assemblage consecrates itself to the high purpose of imposing government ownership of railroads by the simple expedient of bankrupting them first.

"When the railroads are safe within the socialistic fold, street railways will follow, then the coal mines, then all other private property, until we have attained the state of perfect bliss as yet existing only in Russia. The next step, I suppose, will be to shoot everybody with sense enough to come in when it rains with ammunition furnished free by the Government, just as has been done in Russia.

"If they only can make noise enough, these radicals will succeed; for noise rather than wisdom seems to be increasingly shaping our course. And let me repeat that the noise-making art has advanced far since the first locomotive with a whistle tooted its way into the hearts of the citizens.

"Permit me to propose a slogan for the struggle with the dark forces of discontent. It is this:

"Swat the demagogue!"

(Much criticism has been piled upon the heads of the Farm Loan Bureau because of the methods, questionable, to place a mantle of charity over them, whereby, under the guise of making "examinations" of national farm-loan associations and joint-stock land banks, their political appointees have employed "blackjack" methods to political ends, crushing any individual who endeavored to exercise their American rights but who, unfortunately, thought and acted contrary to the spirit of the all-highest. The following editorial appearing in Good Business alludes to this custom and shows that the American courts have declared such practices unconstitutional, but it seems a crime that the courts should find it necessary to protect the people from the inroads of bureaucrats established by Congress:)

A BLOW AT SNOOPERS

Professional investigators—"snoopers"—who were getting so thick around Washington that they were forced to wear badges to keep from investigating one another, recently received a jolt which may shake some of them loose from their soft jobs. For two United States district courts have ruled that the Federal Trade Commission had no constitutional right to indiscriminate examination of the books of corporations and individuals, as it is expressly contrary to the spirit of the fourth amendment to the Federal Constitution. These decisions are of wider interpretation than at first may seem evident, and may put a stop to the horde of traveling inspectors going up and down the land, whose total number surpasses Coxey's army of a generation ago, and who depend solely upon the taxpayer for salary expenses.

The seriousness of this blow to political officeholders is apparent when we recall that there are some 40,000 of them connected with the various commissions, bureaus, and investigating committees which Congress has set up to perform its own work. Most of these have come into being in the past decade. Establishing new bureaus and commissions has become the favorite indoor sport of Congress. Usually a very nominal sum is appropriated from the Treasury to cover the first cost. The next annual appropriation is much larger for these former baby bodies, and before we know it the bureau or commission has become a permanent wart on the body politic, and our Federal Government is rapidly degenerating into a mere functioning of bureaus. In short, we are becoming a bureaucracy, face to face with a serious proposition.

The business men who took the case of these "snoopers" into open court and defeated them have performed a distinct public duty, which gives them claim to being patriots. They have successfully resisted the inquisition of petty politicians hampering private enterprise. Their example and leadership should have wide adoption in every branch of business, and each new encroachment on personal right should be fought to a finish.

These 40,000 investigators almost invariably approach a business concern or institution with the preconceived idea that such firm is guilty of unethical methods, if not actual violation of the law—as viewed by said political officeholder. We all know that no business is operated that way, in spite of the outpouring of demagogues to the contrary. Business is inherently honest. There is no reason why the burden of proof should be upon it. However, if any business, institution, or individual is crooked, it is for the properly constituted officials to bring it to book, prove its guilt, and put it out of business or in jail where it belongs. It certainly is not just or American for any investigator to make a partial examination of the case, send propaganda to the four winds, to the detriment of the business, institution, or individual, as these political officeholders have done in hundreds of cases, without first giving the party accused opportunity of going before an impartial court of justice and answering charges.

We no longer have a place in America for the demagogue or the commission, bureau, or self-appointed, self-anointed, which assumes that success and crookedness necessarily go hand in hand, just because they do not happen to parallel the narrow, preconceived ideas of politician appointees. America has forged to her present leading position only because individual initiative has been given full rein. Her failure in the future will result if outside hampering and hamstringing is allowed to continue.

WHAT CRIMES, OH, WHAT CRIMES!

Farmer, O farmer, what crimes are being committed in your name! Every man with a half-baked idea is seeking to exploit it as something good for the farmers, yet most of those so insistent their plans be adopted do not know a plow from a Plymouth Rock rooster, truthfully advises the Mountain States banker. But it is popular. The farmer knows something happened to him. He knows by looking at his pocketbook and his bank account—or the lack of a bank account. In this, however, he is not alone. With an era of wild speculation during the war such as the world has never before known, it was but natural when that magnificent bubble was pricked the fall was going to hurt a whole lot. Few cared to profit by the experience of those who had gone through bubbles in the past. And those who refused to so profit got burned and the thing hurts yet.

But you do not cure a burn or ease the pain by putting salt on it. Those who are to-day seeking limelight with their schemes to aid the farmers care no more about the farmers than they do about the Hottentots of Africa, save as their cries will bring voting support to them.

The real friends of the farmers—the real friends of all the people—have been on the job right along, making no noise, demanding no fancy socialistic legislation, urging no radical changes in the Constitution, and seeking no limelight.

The farmers and the business men, the wage earners and all others must realize that the fellow with the hot air and the magnificent cargo of promises is not their friend.

What surer highway to prosperity than for each to see to it that his own work is done more expeditiously and at the same time more thoroughly? What better method can be found of quieting unrest than for each one to cease envying the other fellow? Why attempt to escape the particular vocation in which one now may be engaged? It is better to set about making it a permanent, profitable employment—whether it be office, shop, factory, or farm.

Neither you nor I can settle these things for the whole country, for our neighbors, or for anyone but ourselves. We can, however, as individuals lay hold upon those fundamental principles of life and by our daily work and conduct do our share in correcting the situation.

It can not be done by agitation, publicity, politics, or pessimism, but will be accomplished by common sense, industry, and frugality.

"THE THOROUGHBRED," A DEFINITION WITH COMMENT BY JUDGE STONE, OF WYOMING

(Copyrighted by V. H. Stone)

Place our great utilities under Government ownership and you kill all incentive to excel, to use initiative, to develop ambition, invention, individualism; you create an army of time-servers, chair-warmers, clock-watchers. Did anyone with a secure position, drawing a regular salary and knowing that he could not be fired for indifference, carelessness, laziness, impudence, or inattention, without going through a red-tape performance that would wear out the stoutest-hearted citizen and leave his complaint unsettled until he died of senile debility, ever invent any useful or labor-saving device, ever advance any new idea, ever accomplish anything for the betterment of mankind? No.

These things have been accomplished by men and women who counted their days not by the hour hand on the clock, but by the results they obtain; men and women with a goal to be reached, a prize to attain, a reward to be earned; men and women who burned the midnight oil. If I am ready and willing to work 12 hours a day, and do work 12 hours a day, it is none of your business. If you are willing to work only 6 hours a day and work but 6 hours a day, it is none of my business; but if I work 12 hours a day and you work but 6 hours a day it is none of your business if my wife and children wear better clothes, eat better food, and live in a better house than your wife and children.

Permit me to quote just a few words written by that student of human nature, that most brilliant Democrat this country ever produced—Henry Watterson—who said, "Individualism was the discovery of the fathers of the American Republic. It is the bedrock of American philosophy."

There is a class of people who have made a failure of life from every standpoint, who imagine that they discovered a cure-all for all the ills with which the body politic is threatened or afflicted. Armed with a Utopian pipe dream, a magnificent set of lungs, and a pair of iron jaws, they preach a doctrine that would tear down those institutions which we have been building up in this country for 300 years.

Whenever you so build the laws of a people that there is no incentive to excel, no reward held out for individual initiative, no prize offered for thrift, industry, and economy, no object to be attained by doing things better than others do them, then you have cut the taproot through which flows the lifeblood of progress, advancement, initiative, invention, individual effort, and competition, and have settled back to a dead level of sameness and stagnation that is incapable of making any material progress in social, physical, mental, or material matters; you have produced a commn herd of scrubs.

The thoroughbred is produced by careful thought, persistent effort, thorough training; by a desire to excel, to be in the forefront, to rise above the dead level of mediocrity. The thoroughbred wants to do better to-morrow than he did to-day; to accomplish more next year than he did this year. The thoroughbred is willing to take a high leap, even though he knock off the top rail of the barrier and come a cropper.

The scrub walks up to the barrier, takes a look, and says that it is too high; that it is useless to try; he has not the nerve to make an effort; he settles back into the pasture which is inclosed by the barrier and where the feed is short, tough, and dry, and drags out a miserable existence on poor feed, poor shelter, and poor care. His eye grows lack-luster, his coat poor and scanty, his ribs push through his hide. He curses his luck and bemoans his hard fate and the lack of those things which he says the world owes him.

The thoroughbred has been willing to pay the price; he has denied himself; he has disciplined himself; he has worked while the scrub slept; he has sweated while the scrub lay in the shade; he has kept his muscles free and supple by grilling work and constant use; he has exercised his initiative, his invention, his pluck, his perseverance, his tenacity; he has fitted himself to succeed; he succeeds; he sails over the barrier like a bird into a pasture where the feed is sweet and tender, the water pure and cool, the shade of the forest of success restful and invigorating.

The scrub looks through the slits in the barrier at the thoroughbred, up to his knees in luxury and grass, whose eye sparkles, whose coat shines with a silken sheen, ribs are covered with sufficient meat to hide his bones. His eye shines with a malevolent light. The scrub says to himself, "It is unjust, unfair, inequitable; there is something wrong with a world that permits such conditions to exist."

And immediately the scrub sets about to devise ways and means, not to fit himself to clear the barrier, not to put himself in a condition where he can by his own effort acquire that which he desires, but to either hamstring the thoroughbred who, by his pluck, perseverance, and tenacity, his willingness to "pay with the body for the soul's desire," has reached his goal, or to destroy the pasture in which the thoroughbred is enjoying the fruit of his endeavor.

The thoroughbred recognizes that in order to be, he must do. The scrub refuses to do, and then curses the rest of the world because he can not be. There is an abundance of feed and water and shelter in the thoroughbred pasture for all.

The thoroughbred never quits while the heart beats, and the lungs perform their function. The scrub quits when he gets tired, and, if given the quirt and steel, lies down with the saddle on.

Be a thoroughbred; don't be a whiner. Try the barrier. If you knock the top rail off or the two top rails, keep on trying; keep on using your pluck, your perseverance, your tenacity, your individualism. Be a thoroughbred or die a-trying. I'd rather really live while I live, and die at 30, a thoroughbred, than be a scrub Methuselah.

THE MAD WATERS OF SOCIALISM—THE PRICE OF LETTING THE GOVERNMENT RUN THE PEOPLE'S BUSINESS—FEDERAL FARM LOAN SYSTEM IS STRIKING ILLUSTRATION

The present greatness and power of the United States of America are due to the free play allowed under our Government to the initiative, the enterprise, the ambition, and the thrift of its individual citizens.

Our Government has prospered because its individual citizens have prospered. They have prospered because the Government has protected them in their rights to the fruits of their industry and enterprise.

"In all its history" our Government "has trodden down no man's liberty," said Daniel Webster in the Senate of the United States on March 7, 1850.

Within a few months the New York Times said:

"Property and profits are the mainspring of human activities."

This is an individualistic country, thank God. It is a country where superior intelligence along any line of human endeavor, the knowledge properly to apply it, the ambition to make use of it, and sufficient health and grit to keep everlastingly at it, always win individual fame or fortune—frequently both. This very fact is hateful to those socialists and communists who would jackplane all our citizens down to a common level.

There are many brands and breeds of socialists and communists. No one, not even one of themselves, seems to understand the superfine distinctions which mark the differences between them. But there is a common ground for all of them. They all hate, loathe, and spit upon the "capitalistic system."

The opportunity for personal gain through individual effort has developed in this country a citizenship that in turn has made ours the most free and the most powerful among the nations—a country that our socialistic and communistic friends are loath to leave, even when imperatively invited to do so by our Government. Yet of late there has been a tendency on the part of our lawmakers to curtail individual opportunity by placing our Government in competition with its citizens or by actually taking away altogether such opportunity in certain enterprises. This is clearly socialistic to the extent of removing the reward which belongs to individual effort.

EX OFFICIO CHAIRMAN OF FARM LOAN BOARD CONDEMNS GOVERNMENT DOMINATION OF PRIVATE PROPERTY RIGHTS

On December 22 Secretary of the Treasury Mellon wrote the Outlook:

"The most noteworthy characteristic of the American people is their initiative. It is this spirit which has developed America. * * * If this spirit of business adventure is killed this country will cease to hold the foremost position in the world."

The New York Sun says:

"The touch of the Government in business is the touch of death."

When the State goes into business generally and conducts all commercial enterprises, who will pay the cost of carrying on the State's own functions? The State can not conduct all commercial enterprises without crushing all individualism; and by doing that very thing it would dry up the sources of supply needed to sustain its own power.

You believe that the function of the Government is to regulate but never to engage in business, and that whenever it attempts to engage in business it violates a vital and fundamental principle of our Republic.

So, believing, you should constantly combat the efforts of the socialists to put our States into business in competition with their citizens.

You should not wait until the socialists get around to your particular business.

[Extract from editorial appearing in Sunday New York Times, April 15, 1928]

SHALL WE GOVERN OURSELVES?

In an article in Scribner's Governor Ritchie repeats his familiar and mostly sound arguments against "centralization" and in favor of State rights. As a result of "centralization" and "bureaucracy" we are monstrously overgoverned and government tends to become "more arbitrary and remote and different from what the people think it is until self-government and 'consent of the governed' become political myths." If by "consent of the governed" is meant consent of the majority of the governed, that did not come about generally till somewhere about 1830, and in some States not till later. We were a long time in reaching manhood suffrage and a good deal longer in reaching woman suffrage.

Not till our own time, too, have our laws been made by a Congress both branches of which spring "directly from the people." If there has been encroachment on the rights of States and one constitutional amendment has gone to join two others in the limbo of the ineffectual, it is "the people," at least enough of that mysterious entity represented in Congress and the State legislatures, that is to blame. According to Mr. Ritchie, the Jeffersonians and the Hamiltonians are still divided as Republicans and Democrats on centralization or decentralization: "One strong for the people and the other strong for 'the Government.'" As a matter of fact, what microscope can discern the breadth of a hair line between the two? The eighteenth amendment should close Democratic mouths on this subject.

As to bureaucracy, it is attained in its most offensive form under monarchies and despotisms. It is inherited in France. Many Englishmen complain of its arbitrariness in England. Here it simply means too many officeholders, too many commissions, bureaus, and what not. The hammerers of bureaucracy are frequently found voting for more of it. The same tendency exists in the States. It may be true that, what with uplifting, logrolling, class-vote hunting, "our Government becomes steadily the most costly, wasteful, and extravagant on earth"; but there is money to burn. When "the people" feel poor they may want something done about bureaucracy. That plan for the reorganization of departments which Congress is so shy of may be rammed down the throats of their Representatives in Congress.

"A minimum of control" by the Government might make us sigh for the simple days when Jefferson wanted a constitutional amendment forbidding the Federal Government to contract loans—a proposition which would have been somewhat embarrassing to Mr. Gallatin when the Louisiana Purchase had to be paid for. From well-known historical causes, economic and social, the Federal Government has become incomparably stronger, more complex, than Hamilton can have dreamed, but it is hard to see that "the people"—that is, some of the Democratic part of "the people"—attach much importance to the fine phrases on the subject.

Against the economic and social causes that have produced centralization to fight were vain. Against further attempts to magnify its sphere made by powerful minorities, societies, and classes the contest may or may not be more hopeful. Perhaps "the people" will not be satisfied till everybody has got his share of the swag or had his notions written into a law. With all respect, we disagree absolutely with Governor Ritchie's "final analysis":

"Most people who favor our increasing centralization of government do so because they lack faith in political democracy and its capacity to govern itself."

We doubt if many people besides a few "intellectuals" and their worshipers lack faith in political democracy. It is perhaps a common error of our democracy to trust in the wonder-working power of law. Millions of excellent Democrats believed, many of them still believe, that the social habits of other millions could be changed overnight by a constitutional amendment and a statute. The American idea of "liberty" too often takes the liberty of minding other people's business. This and that must be "reformed" by changing it. The reformers want democracy remolded to their heart's desire. They have too much faith in democracy. They think it is omnipotent. We must not look for instant utopias. What is sure is that "the people," in spite of its large apathy, never loses its capacity of getting upon its hind legs and kicking.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE OPPOSES GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF PRIVATE BUSINESS

Speaking before the opening session of the Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution, in Washington, April 15, and over a network of radio stations, to millions of people, President Coolidge took a firm stand as being opposed to Government operation of privately owned institutions. The Associated Press broadcast the following morning, April 16, to the whole country the statement that the President has issued "A warning to those who are 'willing to surrender self-government to Federal agencies,' coupled with an admonition against putting the Government in the field of business."

No doubt many unsuspecting listeners-in and readers will jump to the conclusion that the present administration is "safe," and that it is, because of such statements, not radical, yet few of the multitude who thus unceremoniously and thoughtlessly reach that conclusion do not probably know that the present administration has really stolen from the American farmer stockholders of the 12 district Federal land banks their voting power to the administration of these banks, and that, under the direct control of Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the administration, these banks are now operated contrary to every principle of Americanism, because that which belongs to the farmer stockholders is dominated by Republican politicians, or their appointees, which is one and the same.

Mr. Mellon thought it judicious to return to Bill Hays those Teapot Dome Liberties, because he knew they bore a bad odor and that the ownership was in question. The same Mr. Mellon did not believe it needful to return to the American farmer millions of dollars' worth of bank stock in the 12 Federal land banks which a short-visioned Congress, through the instrumentality of an unconstitutional amendment to the farm loan act, deprived the said farmers of exercising in accordance with American business principles. Yet, the President continues to issue addresses from time to time which make it appear that the administration is opposed to the "taking-over" process! If this be true, why has the administration been silent thus far in returning to the thousands of American farmer stockholders of these banks the stock which they have been legally forced to purchase in order to participate in the "saving" which these banks are supposed to make possible, and why have the appointees, from Mr. Mellon down, been so inactive in taking the move to make this honest return of farmer-owned property?

However, extracts from the President's address make interesting reading. However, let the reader remember that the Coolidge administration continues to operate the farmer-owned land banks against the wishes of the owners of those banks, for it is needful that this grain of salt be taken with any statement to the contrary issued by anyone speaking in an official capacity for the present administration.

Extracts from the address follow:

"There are always those who are willing to surrender self-government and turn over their affairs to some national authority in exchange for a payment of money out of the Federal Treasury.

"Whenever they find that some abuse needs correction * * * instead of applying a remedy themselves they seek to have a tribunal sent on from Washington to discharge their duties for them, regardless of the fact that in accepting such supervision they are bartering away their freedom.

"Government must be kept out of business.

"If the people are to remain politically free, they must be economically free. Their only hope in that direction is for them to keep their own business in their own hands.

"Public ownership leads inevitably to a position of entrenched selfishness, where a great body of public employees and large outside interests are in virtual control, with the general public paying a high cost for poor service. With all the care that it is possible to exercise, a situation of this kind become entangled with favoritism and is always in great danger of causing corruption and scandal.

"At certain times and in certain places * * * the power of self-government, instead of being retained by the people, has been exercised by those who were serving their own private interests rather than the public welfare. But the people have always aroused themselves and recaptured the control of their own affairs.

"When authority is located afar off it is necessarily less well informed, less sympathetic, and less responsible to public requirements. When it is close at hand it is more likely to be executed publicly and in the public interest.

"Our theory of society rests on a higher level than communism. We want our people to be the owners of their own property in their own right. We recognize that they are all capitalists by nature. We want them to be all capitalists in fact.

"The very essence of business is the expectation of a profit on the part of those who conduct it. * * * When business is in private hands it is expected to be run for the benefit of the owners. When the Government steps in the purchasers, users, and beneficiaries of what the Government undertakes to supply insist that the concern should be conducted for their benefit. It does not eliminate selfishness; it simply transfers it in part from the seller to the purchaser. Under these conditions it ceases to be a real business, becomes lacking in enterprise and initiative and does not have any motive to provide improved service.

"If it is desirable to protect the people in their freedom and independence; if it is desirable to avoid the blighting effects of monopoly, supported by the money of the taxpayer; if it is desirable to prevent the existence of a privileged class; if it is desirable to shield public officials from the influence of propaganda and the acute pressure of intrenched selfishness; if it is desirable to keep the Government unencumbered and clean, with an eye single to the public service, we shall leave the conduct of our private business with the individual, where it belongs, and not undertake to unload it on the Government."

WILL FARM-LOAN BANKS BE TURNED OVER TO FARMER OWNERS?

The above address surely was only a restatement of the principles which have made America the greatest country in the world, possessed of unique progress resulting entirely from the right of the owner of a given thing to himself manage and guide its destiny. However, we wonder if this declaration is to be construed that the present administration now intends to take action which their officials should have taken long since, namely, deliver to the farmer owners of the 12 district Federal land banks their bank property and remove the politicians therefrom, who have brought about just such a condition as the President pictures in his illuminating address?

It would be nothing short of mockery for a public official to continually speak about "keeping the Government out of business," when the administration with which he is identified, and for which he is directly responsible to the people of the Republic, have not only kept in business, but have taken away from the rightful owners—the farmers—the banking institutions which they—the farmers—own. Mr. Coolidge probably means that he intends to see to it that these banks are delivered over to the owners right away! But wait; let's see!

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—CROMWELL L. BARSLEY

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. In the Baltimore Morning Sun of the 18th instant appeared a dispatch from the Washington bureau of the Sun in relation to the objection that I had made in the Senate on the 17th instant to the consideration of the bill now pending in Congress which provides that in the administration of any laws, conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Cromwell L. Barsley, a former private in the American Army, should be held to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States. The origin of the bill was this: After twice serving as a private soldier in the American Army, first during the Spanish-American War and afterwards during the Philippine insurrection, Barsley was tried by a general court-martial on the charge of stealing two turkeys of the value of $3, the property of Company M, Nineteenth United States Infantry, and sentenced—to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States, forfeiting all pay and the allowances due him, and be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for nine months.

The report in the Sun was so misleading as to have inspired yesterday an attack upon me in Baltimore at a combined meeting of the American Legion posts of Baltimore by Maj. Henry S. Barrett, who in the course of an address to the meeting expressed the hope that the State of Maryland would not forget the name of the man—that is to say, myself—who refused to grant an honorable discharge to a soldier who fought honorably in two wars on account of a small, petty thing.

Another consequence of the report in the Sun was an editorial this morning, which places me, to use the words of the editorial, on—the frigid heights of puritanical morality where the unco' guid assemble in cold and gloomy conclave—

And so on.

The report in the Sun is misleading in more than one respect. It states that Barsley was twice a soldier and was twice honorably discharged from military service, and suffered a term of imprisonment, but it does not say that during his third term of service he was dishonorably discharged, but only that he was "sentenced to prison and lost his record." The report is further misleading—not to use a stronger term—in stating that I opposed the bill when nearly every other Member of the Senate present favored giving the veteran a "clean bill." This is not a fact. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that Senator SHORTRIDGE, of California, felt that if the bill passed the Government might in time give Barsley some little assistance, but he declared that the bill should carry no back pay and no back pension.

Senator KING, of Utah, expressed the opinion that the bill should go no further than to remove the stigma of dishonorable discharge. He was not willing that Barsley should have a pensionable status. Senator FLETCHER, of Florida, a member of the committee which reported the bill, simply said that his recollection was that when the bill came to the committee all that Barsley desired was to have his record cleared, and that he did not ask any pension. The statement in the Sun report that I stood firm for virtue, while a half dozen of my colleagues argued with me is entirely unsupported by the official record of the discussion. Nor can I imagine from what source the report derived the information warranting it in stating that all the other Senators in the Senate approved the restoration of Barsley's record. Certain at least it is that Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, said of Senator STEPHENS, who had brought the bill up—> what the Senator is trying to accomplish by an act of Congress is this: To say that this man was honorably discharged, when, as a matter of fact, he was discharged as a convicted thief.

The report of the Sun is also peculiarly misleading in that it does not disclose the fact that the real object of the bill in giving Barsley an honorable status was to lay the foundation for a pension for him. "I want him to have a pensionable status just like any other man who enlisted in the Army and served his country," was the frank avowal of Senator STEPHENS in the discussion.

The injustice done me by the report of the Sun was aggravated by the fact that it was published on the first page of the Sun with flaring headlines.

When all the facts of the Barsley case are taken into account, I respectfully submit that in objecting to the bill for his reinstatement as an honorable soldier I did nothing but what an ordinarily conscientious man might have done, and what Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, in fact did as well as myself. It should be borne in mind that the Barsley bill was so amended by the committee by which it was reported as to provide that no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance should accrue or be allowed on account of the passage of the bill. To that extent, at least, the committee shared the moral scruples of Senator CARAWAY and myself. I am informed by Senator BLEASE, who presented the report of the committee, that without this proviso not a member of the committee would have united in a favorable report.

The Washington reporter and the editor of the Baltimore Sun and Major Barrett may think that the theft of two turkeys, or any such theft, followed by conviction, a term of imprisonment, and a sentence of dishonorable discharge, is no reason why the thief should not be placed on a footing of honorable equality with an irreproachable soldier and receive the same pecuniary recompense in the form of a pension as he.

I do not; nor, I believe, do the honorable men and women of Maryland generally. Any man who does, with full knowledge of the facts, deserves, in my opinion, to have a stolen turkey tied about his neck and to be compelled to walk with it in that position fifty times around Sun Square, in the city of Baltimore.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 20, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, April 19, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be Thy holy name, O Lord most high, for Thou dost not look down upon us as one who dwells in the supremacy of might, but as a Father who is pleased to abide with His children in redeeming love. We thank Thee for this disclosure of the divine nature. When we are faint, Thy healing balm is near; when we are weary, Thy staff gives support; when we stumble, Thy right hand is nigh to lift us up. Give wisdom and counsel to the deliberations of this day. May all our homes be under the shadow of divine love. If any have great burdens or sharp cares, if any feel the pressure of a thorn or the weight of a cross, O minister unto them, by which they shall have great comfort and sweet peace. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5898), entitled "An act to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HALE, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SWANSON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1271. An act to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes, by the acquisition of areas of land and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservations for the adequate protection of such birds; and by providing funds for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3740) for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes.

Mr. TILSON. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that if necessary the time for general debate be extended until the time the committee rises. In other words, that general debate will not close until the committee rises to-day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With the same agreement as to the division of time?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; there may be no extra time, because we may adjourn early, but if there is any extra time, it will be divided as before. My thought is not to conclude general debate or begin reading the bill to-day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much time remains?

Mr. TILSON. Four hours and 20 minutes, and that will probably about consume the day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk says 4 hours and 18 minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is it the gentleman's idea to take up the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. TILSON. Not to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS. How is the time to be consumed?

Mr. TILSON. In general debate, nothing but general debate to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS. How much additional time is the gentleman asking for? He does not fix the time.

Mr. TILSON. We may not wish to consume any extra time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that nothing but general debate shall be in order to-day on this bill, and at the conclusion of 4 hours and 18 minutes if it is desired to consume any more time, that time shall be equally divided.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, the Speaker says nothing but general debate shall occur to-day. The Chair means in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TILSON. On this bill.

The SPEAKER. On this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title to the bill.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SEARS].

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, it is with a modicum, at least, of embarrassment that I try to talk in 10 minutes upon this subject. I can not do anything but hit two or three of the high points in this discussion. I have been working on this question for a number of years, as earnestly then as I am now.

I was the author of what I think is the constructive—I do not say construction—part of this bill. I think I should have had at least an hour, but I am not complaining; only making a statement of fact. It is useless for me to try and discuss this matter thoroughly when I am cut off with 10 minutes.

Several years ago, owing to the drought condition of the Great Plains country and the study I gave it then, I came to the conclusion that these questions were correlated, and that there is no more use of having a great drought than there is of having a great flood. They are both of wonderful danger to the people.

Great floods are caused by the aggregate waters from many small floods. I am satisfied that there is no more water falling in any county in the United States than the soil of that county needs during the season. I am satisfied that if the present run-off water is taken up by reservoirs in the small flood areas, which every one of you know, several of the lower floods will be prevented. Then the people back in each one of these flood areas would have a wonderful prosperity, using every particle of the water that falls there.

If you will look at the map that Governor SHALLENBERGER put up here yesterday you will notice the small amount of run-off water in any one of these flood areas.

Those western plains, where there is an immense rainfall, have a capacity to hold 3 feet of water. They put 2 feet of water each season on a great deal of that soil. The result is so wonderful to prosperity that in one county out there they have increased the valuation from $800,000 in 25 years to $40,000,000. They have decreased the flood flow of the Platte River 45 per cent. They have increased the low-water flow of that Platte River 47 per cent, holding back from the current of the main river over 700,000 acre-feet of water. There is no doubt at all that these waters can economically be conserved more cheaply than the immense expense that is meditated by any one of these bills.

When General Jadwin was smoked out finally, his statement grew from about $325,000,000 to a billion and a half before the project is carried out, and any project that we undertake is going to be carried out. If that is carried out before a survey is made of the possibility of reservoir control, of the virtue of which I am satisfied just as surely as I am that you gentlemen are sitting before me, and the Government expends anything like a billion dollars to throw that water out into the Gulf and welcome the floods, then my common sense and your common sense will tell every one of you as well as myself that it will not be in the lifetime of anyone now living when the United States Government will reverse that policy, after incurring this immense expense, and go to the policy of holding back and conserving the waters by reservoirs in smaller flood areas, where the floods originate. There is no occasion for any of these great floods at all. The land needs the water and the people in every community need it. The wheat market has gone up a half dollar in the last three or four weeks. Why? Because the wheat out there is dying for want of water in the Southland, in that strip of 2,000 miles long, and farther up. It is not in the soil and there was not the amount of snow which we would like to have had, and not the amount of rainfall. Our waters ran off and were not conserved. The result is that this Nation is going to pay at least two prices for its wheat. Of that I feel sure. The eastern seaboard calls on the West for 250,000,000 bushels of the wheat. In that group of States over to the Mississippi and the Missouri they raise only what they consume. The Pacific States consume more than they raise. All that is shipped abroad, all that two coasts need, must come from that strip out there. That is where it comes from. It has been figured out that in eight years production and consumption are going to come together, and that in eight years we will be an importing nation of wheat unless something is done to hold the waters and make them work for mankind instead of being an everlasting destruction. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Wheat during the winter freezes and is easily killed unless the land is moist, does it not?

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Absolutely. By taking out these waters the country will not have any more bad floods. We have not any to-day on the Platte. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] stated that the floods there were ended forever by a dam that was not even thought of in connection with flood control. It is true on the Platte. We do not lose any more bridges, railroad or otherwise. The waters are in perfect control where you take up a good share of the water. One great trouble with reference to navigation in the Southland is in the fall of the year. When the water goes down they have to get out dredges, cutting across the sand bars that show up. The Platte River turns in four or five times as much water now as it used to in the fall months in the low-water time, and that river is simply an illustration of what can be done on every one of our rivers.

I think this is a great moment in the life of this Nation. Economic legislation is before us as it never was before, and if a failure be made at this time it will not be the failure of the Secretary of War or of the President or of General Jadwin. It will be the failure of Congress, where the responsibility must rest. [Applause.]

The two most eminent engineers that appeared before the Flood Control Committee were each most emphatic that no general plan should be adopted until the reservoiring of the minor flood areas had been carefully surveyed. They both realized that as yet no plans had been presented of a definite nature that would justify the adoption of a permanent plan of sending the waters en masse to the Gulf. Anyone attending the hearings before the committee surely recognized that the Army engineers were without civil engineering knowledge. The Army engineers admitted that they knew it to be the policy of our Government when getting information with reference to rivers for legislative action they were required to report as to flood control, navigation benefits, agricultural use, and power. Not one of them made any statement of any definite nature that would throw any light except with reference to dumping the waters into the Gulf.

The belief is here expressed that the shallow and harmful so-called investigation and reports were perpetrated as they were because of the power influence that is abroad in the land, and that reaches and focuses clear to Washington.

Apparently no thought was given to the uses of the run-off waters. Millions more of people are affected by droughts than are affected by flood. More people have been ruined, millions over, by the effects of droughts than by the effects of flood waters. Why should a system be fastened on the Government that will perpetuate floods and also perpetuate droughts when there is but one manner of flood control and it will relieve both conditions? Wherever reservoirs have been constructed there floods have ceased, and the contribution of those flood waters has been subtracted from the flood waters below. Wherever reservoirs have been constructed to conserve the water, then great benefits to agriculture and intended uses have resulted.

What shall we say as to respective costs? With the Jadwin plan we start out with the admitted billion five hundred million to commence with. No one expects otherwise than this amount shall grow, and this to perpetuate floods. To this must be added an annual upkeep charge of at least $25,000,000 on completion; and some years it will be more. This is interest on $600,000,000, all dead capital.

A number of well-posted men have testified as to the cost of reservoir control. Mr. Blake, of Oklahoma, who has given 15 years of intensive study to the subject, believes that $600,000,000 will more than safely reservoir all the flood areas. Also that at least two-thirds of this amount will be reimbursed to the Government by the uses of water and districts that will take reservoirs over by purchase. Professor Mickey, of the State University of Nebraska, who has given many years of study, believes that Mr. Blake's figures are safe ones to follow.

What government before this was ever asked to deprive a great section of its people of their greatest asset, and without benefit to anyone? Is the picture any more pleasing when it is of annual floods rushing through this great country, engulfing its people and carrying destruction in its wake, because it is made perpetual? And because the greatest agricultural section of the world is permanently deprived of prosperity and permanently dedicated to droughts? Is it any more pleasing because 55,000 people are driven away from their homes, that 6,000,000 acres are perpetuated as swamps, that churches, schoolhouses, and organized society there are destroyed? Such a sight as this surely has not been known to America before this time. The picture is the blackest ever attempted to be placed on the canvas of time by deliberate statesmen.

What is the moving influence back of this wretched program that proponents are trying to foist upon this country? We all know. We may as well be frank about it. It is the great power interests of this country that are wrapping their tentacles about all our remaining national flesh. That interest is bound to a policy that means that national resources shall not be developed except as they only are in charge of the development. And then at such cost to the people as shock the conscience. To illustrate, that great interest for years has prevented this Congress from legislating with reference to Muscle Shoals for the benefit of the people. And during this great delay they are getting the power from that plant at 2 mills a kilowatt-hour and selling it to users at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour. If anyone is bold enough to declare that the people of the southeast corner of the United States are being fairly dealt with, let him declare it.

That great influence had enough force at the Chicago flood-control convention—so called—to keep from the resolutions any reference to the control of floods at their source by reservoirs. The threat was made to carry the question to the floor of the convention, and a reservoir plank was inserted. A few days thereafter General Jadwin, who took part in the convention, named a commission to investigate and report as to reservoir control. He named at the head of it one who had been given a leave of absence on half pay from his service to the Government to take employment at a greatly higher salary with a power company. The report was a farce. The employer paying the higher salary got the report. General Jadwin knew of the dual employment. Lately, the head of that so-called commission of so-called reservoir possibilities was smoked out and resigned from the Army. Before the report was made the association of power people held a meeting and resolved that all flood-control works should be confined to the lower stem of the Mississippi River, which was a declaration of war against reservoir-source control. The report helped to carry on the war against the people's greatest asset yet remaining. Is it any wonder that I doubt the advisability of intrusting to General Jadwin the investigation to be made of reservoir-source control? My own opinion is that under such conditions reservoir-source control would have no more show than a one-legged grasshopper in a pen of hungry turkeys.

All I have asked is for an amendment which should provide that until we have a report from a proper and open-minded board of inquiry as to the value of reservoir-flood control that none of these great run-off ways shall be acquired, which can be done by next December. Being assured as I am that if reservoir-source control is undertaken and carried out by the Government that it will benefit every section of our country; that we will be without great floods and also without great droughts; that the only real flood-control measure will then be reported on favorably; and that the people of the lower stem of the river in place of a great swamp will follow the peaceful pursuits of agriculture and of normal life.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to make a suggestion to the gentlemen having in charge this bill and those who are most deeply interested in it. I understand several amendments are in contemplation. If such be the case, I hope that these amendments will be printed in the RECORD so that we may have some opportunity to consider them before we are called on to vote upon them. I think it would expedite proper deliberation upon this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, following the suggestion which the gentleman from Virginia made, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read for the information of the committee an amendment which I intend to offer at the proper time and which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 4, on line 15, strike out the words "local interests" and insert in lieu thereof "the several States within the Mississippi flood area"; and on line 21, after "(b)," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 22 and insert in lieu thereof "without cost to the United States provide necessary drainage works and rights of way or easements for structures, spillways, and flood ways as and when required and will hold safe the United States from all damages or claims resulting from such work: Provided, That each of the said several States within the Mississippi flood area shall contribute for the acquisition of land, easements, and rights of way as herein provided in proportion to the acreage within its boundary benefited by the flood-relief plan herein provided: And provided further, That the United States will reimburse each of the said several States one-third of the amount expended by it for the acquisition of said land, rights of way, and easements."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to ask that the committee give some consideration between now and to-morrow to the provisions of my amendment. Personally I sincerely hope that an agreement may be reached satisfactory to all factions, so that we may all vote for the bill and send it to the President with a unanimous vote of the House.

As to my amendment, in the first place I provide that the relation between the Federal Government and the affected areas would be direct with the States involved, instead of with "local interests," as provided in the bill. Rather than have the Federal Government deal locally with townships, parishes, counties, or municipalities, as the case may be, I feel that it would be far more satisfactory to establish direct relation between the States and the Federal Government. It seems to me that the agencies of the States are better qualified and in a better position to deal with their own subdivisions, so that we would have the Government dealing directly with the States in carrying out the provisions of this plan.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How would that apply to a State having a constitutional provision prohibiting the expenditure of any money by the State for the object involved? I understand the State of Arkansas has such a provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It seems to me the States would have to provide the machinery to comply. I submit that it is only fair when we bring in the State of Washington, or Maine, or New York, or any other State distant from this territory, that the States right in the territory should do just a little more and at least provide the liaison between the Federal Government and their own communities. If we are confronted with a proposition that a State directly involved is prevented by its own constitution from cooperation with the Federal Government, I would say that such a proposition weakens the arguments of the sponsors of this bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would not the gentleman's amendment do away with all benefit assessments—assessments for special benefits as the result of the improvements?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would leave that to the States.

Mr. COX. Would you consider those areas to be specially benefited?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I repeat, I would leave that to the States. I would provide that only the lands or easements necessary for the spillways or flood ways be furnished by all the States in the Mississippi flood area to the Government for the purposes of the plan provided for in the bill. Inasmuch as a great deal of the flood ways would be in one State, manifestly it would be unfair to put the whole burden upon that one State, and therefore we should apportion the costs to the various States in the flood area, in proportion to the acreage directly benefited within these States. For instance, it is estimated that about 19,000,000 acres would be benefited. If that estimate is correct, a State having 3,000,000 acres would pay three-nineteenths of that cost of the land or easements necessary for the flood ways. That is a very small item compared to the total cost of the project. In order to meet the objection that even that burden would be too great, I provide that the Federal Government reimburse the States one-third of the amount expended by them for the necessary acquisition of the land or easements.

Mr. COX. But what would the gentleman do with the New Madrid setback, which is admittedly for the benefit of the States below, but is located entirely in the State of Missouri?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would come under the general plan. As to what Missouri's share would be is a mathematical question to be determined in accordance with the general plan. That is mathematical and not legislative.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. The question is how these States could get into this arrangement. Would they have to have amendments to their constitutions?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is left to the States. Under this plan there would be left to the Federal Government the entire cost of the work and the construction, the construction of the levees, and the States involved and affected would provide but two-thirds of the cost of the land or easements.

Mr. COX. But that would condition Federal action upon cooperation by the States? And if one State should refuse to cooperate, that would mean that there would be no improvement within that State?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not imagine a State refusing to cooperate. If a State affected refuses to cooperate to the meager extent provided by this amendment, I fear it would weaken the desire of the country to bear almost the entire cost.

Mr. COX. The gentleman must understand that the areas in the States especially to be benefited constitute a minor part of the territory in any one State, and those living in the other areas within the State would not see any reason for being taxed for the benefit of those living in the affected area.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly; but the proportion of contribution would be reduced to an insignificant figure in comparison with that contributed by the Federal Government. We can not shut our eyes to past experience. We know that when this land is taken by condemnation, to be paid for by the United States, it will suddenly acquire artificial value, and the price may be exorbitant. If it were left to each State to condemn I am sure local interest would be protected and thereby eliminate all dangers and possibilities of graft, speculation, and profiteering.

Now, if the figures given by the sponsors of the bill are more nearly correct than the figures given by the gentleman from Wisconsin as to the cost of the land, you must perceive that the contribution of the State under my amendment would be trivial. It would be simply nominal. And my purpose in bringing about this amendment is to safeguard not only the interests of the Government, but to safeguard the interests of the States as to what will happen if they do not take the necessary measures of protection.

Mr. COX. Does it occur to the gentleman that it would cost the State of Louisiana anywhere from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think it would cost that much.

Mr. COX. If the figures given are correct, it would cost that much.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. Louisiana would not have to pay for the land necessary within that State. That expense would be apportioned to the States having territory to be directly benefited.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call the attention of my colleagues from New York to the fact that there is a very good editorial on the subject in the New York World this morning, pointing out the condition of the local interests along the Mississippi.

The editorial points out and states frankly that the local interests—that is, the communities which have suffered by the last and past floods—are really in a bad condition financially and in every way. It points out, too, the danger of land speculation and profiteering if the present bill is passed unchanged. I believe that my amendment would take care of the situation. As I said before, it will leave to each State involved entire control over its own communities, and it would require only the contribution on the part of all of the States directly interested of the land and easements necessary for the floodways and spillways required by the plan; that is, only two-thirds of the cost as my amendment would provide for the reimbursement to the States of one-third of the amount so expended. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I am informed, intends to offer an amendment providing that the Federal Government may even loan to the States the amount necessary if the States so request. I want to repeat and make clear that this does not call upon the States to contribute any large amount of money or any large percentage of the total cost. The contribution is limited only to the land or easements over the land for the necessary floodways and spillways. On the figures presented by most of the gentlemen who are in favor of this bill as to the number of acres that will be required and the value of the land or of the necessary easements, I do not believe that the burden to be divided among the various States concerned would exceed 5 per cent of the total cost. It would, however, protect the Federal Government against the abuses with the resultant speculation and profiteering which would add an enormous amount to the cost, and would forever discredit in the minds of the American people the policy of making flood control a national matter.

There was also an excellent editorial in the New York Times along the same lines. Everybody is anxious and eager to have this matter cared for by Congress at this session. Everybody wants to take the necessary measures regardless of necessary costs to prevent another flood disaster, and everybody wants this bill so drawn as to prevent leakages and the entire breaking down of all necessary protections to the Federal Treasurer. Millions are available and should be available for flood protection, but not one penny for graft and profiteering.

I desire to point out to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that if the figures and estimates presented by him and other gentlemen on his side of the question are correct, surely the cost of the land and the easements that would be required in Louisiana to carry out the plan could be nothing like the figure that he has just mentioned.

As to reimbursing railroads for relocating tracks, it seems to me that is a question which could well take care of itself without writing into this bill anything which would change existing law or give an undue advantage to railroad companies. If the railroad bed and tracks are in or along territory in no danger of floods, and by reason of the Government work it is compelled to move the tracks, surely existing law is ample to fully protect the rights of any railroad company under such circumstances. On the other hand, if a company has its roadbed and tracks in territory that is in danger of floods and the Government in order to protect that territory spends millions of dollars, it seems to me that the protection and benefit derived by the railroad company would more than offset the cost of removing tracks if it were necessary. I fear though that by the provision contained in the bill concerning public service corporations existing law as to liability as well as the law on the measure of damages would be changed to such an extent as to require the payment of heavy damages to these corporations, regardless of the equities involved. The Government is better protected under existing law and surely the corporations have no just ground of complaint.

Gentlemen, I am heartily in favor of immediate and adequate measures being taken by the Federal Government for permanent flood relief. I want to do everything within my power to perfect the bill, to reconcile existing differences so that the bill may become a law, and the law provide the means and the money necessary to commence work. A presidential veto may furnish a political issue, but a political issue will not control the waters of the Mississippi. Some of us are asking so little in order to safeguard this bill against abuses that I feel certain we can come to an agreement that will satisfy all factions. We must not permit selfishness, greed, avarice, and special interests to impair the bill and the great work in the future. The true friends of flood relief put politics aside and are ready to work shoulder to shoulder to bring about the passage of a bill that will do the job.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, the district which I have the honor of representing is a part of the Louisiana Purchase. It is indissolubly connected with the life, romance, and history of the great world-embracing dreamer—Napoleon Bonaparte. The King of Spain had by the secret treaty of Ildefonse ceded Louisiana to France in 1800. Just a few years before Napoleon's birth, on the Heights of Abraham, at Quebec, in 1759, France had lost a continent in what is considered one of the decisive battles of history, and rightly so, because it was there decided whether the civilization of this continent and ultimately this hemisphere should be Latin or Anglo-Saxon.

Napoleon, like every Frenchman, longed for the time when France should win it back. The great Corsican, triumphant everywhere except on the sea, where England disputed his sway, longed to see the day when a French army would again dispute the title to this virgin continent with the conquerors of Quebec. Over here there would be no English Channel, like an impassable moat, to shield "perfidious Albion." He longed for the time when his eagles would mingle with those of the Cordillera as well as with those of the Alps; when his domain would spread from the Mississippi to the Pacific; and when Mexico would fall into his lap like a ripe peach from the bough of time, for the whole world was not too spacious for his ambition. He would strike England in Canada. He did not love England overmuch. He was the William Hale Thompson of his generation. [Applause.]

In 1801 he had concluded the treaty of Amiens with Great Britain. In 1802 that treaty had been irreparably shattered, and in 1803 England had her eyes on Louisiana. Napoleon thought she was feverishly preparing to take possession of it, for Britain disputed the title of France to it. That was what he would have done. Pitt fortunately overlooked that. Napoleon planned to send General Victor with 25,000 French grenadiers to take possession of Louisiana and be ready for all emergencies.

But 1803 found every royal bayonet in Europe pointed at the breast of Bonaparte. Before him were Austerlitz and Ulm, Jena and Auerstädt, Eylau and Friedland. Livingston had suggested the purchase of New Orleans. The wily Corsican clung long to his dream of an American empire where a growing France under his sway would find room to expand. But no one knew better than he that a dagger, a bullet, or mayhap a Waterloo might end his career, and that England's first demand from humbled France would be Louisiana, which would add a great empire to his hated rival. He would renounce for the moment his dream of American conquest. He needed money for the wars that faced him in Europe. He must feed his hungry cannon. He would sell not only New Orleans, he would sell Louisiana. So, down at the Palace of St. Cloud, he affectionately ran the tips of his fingers over the map of the Mississippi Valley and exclaimed:

> The cession of Louisiana will forever strengthen the power of the United States, and I have given to England a maritime rival that sooner or later will humble her pride.

So it was that we secured Louisiana. So it was we got the Mississippi. So it was we inherited the flood problem, the greatest flood problem, with one exception, that ever confronted any people.

Through Napoleon we not only acquired the Mississippi but it was through him that we got our first lesson in flood control. Gen. Simon Bernard, who served under Napoleon at Waterloo with the rank of lieutenant general, was Napoleon's chief of engineers. After Waterloo, in 1816 General Bernard came to America as the guest of Joseph Bonaparte, who had taken up his residence in this country. Some one here in Washington had the good sense to place General Bernard at the head of the Army engineers, where he stayed a dozen years or more, and ever since that time the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army has been the best body of engineers in the world, thanks largely to General Bernard. Afterward he was back in France as Minister of War under Louis Philippe.

In 1822 General Bernard issued the first report on the floods of the Mississippi. He had constructed the dikes of the Po, under the direction of Napoleon, to control the floods of that river. He recommended dikes or levees for the Mississippi, and, no doubt, if the watershed of the Mississippi had remained as it then was, the levees or dikes would have controlled its flood waters. So began the work that we are trying to perfect over a century later.

And what an empire this Mississippi Valley, with all its tributaries, is—an empire that produces more than 100,000,000 people can consume! Rome ruled the world from Egypt to the British Isles, yet her eagles could not fly in a straight line as far as from New Orleans to Helena, Mont. Alexander conquered the world and was triumphant from the summit of the Alps to the foot of the Himalayas, yet he could not march his invincible phalanx in a straight line as far as from Pittsburgh to Santa Fe, all within the watershed of this mighty river.

But wide as it is and productive as it may become, future generations will need it all. The populations of England and Germany increase annually over 1 per cent. Should our population increase only as fast as that we will have in A. D. 2000 over 200,000,000 people and by A. D. 2400 some 3,200,000,000. The ripest and rarest scholarship in the world is exhausted on the Encyclopedia Britannica. About 80 years ago it estimated that if the resources of the North American Continent were fully developed it would afford sustenance for 3,600,000,000 inhabitants. At that time that number was five times the number of people there were on the globe. But the human race has doubled in the past century. And it has been the experience of the race that where a soil and climate will support a population the population will come, and this prodigious population will be in existence in about four centuries. That future population must be fed largely by the drainage area of the Mississippi Valley. Napoleon truly said a century and a quarter ago that this would be the richest valley in the world. It long ago justified that prophecy. To-day it produces 70 per cent of the farm products of the Nation and 60 per cent of its wealth. It produces 80 per cent of our wheat and over 90 per cent of our corn. In fact, it creates and produces over 70 per cent of all the basic fabrics of trade and manufacture—coal, iron ore, oil, cotton, wood, and wool—all the basic substances except copper. It has nearly 75 per cent of the Nation's railway trackage and furnishes 58 per cent of its manufactured products; and last, but not always least, it produces 65 per cent of the Members of this House of Representatives.

What we do about this matter of flood control is of vital interest to every citizen of this entire country. This is the greatest task on the hands of this Congress—this and farm relief. And they are closely allied, for they affect to a great extent the same territory.

This is a great constructive and creative enterprise, and it is the duty of every Member here to conscientiously and honestly meet the issue without splitting hairs nor halting at trifles. This bill does not suit me. It does not suit anyone exactly, but that is not strange.

When, on the 17th of September, 1787, the Constitutional Convention was ready to sign the draft of the Constitution there was not a member of that body who was entirely pleased. Washington said there were parts of it which he did not and probably never would approve. Franklin said the same thing. Alexander Hamilton signed it and then tapped the parchment with the tips of his fingers and said it was just a makeshift. But later, when he and Madison were writing the Federalist, the greatest thesis ever written on human government and the greatest exposition ever evolved on that Constitution, Hamilton declared he discovered the intervention of the Almighty in it, as he had so often observed it in the affairs of the Revolution. Fortunately it did not suit any of those great men, but was the result of the combined wisdom of all of them. It seemed as if the good Lord had kept all the fool things out of it and kept all the wise and good things in it and thus produced the greatest document for the preservation and evolution of liberty the world ever possessed.

Now, I am not comparing this bill with that immortal document, I am merely repeating what has been said heretofore—that it is the best bill we could agree on. Bring on your constructive criticism, and if it does not suit you amend it. That is what the committee tried to do. After months of hard work and most exhaustive hearings we reported the best bill we could agree upon.

It has been suggested upon this floor that this bill will encourage speculators to prey upon the Government, if it passes. That has a most familiar sound. That is exactly what they said when Hamilton and Washington undertook to establish the public credit of the United States by paying the public debt of the States and of the Continental Congress. They said that sinister agencies had bought up the scrip issued to the Revolutionary soldiers, and that therefore it was not wise nor right for the General Government to assume and pay the Revolutionary debt. Did George Washington and Alexander Hamilton stagger back before that kind of kitchen gossip? People said, "Let the States do it!" Washington knew the States would not do it. He knew that they would do it like they furnished food and clothing at Valley Forge. It was a task bigger than the States. It was an enterprise for the National Government. It was the biggest undertaking this Government had to perform in launching the Government under the Constitution, and that was the establishment of public credit. Washington and Hamilton knew that no nation was any stronger than its public credit. They knew that the fate of their country depended upon the establishment of the Nation's credit, and they proceeded to do it in a businesslike manner. And they deserve the everlasting acclaim of their country for their work.

And that public debt was a staggering sum at that time—$80,000,000, one twenty-fifth of the entire wealth of the thirteen States. You are talking about this Mississippi flood control costing a billion dollars. I do not understand how this figure is arrived at. I heard nothing serious in those hearings that indicated anything of the kind. But if it did cost a billion, and it did control the Mississippi floods and those of its tributaries, it would be the best investment since the purchase of Louisiana. [Applause.] That would be only one three-hundred-and-fiftieth of the wealth of the country as against one twenty-fifth for the Revolutionary debt.

In supporting this bill I am not conscious of violating any party pledge or principle. Rather, I am following illustrious examples of party policy. All through our political history as a party there runs like a golden thread the principle of nationalism. It means that we always emphasized the Nation and not the States. "We the people" and not "We the States." This has come down to us through our political ancestry, and we are proud of that political ancestry—Washington, Hamilton, John Marshall, Daniel Webster, Abraham Lincoln. Our political ancestry comes down through them as clear and distinct as our lineage through our fathers. We can claim Washington with more consistency than any other party. We have adhered to his policies and principles closer than any other party. The old Federalist Party was not so true to them as we have been. He launched this Government with several primary political policies that were based on fundamental principles: First, a strong and indissoluble Union. The fundamental purpose of our party was to preserve the Union that Washington founded. Secondly, financial integrity—payment by the Government of the Revolutionary debts and the establishment of public credit. Thirdly, industrial stability by following Hamilton's "Report on manufactures," which involved a protective tariff. All will admit that that is a Republican principle. And fourthly, nationalism as opposed to internationalism—national security, no entangling alliances.

Every one of these four policies has for half a century been a fundamental idea in all Republican platforms. Say what you may about the League of Nations and its defeat by a coalition of Senators from both parties, yet behind all of this, within the shadows, towers the majestic figure of Washington, who had warned us against entangling alliances.

The policy pursued in the flood relief bill is nothing new. It is consistent with the policies and principles of the Republican Party. The first speech that Abraham Lincoln ever made he announced he was for certain policies: One was a protective tariff, another the United States bank, and another internal improvement, by which he referred to the Government improving rivers for navigation and building post roads.

We forced this idea of nationalism down the throat of the Southland. We did it in the decisions of John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States; we did it at Vicksburg, Chattanooga, and Gettysburg; we did it at Appomattox 63 years ago. Now, let us be both honest and consistent. We said that the life of liberty depended upon nationalism; that only through a great and powerful central government could our free institutions survive. Lincoln said:

It has long been a grave question whether any government not too strong for the liberty of the people can yet be strong enough to maintain itself in a great emergency.

This Government proved strong enough to maintain itself in the face of the greatest emergency that a republic ever faced. So let us drive true to form; let us demonstrate again that the Union was worth saving, if for nothing else to throttle this menace of the Mississippi flood. For what chance could there be for flood relief if two nations were separated at Cairo instead of one nation indissolubly welded there so that the strong arm of the North might gather up the South staggering under the weight of this mighty river's wrath? Let us prove our faith in our own doctrine—the doctrine of nationalism.

All have agreed that this is the most important civil matter that has been proposed to Congress in a quarter of a century. Then let us approach it in a manner fitting such a task. It is a stupendous creative enterprise; a great, comprehensive and constructive program to accomplish. We do not need a wrecking crew. We need a construction gang.

This bill provides for surveys of the tributaries of the Mississippi which are subject to destructive floods. The program is to control eventually all the tributaries that have destructive floods, both for the local benefits that will flow from it and for the effect it will have on the lower Mississippi. Many tributaries have floods which, though less extensive, are extremely destructive in the area affected. In the district which I represent we have the Kansas or Kaw. In 1903 a flood destroyed from thirty to forty millions worth of property. Sixteen bridges were swept away, which cost many millions to replace. It cost the lives of a dozen people. In my opinion we can not locally control that flood, but if embraced in a comprehensive plan with the help of the Government it can be mastered.

Fear has been expressed that this flood-control plan will cost too much money. A billion dollars has been mentioned. An extravagant figure from the light of the evidence. Did we not vote nearly $400,000,000 for the Navy the next fiscal year? I voted for it, and I think it was justified. In the past eight years we have spent about $6,000,000,000 on the Army and Navy, and I am not criticizing that. But why, when a great constructive, creative measure like this is before us, do we cry "pork," and vote billions without batting an eye for other purposes which, to say the least, are no more worthy than this? Why is it that when money is mentioned for flood control or farm relief you cry "pork barrel"?

This bill preserves the principle of local contributions, making an exception of the stricken regions of the lower Mississippi. It recognizes that those people have already contributed $292,000,000 in past efforts to control the flood and a half billion in the losses sustained in 1927. I am one of those who, adhering to the policy of local contributions, make an exception here for the reasons stated.

As one who has no political or financial interest except that of a sympathizing fellow countryman, I plead for the 750,000 men, women, and children who tremble beneath the sword of Damocles in the Mississippi Valley. I plead for them whose homes were made desolate by that cataclysmic disaster, whose stock and property were destroyed or carried away on the angry flood. I for one, as a Member of this Congress, want to exert my influence and cast my vote in their behalf, and in doing so I believe I am following the example of the greatest of all Republicans—he who had "malice toward none and charity for all."

And if we do this I believe that it will be the ultimate triumph that he would have decreed for his principles of government and humanity. A greater triumph than when he was called in 1860 to the highest office on earth. A greater triumph than when the flower of the southern army withered before his flaming guns at Gettysburg. A greater triumph than when he sent Sherman, shod with iron fury, to trample the Southland into the bloody dust. A greater triumph than when the gallant sword of Lee was yielded up at Appomattox. A greater triumph than when, just 63 years ago to-day, with the world bowed at his bier, he lay yonder under that great dome, crowned with the everlasting halo of martyrdom. [Applause.] A greater triumph than when his countrymen, North and South, built that temple of classic grandeur on the bank of the Potomac where he sits on his marble throne. His greatest triumph will be when the Union which he saved and for which he died, grown rich "beyond the dream of avarice," strong beyond the vision of its founders, reaches out its mighty arms and rescues his beloved Southland from the menace of its ancient enemy—the fury of the Mississippi flood; when those "mystic chords" will vibrate again as he said they would, when "touched by the better angels of our nature." [Applause.]

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SINCLAIR]. [Applause.]

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Chairman, it was well said at the beginning of the debate on this bill for the control of floods in the Mississippi Valley that this is the greatest undertaking that has ever confronted the National Government. It is, indeed, a stupendous task, and the solution of the problem of flood control will mean more to the economic welfare and safety of the Nation than possibly any other one act that the Congress can perform.

As is generally known, the "levees only" plan has heretofore been adopted as the sole means of controlling the Mississippi floods. There has been considerable criticism of the Army engineers in connection with this plan. I think, in justice to the Army engineers, they should not be held entirely responsible for its failure. A part of that failure rests directly upon Congress. When the Mississippi River Commission was organized, its work was based on improvement of the river channel in the interests of navigation. After a preliminary examination by the commission, its first recommendation to Congress asked for an appropriation with which to contract the channel and stabilize the banks of the river in order that the velocity of the stream might be accelerated. This would insure a scouring of the bed and a more uniform channel. It made navigation easier and more certain. This policy was adhered to by the commission and approved by Congress for over 12 years, and no part of the funds appropriated by the Congress was used for the purpose of preventing injury to the adjoining lands or to prevent floods, except as the deepening and improving of the channel might do so.

About the year 1890 the Congress permitted the building of levees as a partial aid in stabilizing river banks, and this policy prevailed until 1917. Whatever protection was afforded from levees prior to that time was furnished by the individual landowners or levee districts located along the river. It really was not until 1917 that the Congress recognized flood control of the Mississippi River as a part of the national responsibility.

The question we have to decide here in the enactment of legislation is what particular plan we are going to adopt for the control of floods in the Delta basin of the Mississippi River. It is pretty well agreed by all that the "levees only" plan has proven ineffective. Even the friends of that proposal are ready to admit that something additional must be done. The question then, resolves itself into this: Since we are unable through "levees only" to confine the waters within the river channel, shall we let the waters out of the river at convenient and suitable places in the lower river, or shall we prevent them from reaching the river by retention dams and source-stream reservoirs in the headwaters of the various tributaries?

It is contemplated that the "outlet system" will require the dedication of over 6,000,000 acres of land for flood ways and backwater areas. No one knows for a certainty whether this area will not be constantly enlarged as the volume of water increases in future years. It would necessitate a large and growing sum annually to be appropriated for the maintenance and upkeep of levees and spillways. Consequently, we should be reluctant to authorize this plan until a further study has been made and a final conclusion reached that this is the only plan that will insure a margin of safety.

There are five great tributaries that pour their waters into the lower Mississippi from Cairo to the Gulf. They drain 31 States, amounting to over 1,250,000 square miles. The annual discharge of water from this great drainage basin amounts to nearly 500,000,000 acre-feet. The maximum discharge from the Ohio River and its tributaries into the Mississippi is 1,400,000 cubic feet per second. The upper Mississippi River discharges a maximum of 450,000 cubic feet per second. The Missouri River has a maximum discharge of 430,000 cubic feet per second. The Arkansas River has a maximum discharge of 800,000 cubic feet per second, and the Red River has a maximum discharge of approximately 250,000 cubic feet per second. If all these tributaries were discharging a maximum flow into the lower Mississippi at the same time, it would make a volume of water in excess of 3,500,000 cubic feet per second. This would make a flood approximately one-fourth greater than the 1927 flood and greater than any known flood in the history of the country.

There are those who believe that the proper way to control the floods of the lower Mississippi is to control the water at the source of the tributaries. Eminent engineers consider this the best method that can be adopted. If the flood waters are prevented from reaching the lower valley they can do no damage there. By restraining them they will be absorbed at the source of their origin.

It has been estimated that a system of reservoirs in the upper waters of the Ohio River can reduce the flood height of the river at Pittsburgh over 10 feet. This can be met at a cost of something like $20,000,000. Similar reservoir sites have been located in the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers that will reduce the maximum stream flow of the Ohio River at Cairo by 50 per cent. It has been demonstrated by capable engineers who have made a thorough study that a reservoir system on the Arkansas and Red River Basins will reduce the stream flow of these two rivers over one-half at an estimated cost of $100,000,000.

The State engineer of North Dakota has made a study of a reservoir project in that State which would divert and impound the waters of the Missouri River during the flood season. It is a well-known fact that the annual evaporation of the Great Plains States is exceeding the annual rainfall in those regions. This is due to increased vegetation, wider cultivation, and the more rapid run-off of the annual rains that fall upon the land. Eventually it means the depletion of the subsoil moisture. Even now crops can only be grown successfully in many sections every other year by means of a system of dry-land farming. In my State there are enormous natural storage basins that would afford an annual storage of approximately 5,000,000 acre-feet of water, which could be diverted from the Missouri River. All of the various basins and depressions could be filled from the flow of the Missouri during the flood periods in the spring. Engineers have made a survey, and state that a dam could be constructed in the Missouri River at Fort Clark that would raise the water in the river 150 feet, backing it up 138 miles, without destruction to property except the almost useless bottom land of the river. This reservoir could provide storage for 15,000,000 acre-feet of water, which, added to the storage in the various basins over the State, heretofore mentioned, would make a total of 20,000,000 acre-feet. In this one reservoir alone over one-fourth of the entire annual discharge of the Missouri River could be stored.

During the spring months or flood time in the lower valley, the entire discharge of waters from the Missouri River could be retained in this reservoir alone. The estimated cost to build such a reservoir would be approximately $35,000,000. At the time of the flood of 1927, the Missouri River, at the point of the proposed dam, was carrying approximately 160,000 second-feet of water. This amount is approximately 7 per cent as much as was in the lower Mississippi. If this Missouri water can be stored, and also that of the Arkansas, Red, and Ohio Rivers, it will have practically solved and controlled the flood problem of the Delta stretches of the Mississippi River. It is the excess flood waters that do the damage in the lower valley. Engineers believe that a complete reservoir system can be accomplished at a total cost of $400,000,000.

The people of the Great Plains area are suffering from a lack of water, while the lower Delta basins are suffering from too much water. Why permit this condition to exist when a comprehensive program of control can relieve both situations and provide additional economic benefits to all? No adequate survey of either plan, that of outlet or of reservoirs, has been presented to the committee. None has been had. For that reason it is provided in this bill that an expenditure of $5,000,000 be made for the purpose of surveying the tributaries as to reservoir sites, and studies made thereof as to the effect on flood control. A similar topographical survey must be made in the Delta basins in order to locate the outlets if that plan should be finally adopted. In the meantime, there is sufficient work to occupy the whole time of the agency in charge of repairing levees along the stretches of the lower Mississippi.

In my opinion, for the immediate safety of the city of New Orleans, the Bonnet Carre spillway should be put in. This will cost approximately $12,000,000. The levees on the main river should be brought up to the 1914 grade and section, as approved by the Mississippi River Commission. This will cost about $150,000,000. The work of channel stabilization by means of revetments and bank improvements should be carried on until finished. This will cost $110,000,000. These estimates are practically agreed upon by both the Mississippi River Commission and General Jadwin. They are considered necessary work in the plans for flood control of both organizations. It is my opinion that these projects should be undertaken and vigorously prosecuted until finished. In the meantime, further surveys of spillways, outlets, and reservoirs should be made with a view to securing the best plan for comprehensive and effective flood control.

I have arrived at my conclusions with reference to this bill after a thorough study of all the evidence presented to the committee. I am frank to say that my judgment has been much influenced by the testimony of Mr. John F. Stevens, the most eminent engineer in the United States to-day, who appeared before the committee and stated that it would be impossible for anyone to decide intelligently on a plan for flood control of the lower Mississippi River without further and very careful study of the whole problem. I think the opinion of an engineer of the achievements of Mr. Stevens is entitled to the utmost consideration.

If the reservoir plan be adopted, it will equalize the benefits to all sections of the country and afford flood protection not only to the main river but also to all of the tributaries. In addition, the returns to industry and agriculture, through the use of the reservoir waters, will within a reasonable time more than pay the initial costs to be borne by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in these few minutes I wish to discuss one phase of the question that has been brought upon the floor of the House and upon which I think the membership should have information.

When we began the discussion and hearings upon flood control and began to work out a plan, we assumed, of course, that everyone dealing with it would want to know exactly what the facts are and would want to deal with them in perfect fairness to everyone concerned. I therefore want to offer some suggestions and some evidence which has been collected relative to the statement that this proposition is going to cost one billion dollars or a billion and a half dollars on account of the efforts of large banks, large landholders, and lumber interests in the alluvial valley to hold up the Government for $75 an acre for the land that may be necessary in that section for flood ways.

This statement has been carried in the press throughout the country and has been offered as evidence why this legislation should be defeated.

I believe it is generally admitted by all that where property is taken to be used as a flood way compensation should be made for whatever interest in that property may necessarily be dedicated to that purpose. Since these charges have been made and the record filled with statements and the names of various concerns, especially by my friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I think it only fair to state that many of the statements are entirely unfair and not justified by the actual evidence. For instance, we had a committee of engineers make an investigation of the land values in the territory to be taken for flood ways all through the basins, and especially in Arkansas and Louisiana, and the report showed a value of about $25 per acre, which is quite in contrast with the statement which has been given to the press and the country of $75 an acre.

Then an investigation and report was made by the Mississippi River Commission based upon a survey of the Tensas Basin, and the cost of all the land required, including the work of clearing and removing the timber where necessary, was estimated at $36,000,000. In this basin my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] outlines practically 2,000,000 acres at $75 an acre.

Mr. FREAR. What flood way is that?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The Tensas Basin flood way.

My friends, charges were made and certain companies were named that happened to be interested in Arkansas and Louisiana. Their names were given and a special reference was made to the Tensas Delta Land Co. Even charges were made, which I think were unfair, that former Senator Lorimer, of Illinois, had his office in the same building as this land company. He had no connection with it in any way. Senator Lorimer happens to live in my district in Louisiana. He went down there and established a sawmill in that country and acquired some property. He was a patriotic and public-spirited citizen there, and on account of the losses from this flood, when his sawmill interests were 15 feet under water, his property was practically wiped out and he has had to abandon Louisiana and go back to Chicago. After all his work there, he wound up owning in his own name 16 acres of land. Now, is it fair to bring charges against this former Senator just because he happened to be in the same building with the Tensas Delta Land Co.?

I am going to place in the RECORD a number of telegrams, which I would like to read if I had the time. I want to read especially a telegram from the president of the Tensas Delta Land Co., which owns in my district in Louisiana about 200,000 acres of land, which, I think, is the amount that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] stated.

A portion of that would be in the flood way. Here is what the president of the Tensas Delta Land Co. wires me, a man of standing both in Chicago and in New York:

RILEY J. WILSON, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

President Coolidge is misinformed about lumber interests wanting to hold up the Government in any way on flood control. To the contrary, they will aid in every way in granting spillway rights at nominal cost per acre for land used and very low prices for timber used or destroyed. Tensas Delta Land Co. have authorized no one to make prices on extravagant statements, as reported by STRONG of Kansas, which are untrue. We do want flood control, but not swamp drainage that would ruin the timber. The swamps are necessary for regrowth of hardwoods and acts as reservoirs in high water. Our company ready to accept the lowest prices for land and timber required, ranging from $5 to $10 per acre as may be timbered, with minerals reserved.

That is for the actual title to the land of the Tensas Delta Land Co. The flowage rights is all that anyone expects to acquire, and those would be from $2 to $5 an acre.

The telegram continues:

The writer has been exploring timber in the watersheds of the Mississippi River from Pennsylvania to Montana south to the Gulf, and thus, knowing the great value of protecting this vast territory from devastating floods, believes it to be a national instead of local question.

JAMES LACEY,
President Tensas Delta Land Co.

Charges were made against the Williams Cypress Co. that it wanted to unload on the Government lands at $75 per acre. Here is a wire from C. S. Williams, vice president of the F. B. Williams Cypress Co.:

W. H. DICK,

President Mississippi River Flood Control Association, Washington, D. C.:

Your wire 17th; have discussed subject of your telegram with representative of Downman interests, Kyle Lumber Co., and others. It is our opinion that the use of the Atchafalaya Basin as a flood way would damage our cut-over swamp lands to the extent of, say, $5 per acre, owing to the deposits, and therefore killing of hardwood timber now on these lands, as shown by experience higher up the river. We believe that $10 an acre would represent a fair value for our land, reserving to us only the mineral rights, which at this time appear of high value, but which would not be materially affected by additional waters. We would be unwilling to give up mineral rights, and it seems unnecessary for us to do so. It was agreed that should these figures seem out of line, either too low or too high, that we would gladly submit the question of remuneration to arbitrators. In any event, we don't feel we are entitled to more than actual losses to be incurred. Machinery should be set up, however, for the condemnation of all lands required for flood-way purposes, and reasonable prices should be insisted upon by the Federal Government.

C. S. WILLIAMS,
Vice President F. B. Williams Cypress Co.

Now, that is the value of the land which it is charged they have taken and want to hold up the Government for $75 an acre.

As I said before, the people of this valley, whether they live in Chicago or Louisiana, are interested in flood control, and not in one instance has there been an effort to hold up the Government in that manner.

As I said, the flowage rights is all that is necessary to be acquired. The charge was made that banks in New Orleans were purchasing lands in that territory. I wired to the various clerks of courts of the parishes in the Tensas Basin, and the replies were uniform that no activity whatever, no purchases of lands in the flood ways were being made, and normal conditions prevailed everywhere.

I have a letter from Mr. Lorimer tendering to the Government the right to such of his lands as are left in the basin the right of use without one dollar of cost.

I have a wire from the Holloway Saw Mill Co., which reads as follows:

Congressman RILEY J. WILSON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Have heard claim that land in Tensas Basin was being held at exorbitant prices for Government flood-control purposes. We own 15,000 acres in Tensas Basin and offer all or such portion as needed for flood-control purposes at $10 per acre, reserving timber and mineral rights, or $5 per acre for flowage rights.

HOLLOWAY SAW MILL CO.

I have other telegrams from large landowners in the flood-way areas, as follows:

Wyatt Lumber Co. have been acquiring lands in Delta section Louisiana for 10 years; none within last 3 years. Our lands necessary for flood control can be had at cost and carriage, and none in excess of $10 per acre; we reserve mineral rights and to have water privileges.

A. H. HENDERSON.

Re telegram, we offer in fee about 7,000 acres land in Tensas Parish, La., we reserving timber, oil, and mineral rights. Part of this land is now in cultivation, but, nevertheless, we hereby offer it at average price of about $12 to $15 per acre. We do not understand what is meant by flowage rights, but we are willing to leave flowage price to be fixed by any board of Government engineers at what they think is fair, or to any arbitration board of three, and their decision to be final.

PENROD-JURDEN CO.

In the opinion of this company lands in our territory needed for levees and spillways in connection with Mississippi River flood control can be acquired for not exceeding $10 per acre, owners reserving timber and mineral rights.

TALL TIMBER LUMBER CO.

In the opinion of this company lands in our territory needed for levees and spillways in connection with Mississippi River flood control can be acquired for not exceeding $10 per acre, owners reserving timber and mineral rights.

TROUT CREEK LUMBER CO.

In the opinion of this company lands in our territory needed for levees and spillways in connection with Mississippi River flood control can be acquired for not exceeding $10 per acre, owners reserving timber and mineral rights.

GOOD PINE LUMBER CO.

In the opinion of this company lands in our territory needed for levees and spillways in connection with Mississippi River flood control can be acquired for not exceeding $10 per acre, owners reserving timber and mineral rights.

GRANT TIMBER & MANUFACTURING CO.

These telegrams represent the owners of more than half a million acres of the land under discussion. Their attitude is plain. The figures they quote are plain. They show in a way that can not be contradicted that the charges that have been made of extortion, speculation, and land grabbing are utterly without foundation and are nothing in the world but propaganda. They further show that the land or flowage rights can be acquired for less than $10 per acre.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, one of the strangest exhibitions I have ever seen in any bill that has been presented to the House is the situation that confronts us now. Not one word of evidence was offered to the committee of these land values except those that were furnished by the engineers, so far as my recollection goes. The Army engineers and the Mississippi River Commission made their statements to us and the Mississippi River Commission estimated about $100,000,000 damages for the two flood ways. The Army engineers on different estimates of $25, $50, and $75 an acre made their estimates which I have quoted.

The gentleman from Louisiana, a member of the committee, never questioned the men who came before us, and said that the cut-over lands were worth $75 an acre. I asked, Is it true that you believe that nonproductive lands in the flood way are worth $75 an acre? and the answer was yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. We had that question up day before yesterday and some man from Missouri mentioned $75 an acre. I want to say the reason the values were not asked about is that nobody dreamed that these people in Louisiana or Arkansas would ever be charged with attempting to unload their lands on the Government at any such price.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know what price you want to unload without contribution.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. There is no proposition to unload any land on the Government, but they are offering lands to the Government for flood rights.

Mr. FREAR. That is as far as I can yield. How do you acquire land rights? By condemnation proceedings. You must go into court. Men do not come voluntarily and make an offer to contribute. They wait until the law is passed and then they say, "What are you going to give us?" You proceed with condemnation rights for flowage as you do for full title. What is the evidence in the case of the Panama Canal, which it was said in Congress was going to cost $150,000,000?

We paid over $300,000,000 for it, and according to some estimates here we did not spend one-third as much for the Panama Canal as we are going to pay for this Mississippi River proposition. One was an investment, the other an enormous contribution.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not just at this time. I want to make a connected statement if I can, and I am only answering the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] because all of the estimates that I got were very much higher. For instance, take the New Madrid proposition, which is another flood way. There it was in the neighborhood of $150 an acre. If we did not know of some places down there in Louisiana that are now offering this land, that was not our fault. There was no evidence of it before the committee so far as I can recall. I am simply quoting the engineers on the estimates so far as they could ascertain. No estimates were furnished the committee. It would seem to me that the most important thing to do would be to present to the Government of the United States what it is going to cost when you are offering such a bill.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Is it not a fact that the estimate of the Mississippi River Commission for land and clearance in the whole Tensas Basin flood way was $36,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, here we have it at page 90 of Document No. 1, committee report, Atchafalaya flood way, $52,000,000; Tensas flood way $107,000,000.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. But I am speaking only of the land. The figures the gentleman quotes includes the works as well as the land. I think the gentleman ought to be fair.

Mr. FREAR. I will be fair, but I can not yield further. Why did not you ask these questions in the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Because I knew those people were not going to want $75 an acre and never thought anything about it.

Mr. FREAR. You did not know what they were going to ask. You never knew. You did not ask any of them.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. And the gentleman did not, either.

SEVENTY-ONE MILLION TO RAILWAYS

Mr. FREAR. That is true. I did not know of it until the bill was reported, what it would contain, but then I asked the facts from Army engineers. Let me quote from Committee Document No. 14:

> The entire expense in taking care of the railroads at this and all other points where expenditures must be incurred to adjust their tracks to fit in with the comprehensive plan recommended by General Jadwin should be assumed by the Federal Government.

This is Document No. 14 that I am quoting from, and the cost is estimated at $66,835,000, and the railroads afterwards jumped that estimate up to over $71,000,000, which amount the Government will have to pay these railways in the flood ways. Here are the names of the railway engineers who signed this—a dozen or more. That is their document and claim against the Government. Are you going to give them that? Possibly.

Mr. Chairman, I concede that this question of values is about as elastic as the length of a piece of string. No one knows what it is going to cost. No one will ever know what it is going to cost if the Government of the United States is to buy this 4,000,000 acres of land, because we will buy it at the outside price. You gentlemen in Louisiana and in Missouri and in other places could get the property at a reasonable price if to be taken by local interests, but once get the United States Government in there, or get a railway in there asking for a right of way, and every man who has any experience in these questions knows that it will cost the Government of the United States or the railways far more than the estimate. I can not say whether it is going to be $25 an acre as figured by the Mississippi River Commission, or whether it is going to cost $50 an acre, or far more than that figure. At $25 an acre the cost of the project is over $800,000,000, and it will go far beyond that.

DRAFTED TO LEAD THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Chairman, I want to present something a little out of order. I am placed here to carry on part of this minority work. I think every member of the committee, at least every member of the minority of the committee, knows that I was not anxious to assume that burden at all, but was placed here at their request, possibly because I had had some experience. I speak of that in justice to myself as well as to all of the members of the committee. If I am not presenting the case properly or effectively, it is their misfortune and not mine, because I did not assume the responsibility to begin with. I have been consistent in my attitude of 12 years ago, and I hope that I shall be hereafter, because that is what I understand to be the issue. I commiserate with my good friend the chairman of the committee, Mr. FRANK REID. I have tried lawsuits for many years, as have many of you here. I never before had constantly dinned into my ears, "This is what your client is trying to do, this is a settlement that your client is making," with the newspapers coming out every morning with a new proposition of what my "client" is doing and what FRANK'S "client" is doing. We are simply presenting the facts to you. We have not any personal interest. He has made a great fight and has done some splendid work. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] can not say anything in praise of the chairman of the committee that I will not affirm in respect to his ability and his work. The only interest we have in mind is to present to the House the facts, and yet we are both of us placed in this peculiar position: That constantly, every morning, we are advised what our "clients" are going to do. Think of the absurdity of it.

Mr. COX. It would be most unkind on the part of anybody who is familiar with the work of the gentleman from Wisconsin to question his sincerity.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman. I have differed with the gentleman from Georgia occasionally, but we differ like lawyers, and that is right. That is the only way you will ever ascertain what the facts are in legislation.

I do not know what advisers the President has had. I am not speaking for him. I have never assumed to do that, as you all know. He has been given figures, and I assume that some of them are the same figures that were given to me. He says that this is an extortionate bill in its present form. Perhaps he has modified his ideas; I do not know. I say the same information comes to me, I assume, that comes to him, excepting that I have had the additional benefit of such witnesses as have been asked questions and of the records that have been placed before us.

And I want to say this in reference to him: As to Presidents of the United States, I have served under three. Two were strong and independent men. The other was a very likeable man. I do not need to mention names. And I will say to you, my Democratic brethren, that one President whom you followed through his Cabinet officers helped to break up what is known as the public building pork barrel, although you were in the majority at the time. I can give you the names of the people who furnished the facts to me and sat over behind that desk every day. Your President was independent, and brought that about with the aid of Cabinet officers and a Republican. The man who is to-day in the White House is seeking to stand up against tremendous pressure. I know men who go there constantly, generally on one side, seeking to benefit from this legislation. I hope he will stand firm.

Politics? Yes. On the Democratic side I could tell you about a whole lot of Democratic votes that you are going to get from one city. Do you suppose that support is coming to you because of the legislation alone? Do you suppose there is any politics in it?

I wish I could stop there. But over on my side here we are alike with troubles, so that is one of the propositions mixed up in this bill—the alignment on politics, the alignment on other bills now pending before this Congress for action. We know it. I do not want to discuss it more openly, but those are the facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the political alignment is significant because of its being the year 1928?

Mr. FREAR. Absolutely. Next year you will have an entirely different situation than that which exists now, and under the circumstances I do not blame you for insisting on the legislation being enacted this year.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. I come from one of the large cities you speak of. A year ago I sent out a questionnaire to all my constituents, and practically all who answered voted in favor of this legislation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But not for this particular bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am going to vote for it, not because I am a Tammany man but because I believe in it.

Mr. FREAR. There may be others who will do the same; all of them, I believe.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. There is no politics in it. The Democrats are always for State rights except when it comes to prohibition and getting money out of the Federal Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. Now, the gentleman is getting outside the field that we are discussing, although I must say he is a delightful colleague to start a row.

I have not seen the maps that are to be presented by the distinguished chairman of our committee. We have agreed that when they are presented—and there are quite a number of them out here in the lobby—I may want to speak for a few moments about them.

VITAL OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL

Now the three principle objections to this bill are these: First, the commission is to be purely political; and if it is to be political, nothing under God's heaven will stop it from hereafter yielding to every demand. That is going to be the effect of it. Next, as to this section 4, the proposition of damages. When it once goes in force you will have bills without limit presented to the United States, and you will have to try them by local juries just as you try the ownership of lands and their values. It is all to be done at Government expense.

I do not know whether my friend is here who had the colloquy yesterday with Major LAGUARDIA. I refer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN]. He quoted the United States Chamber of Commerce as his authority. I am surprised beyond measure that a distinguished economist like the gentleman from Rochester—and I am one who has a high admiration for his ability—that he should quote the United States Chamber of Commerce and tell us how they voted on flood control. You know how they vote. When they voted against the soldiers' bonus bill the gentleman from Rochester voted for it and voted with me, if I remember correctly. When they voted for the Mellon tax bill he voted against it, with me, if I remember rightly. When they voted upon this flood bill they did not know what kind of a bill it was to be, or what kind of expense it was to be. How do they vote? They do not vote by individuals, as we all know. They vote by local organizations, and the subject is presented in a way ordinarily to suggest the vote wanted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The same chamber of commerce is now in this position, of urging Congress to reduce taxes by $400,000,000 and at the same time favoring this proposition here.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That shows what good business men they are.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; the chamber of commerce to-day is advocating a cut of $400,000,000 in the tax bill. They do not know anything about it. Only a distinguished economist like my friend who was questioning Major LAGUARDIA yesterday would ever have thought of quoting the chamber here. If I am mistaken in that, I am ready to apologize.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. How would you fix the damages for acquisition of the property other than by local juries? Would you have any other plan than the local juries?

Mr. FREAR. No. There have been several amendments suggested, and the bill proposes a commission. It has been proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that the States undertake to secure the lands.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. That the States do it?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and that the Government pay a part of it back to the States. Then you would have local interests protecting themselves from local witnesses in condemnation suits when the cases were presented.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And protecting themselves from absentee landlords?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Like a railroad company, you would have no sympathy at all on the part of local witnesses unless the local government is interested.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Then it would seem to me that it involves simply a ring?

Mr. FREAR. No; not with a third.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Why should not the proposition be that there should be local commissioners and have the Federal Government compensate the State?

Mr. FREAR. Why should the Government compensate the State? That is a matter for argument if you wish to have the Government contribute any part toward it.

Why should not the States which are benefited contribute their share? My State, the State of Wisconsin, is willing to give its part. Therefore why should not the States down there give something for special benefits? I am not asking that as a question, but I am offering it as an argument. Why should Wisconsin, my State, give $10,000,000 to the States of Kentucky, Arkansas, and Louisiana? Why should we do it? We are willing to contribute our share of the total cost, and therefore I say that the States which are getting the special benefits should contribute their share. When it came to the San Francisco earthquake, when it came to the flood and great loss of lives in Los Angeles the other day, when it came to the Vermont flood, and when it come to these other calamities, the States affected exercised especial help to the communities afflicted. The local States gave what help they could, and they should do it in this case, because property values in those States will be increased from 100 to 200 per cent in all probability with complete protection.

Their lands are going to have an increase in taxable values, and they are going to get a greater return from their lands by reason of the carrying out of the project proposed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the land value is as the sponsors of the bill say it is, you would be asking the States to contribute about 10 per cent of the entire cost.

Mr. FREAR. Just about. I will say to my friend—and I am not here discussing the McNary-Haugen bill, which is a very sympathetic bill, or any other proposition that aids the farmer—I have seen within the last few years keys to building after building turned over to the banks and to mortgagees in the West; not in my State, because we are better off there. I have seen those farmers leave their places because, as Judge SEARS and others say, they have poor crops; they have everything against them; the tariff has not protected them; the railroads have been protected, but not the farmers; labor has been protected, but not the farmers; the farmers pay from two to three times as much for labor as they paid before the war, and yet they get practically the same for their products; and yet do not propose to give them anything. No one has suggested that. What we do propose to do is to loan them money, and that is as far as we go. Why are they not entitled to gifts without limit if this bill passes? Here is a proposition originally to give certain States $292,000,000 or $300,000,000 or whatever the amount may finally be; the proposition is not only to do that, but to give them everything else in connection with the plan if it amounts to $500,000,000 or to $1,000,000,000. There is no limit—only the sky.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] yesterday referred in a rather unkind way, I thought, to those who differ with him on this subject; and I believe he mentioned the gentleman from Wisconsin as a demagogue. Does it not strike you that a man who has been before this House time after time opposing the McNary-Haugen bill and not offering anything as a substitute which would relieve the farmer ought not to speak in that tone? We are willing to do what we can; we are willing to do a great deal for his State and other States, but we do say, do not force the Government to pay it all. I think the only proposition we should consider at this time is to provide some small contribution on the part of the States that are to be relieved.

I am perfectly willing to stand on my record on this question of demagogism. In that connection you can take the average man and find out where he stands. He asks us to give everything to the State of Louisiana, and when it comes to a farm proposition which will help them, then I am denominated a demagogue when I disagree with him on flood control.

There is in the neighborhood of 4,000,000 acres to be given for this flood way. I believe it ought to be turned over to the States. I would be perfectly willing to loan money to the States to pay a portion of it, although I believe the States ought to assume it themselves. We hear a great deal of talk about Teapot Dome and the extravagance involved in that transaction, and yet I want to say to you that if this bill should go through as it was originally proposed it may cost, in the train of legislation that will follow, $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000. I do not mean directly as the result of enacting this one bill, but I refer to other bills that will follow. Is not that something which should be called to your attention?

Now, this work is not going to be carried out this year nor next year. It will take 10 years or more.

You are not attempting at this time to pass a bill which will cover all of those questions. You are not going into the question of reservoirs and you are not going into the question of tributaries, and I say to you that if we find the predictions verified as it comes to us from the engineers, you gentlemen who are interested in reservoirs and tributaries are going to be the ones to regret it, because I believe it is going to do more than all else to block the proposition you have.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. If the States do not contribute and the Federal Government pays it all, would it not cost as much in the end anyway if you have an adequate system of control?

Mr. FREAR. No; because, on the same theory, if you are going to acquire a piece of land and you go into the place where they are all looking for every dollar they can get, they are going to stick you for every dollar—to use that expression. If the Government lets the other fellow buy it and then pays part of it, and he pays part of it, and he is a man who lives in the community, every man knows what the effect is to lessen the cost. I believe that is every experience.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. But is not the land acquisition a small amount in comparison to the $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 that the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests is the estimated amount it will cost?

Mr. FREAR. I did not mean that would be the cost in this case, and I want to emphasize that. I hope the gentleman will not go out and say I said it was going to cost $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000. I was not referring to this case when I used those figures. I was referring to the expenditures which would be required by the train of bills which would follow in connection with reservoirs and tributaries. I hope I have made myself plain to the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Reverting to the argument the gentleman made against a board of civil engineers, what does the gentleman say about its being political? What does the gentleman say about the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the——

Mr. FREAR (interposing). Just a moment. Please argue it in your time. Ask me a question and I will answer it.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I am going to answer this other question of the gentleman from Oklahoma first.

I have disagreed with the Army engineers possibly as much as any man on this floor, as some of you gentlemen know, but I never disagreed with them as to their ability; I never disagreed with them as to their honesty of purpose; it has always been that they have not stood up; that they have not withstood the assaults that have come upon them from localities, that they have not been able to do so.

Here is an example of what you would have all the way through if civilian engineers are chosen. You will have 100 names presented to the President for the two places for appointment on the commission, and as soon as outside interests get political control of the commission—and that is certain to come—you know what would happen. That is a result that would naturally follow, for hundreds of millions of dollars in levee bonds are then to be backed by the Government.

These Army engineers are capable and they have had years and years of experience.

Some one said yesterday on this floor that 200 Army engineers have passed upon this Mississippi River question in bringing in this Jadwin report. We did not have a single civil engineer present to us a single plan as against the Army engineers' plan, which was a comprehensive plan. My good friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] criticized them very severely——

Mr. COX. Just what does the gentleman say of the plan presented by the Mississippi River Commission?

Mr. FREAR. They are practically a part of the Army engineers.

Mr. COX. Not all of them, by any means.

Mr. FREAR. Not all of them, no.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. As I have studied this bill I have found it very difficult to find out what plan is to be followed under this proposal. On the first page, it says that the plan submitted by the Chief of Engineers and printed in a House document is approved and adopted. Then I find that there is a commission to be appointed, and notwithstanding a plan has been approved and adopted, this plan is to be reconciled with the recommendations of this commission. Then I find at the bottom of that page that if this commission can not agree with the plan already adopted and approved, they are to come back to Congress. I find myself traveling in a circle on this question, and at the end of the section the sum of $325,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated "for this purpose." For what purpose? After a plan is adopted, then it is to be reconciled with the plan of some other commission and then it is provided that if they can not agree on anything they are to come back here again. I am at sea, especially when I find $325,000,000 authorized to be appropriated "for this purpose"—for what purpose?

Mr. FREAR. To devise a plan.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Why do they not start out with a plan?

Mr. FREAR. My good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL] has put in a few words, better than I could put it, the actual situation that confronts us with respect to this bill.

NO CONGRESS SHOULD DECIDE ON THE PLANS

I am prepared to say, and I believe it is fair to every member of the committee, that although we sat for many months trying to ascertain all the different plans and the influences that would affect every plan, we finally determined we were not sufficiently expert to report a plan. We were wise in not reporting a plan. The best we could do was to recommend some agency that should determine a plan, and in this case the Army engineers had offered their plan. Anyone who attempts to go beyond this, as we discovered, would immediately be open to attack, and he would find he was simply stranded. We were wise in this respect, everyone of us, because of the experience we gained on the committee, and it was a very valuable experience for all of us, lawyers as well as others. We could talk over legal propositions, but when it came to engineering plans we were in deep water.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes more.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. The project which the gentleman has in mind, or whatever he has in mind, is contingent upon the various States contributing, is it not?

Mr. FREAR. That would be one of the suggestions.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. What will happen if one or more States refuse to contribute?

Mr. FREAR. That is a very fair question and is one that has been propounded here several times. I can not conceive of any State not contributing; but I am going to assume, for instance, that the State of Missouri would not contribute. I know the State of Illinois would contribute because they pay their part always, but the State of Missouri, it is said, will not do so.

You are going to have 10 years before you can complete your project. I asked this same question, and it is a very fair question and was one of the first questions I propounded to the Army engineers. I said, "Give me an answer to the question of failure of any locality to contribute." I wanted to know about it, and I presented that same question in the committee several times. I put the answer of the Chief of Engineers in the RECORD with my remarks when we first began this debate. Briefly, as before stated, the Government will complete any necessary link in the chain of levees but would not otherwise protect low-valued lands without contributions.

Now, here is an important consideration in connection with that question. Examine the answer and see if you can find a flaw in it. It is to this effect. For a year or more they have got to complete the plans they now have in building up the levees and doing all the necessary work, thereby giving States the opportunity of making their contributions. If they do not contribute so far as they can, then they are going to protect first the property that is most threatened and that is of value. If it is property worth only $5 to $10 an acre, as my good friend from Louisiana has said, I say the Government of the United States ought not to pay $25 an acre to save such $5 lands; but if it is a part of the connecting link of the plan, they have got to do it.

I have an amendment which I want to offer that provides, first, that any State or any locality, if you so decide, that wishes to raise money and has not the means can borrow from the Federal Treasury from the Secretary of the Treasury at low rates of interest for a long period of time in order to contribute its share.

If they refuse—which it is almost impossible to conceive—then the Secretary of War may have the right, where he finds it is necessary and essential to the plan, to go on and complete it.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. If the State refuses, the Government may go on and complete it.

Mr. FREAR. If it is absolutely necessary, as you propose to do now. The gentleman, in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], I believe, wanted to know what I had done in my objections for legislation. I may not have accomplished much. I did hold up some bills that I thought were bad bills and we defeated them. One was the public building bill and two were in different river and harbor bills that were bad. I can tell the gentleman some things that were stricken out and never put back. I have tried to do some things that are of value. It may be that I exaggerate the importance of them, but after the gentleman and I have been here longer, perhaps he would not ask anyone what a man has done in the way of legislation in Congress. I think he is a valued Member even in the short time that he has been here.

Mr. MAJOR of Illinois. I wanted to know how you were going to compel the local contribution.

Mr. FREAR. I know; but I was talking about the remarks the gentleman made about me yesterday. I gave the gentleman the answer to that question, but apparently he did not understand me. Read the letters that I have put in the RECORD.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. RAGON. If I understand the gentleman correctly—take Arkansas, for instance.

Mr. FREAR. Arkansas suffered seriously, I know.

Mr. RAGON. Suppose Arkansas could not pay. Do I understand that the Government will go on and construct it irrespective of any legislative action by Arkansas?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman will remember that Arkansas is not 5 or 10 miles long, but several hundred miles long. The project is not going to be affected by 5 or 10 miles unless it holds up the whole proposition. If it is a part of the entire project, if it can not be eliminated, the Government eventually in the 10-year project will have to build it if Arkansas refuses. As the gentleman from New York proposes, we will loan Arkansas the money. Surely they can borrow the money. I fully appreciate the situation; Arkansas has a worse situation than has Louisiana.

Mr. RAGON. That is the important point. The gentleman concedes that they would have to have some legislative action.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. As I understand, under the distributary proposition it would receive only 8 per cent under the Jadwin plan. You give them very little relief.

Mr. FREAR. I think the people of Arkansas would be loyal and patriotic as the people of Missouri and Wisconsin or any other State. They would be so when they realize it is for the protection of their own people and their own properties, and if they did not see fit to do it I think the Government would do it if a necessary part of the plan. I would not for a moment expose to danger any particular unit if that unit itself needed protection.

Mr. RAGON. What machinery would you use in the case of Arkansas?

Mr. FREAR. It could be allocated by the territory that is to be protected. It would raise the taxable values, which would enable the State to do it rather than have the Government pay it all.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman concede that the Government has the taxing power?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; but I can not conceive of any State that would not borrow the money if the Government of the United States would loan it to them under the amendment which will be offered.

Mr. COX. But suppose the State is disinclined to accept it.

Mr. FREAR. It is impossible to conceive of that.

Mr. COX. If the State did not cooperate for any reason they may have, you would not favor flood control?

Mr. FREAR. Only in certain cases where it is necessary, as stated, to complete the plan; not for valueless land.

Mr. COX. Would not the gentleman concede that it is necessary to protect all of the land?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. Some land that is worth only $5 an acre I do not think should be protected by the Government of the United States at an expense of $25 an acre. I have so stated repeatedly. It is not necessary for the completed plan to buy all of this property. If the gentleman from Georgia will kindly read the report of the Army engineers, whom, I understand, he denounces—but I want him to be fair, because I think he is fair—he will see what they say, and then he can question it as well as myself.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL NOT MET

Mr. COX. I agree with the gentleman in much he says in the way of criticism of this bill. For myself, the bill presented by the chairman of the committee best expresses my views, and I take it with the exception of the provision as to the manner in which the cost shall be paid, it best expresses the views of the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. The bill presented by the chairman of the committee, without any reflection, reported $325,000,000. When we offered it to the Army engineers they said that it would cost a billion four hundred million dollars, and that was because of gauge heights fixed at Cairo, at Arkansas City, and at New Orleans.

Mr. COX. Neither the Chief of Engineers nor any of the other representatives from the War Department gave any testimony before the committee with reference to the execution of the plan submitted by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. FREAR. No authority, to my knowledge, before the committee ever suggested the gauge heights that were put into the committee bill and that the gentleman voted for.

Mr. COX. No.

Mr. FREAR. That was my difficulty. We did not know what the expense would be, and when we submitted the question to the engineers they told us.

Mr. COX. But the Chief of Engineers never at any time hinted or intimated that the cost of the execution of the plans that he offered would be anything like the amount which the gentleman now states, upon information, as I understand it, given by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. FREAR. No; because under his proposition the localities and the States were to furnish the money.

Mr. COX. Contribution from the localities would make up a part of the cost.

Mr. FREAR. That was part of his plan.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. For a question.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I want to ask the gentleman a question to get in my own mind what he wants to do. What is the gentleman's proposition—to make complete flood control for the whole section down there or just through the Mississippi River? Which is it?

Mr. FREAR. What does the gentleman mean by "for the whole section"? All of the tributaries?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. All of the tributaries, because the gentleman understands that the tributaries furnish 60 per cent of this water.

Mr. FREAR. This bill does not propose to do that.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I am asking the gentleman what his idea is. I am trying to get what you want.

Mr. FREAR. What I want to do is this: I want to relieve the people down in the lower Mississippi Valley from the danger to life and property that exists right now. They ought to be taken care of, and then afterwards we can take up this question of the tributaries, which to my mind is an important question; but at this time we can not propose to settle that matter, because if we do we will have to settle the question of reservoirs and other matters at this time.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. That is what I am trying to get at. I was down there when the flood was at its crest.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, just ask a question, and never mind about the flood.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Are you ready to have me ask you now?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. What I want to know of you is this: Do you propose to make flood control just through the Mississippi or do you propose to make flood control that will take care of such rivers as the Arkansas, the Red, the White, the Missouri, and those which furnish 60 per cent of the water?

Mr. FREAR. In this bill?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. No; I ask you what you propose.

Mr. FREAR. This bill is before us. The question of what I propose to do with the flood control generally has nothing to do with it. I may propose to join in some reservoirs away up in Nebraska before I get through. At this time I am interested only in this bill and am insisting that the Government should not undertake an expense of upward of a billion dollars on this one project.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The gentleman has spoken several times. He ought to have something in his mind as to what he proposes to do.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I have. I am not going to shift my position. The gentleman proposed a contribution of one-third in his argument the other day.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Yes; I did that the other day. The trouble is that the gentleman has not yet told us what he proposes.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know what the gentleman proposes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. The gentleman is the one who is doing the proposing.

Mr. FREAR. I refuse to yield further, because we do not get anywhere with such a discussion. I am in this position: The bill is before us. The gentleman may as well ask me what my views of the stars are. On this question I am in favor of relieving you people down in the South, but ask for local contributions.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. How do you propose to do it?

Mr. FREAR. You do not know how you propose to do it in Illinois?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I am not talking about Illinois.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, you will after a while, when you come to us for help there; and I believe there are some things in Illinois that should be taken care of.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. But you ought to have some way of telling us what you want done.

Mr. FREAR. I have discussed it repeatedly. I could not tell you in a minute, and the gentleman knows it, and that is the reason he asks the question. The gentleman would not ask it as a reasonable question. He could not answer it himself, if I understand his question as to tributaries.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I could if I took as much time as the gentleman has.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer briefly to the statement which the last speaker made, in which he announced, with great passion, that the entire Tammany delegation from the State of New York was going to vote for this bill.

Mr. FREAR. I will yield the gentleman a minute more, so as not to take his time. I wish to say that I have heard that statement. I trust it is true.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I do not know from what source the gentleman gets his information, but so far as I personally know I think he makes a pretty good guess. [Applause.] And I will tell him why. It is because up to the time this bill was brought on the floor of this House it never had been suggested by anyone in any responsible quarter, so far as I know, that this great flood of 1927 was anything less than a national calamity. The Mississippi River does not belong to any State. It does not belong to Illinois, or to Missouri, or to Louisiana. It belongs just as much to us in New York, who are as far removed from it as any people in this Union. Why, gentlemen, whenever there has been a great calamity affecting any part of this country, the first place to which the eyes of the afflicted people of that community have turned has been the State of New York. The State of New York has always been willing to contribute to alleviate the sufferings of the people of other sections of this country. It has never been parsimonious. It represents a liberal section of the country.

I can not follow some of the arguments that have been made against this bill. I can not follow them now any more than when it was before the Committee on Rules, of which I am a member. I can not see why the people who happen to live along this great river, which serves the entire Nation, should bear any part of the cost of it, for the reason that anything that is done there is going to relieve a situation which will contribute to the whole Nation and not alone a part of it.

I was interested in hearing the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], the only alleged Republican left in the city of New York—there are only 18 Republican Members from the whole State of New York out of a total of 43—switch his position and say now that he wants the Southern States to contribute to the cost of this great national improvement. I know positively that does not represent the sentiments of the constituents of the gentleman from Harlem, or the people of the city of New York, or the people of the State of New York. [Applause.]

This fear expressed here to-day that the Federal Government is not able to take care of itself in condemnation proceedings strikes me as something that never should fall from the lips of a lawyer. This indictment of the people of the South, that their local juries in the South are not composed of patriotic citizens of this country, should be stricken from the RECORD.

The assertion that the local juries of the South will mulct the Federal Government in condemnation proceedings and would make awards higher than in the case of proceedings started by the State or local communities is a false slander upon the great patriotic people of the South.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from New York has had some experience of what has happened in New York City in condemnation proceedings under a Tammany administration.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Oh, the people of New York City have given evidence on many, many occasions of their complete satisfaction under a Tammany administration. [Applause.] The gentleman is the last survivor of the old crowd, and he is not going to survive very much longer. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What price nomination? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for one minute more.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, if I interpret correctly the insinuation contained in the gentleman's remarks, at least this can be said of the members of the Tammany delegation in this House: If there were any price connected with the nomination, as everybody with reason knows there is not, they never would go shopping from one party to another to get a bargain price. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one minute, if I may, to respond briefly to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], who has just spoken. He certainly threw a wonderful bouquet of flowers to the South. He has been in the South. It ought to bring political support for his candidate. But my indictment holds good, as my colleague says, as to the city of New York. The gentleman is a lawyer, and I know he is a capable one. You will find they will hold you up so far as they can in condemnation proceedings through the whole State of New York. It is not a question of North or South, but a question of human nature with which we are dealing.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Just for a question.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. To clear you up on the question.

Mr. FREAR. No; I am cleared up perfectly. I understand the situation perfectly.

Mr. WINGO. Where does the gentleman get the idea that the political support of the South was a matter of barter and sale? Have we not demonstrated throughout our history our fidelity to principle by standing out in the cold for years? The gentleman has made the suggestion that we can be bought and sold like cattle.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no.

Mr. WINGO. You made that intimation.

Mr. FREAR. Let me have one minute more, Mr. Chairman. If the gentlemen from the South can show their sympathy at this time, I do not think the gentleman from Arkansas or anybody else would mean to say that they are willing to be bought or sold.

Mr. WINGO. What other reason could the gentleman have had in his taunt to the gentleman from New York, that that ought to get him support in the South? The gentleman's suggestion was that. To what does he refer when he intimates that we in our history in the South have merited the reflection that we are open to barter and sale?

Mr. FREAR. The disposition will be to take all of that organization in the city of New York and throw its influence for a good candidate from New York, knowing that the South naturally will be in sympathy with it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Wisconsin is the last person on earth who should suggest that I have shifted my position.

Mr. FREAR. I have never suggested any such course on the part of my Democratic friends in the South.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER].

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it certainly is my hope that this House will not understand from the references the gentleman made to the present political situation or to the pendency of certain measures that the flood control bill which is now pending before this body, and which is of such vital interest to the people along the Mississippi Valley, should be hazarded on the fortunes, good or bad, of such political or legislative matters. For one who is vitally interested I want to say to you that I have made no alignment politically or with reference to pending legislation. I am here for the purpose of presenting as forcibly as possible and as fairly as I may the demands of the imperiled section for which this bill is proposed. I do not believe that the salvation of the people in the lower Mississippi Valley should be made dependent upon the fact that a few corporations in Chicago and elsewhere a great many years ago saw proper to locate in that valley a certain amount of their money by way of investment, nor do I believe, gentlemen, that the fact that no evidence was offered before the committee as to the value of certain property in what may become spillways or flood ways for the protection of the valley should be charged against the right of those people to make a plea for some measure of protection. I want to say to you that there is absolutely no foundation in fact for the figures which have been offered to you as to the great amount of money that it will cost to provide the land in the proposed flood ways. I am going to say to you in all frankness that there is no justification except in the imagination for offering to this House figures which are entirely unsupported by anything in this record. Judge WILSON has communicated with these land owners, and I am glad he has, and offered to you the exact values fixed by the owners of the property in the flood ways. Here is where the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] secured his figures, and I am going to ask him to indicate whether or not I am correct. In the extreme north end of the flood plain there is the highest development in the Mississippi Valley. That is conceded by everyone and the record reflects it. The lands in southeast Missouri are the most valuable in all the Mississippi Valley. There is proposed a flood way through those lands for the benefit of Cairo, Ill., and Cairo needs all the protection that may possibly be afforded, for their property and lives are in immediate danger beyond any question of a doubt. The levees are built there as high as conditions justify. Because the people in southeast Missouri do not want that flood way, and they do not want it, they testified to the value fixed on the highest developed land in the Mississippi Valley, and that has been used as a predicate upon which to base the value of those cheap lands in the flood ways in Louisiana. Now, Mr. FREAR, is that not a fact?

Mr. FREAR. I will say that the Mississippi River Commission values these flood-way lands at about $100,000,000.

Mr. DRIVER. Ninety-one million dollars, my dear sir.

Mr. FREAR. Ninety-one million dollars; and I am sure they have not exceeded the real value they will have to pay; and they are not, of course, the Jadwin figures——

Mr. DRIVER. Jadwin made no figures. The Jadwin plan carried no figures.

Mr. FREAR. No; but the estimates he made——

Mr. DRIVER. The estimate was made by the Mississippi River Commission, and no one has discussed any value with respect to these particular lands outside of the estimate made by that commission.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. DRIVER (continuing). Which I know will be entirely sufficient and more than sufficient to cover every dollar of the value that it will be necessary to invest there to provide these auxiliary methods proposed under the suggested plan of protection.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say to the gentleman that the Army engineers have the quantity of land owned by 7,500 people who are on these two flood ways, and they based their answer to the question I put to them on the examinations they had made.

Mr. DRIVER. Yes; but no estimate of value was placed in the record except as fixed by the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER (continuing). Let me say further to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] there is not a man who owns land in the flood ways of Louisiana that wants those flood ways provided there. This is building no value for those people there. The only advantage that inures is the fact that it is held in large tracts and in large ownership, for if you take property improved by the individual, with the sentimental value that is always thrown around his home, you do have a value to deal with that will possibly be something more than the actual value of the land involved, but you will not say that to the owner of a large body of land that has some compensating features.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And does not the bill also provide that instead of having juries to assess the damages the Federal court shall appoint three commissioners, who shall determine the values, and that their judgment shall be final?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes; and I want to say to you that I will support any amendment that may be offered to this bill that will provide the machinery to insure a fair measure of value for these lands.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I want to say to you further that I am willing to support any measure that any of the opponents of this bill or its friends will offer that will reduce the question of damages to the railroads or to any firm, person, or corporation that has an element of damage to be dealt with.

The people who are asking you for protection are not trying to present to you a pork barrel. We are trying to keep anything that looks like something unfair out of this measure, and I appeal to every Member who will not support this bill, if that has not been the attitude all the way through on the part of those whose very lives and properties are involved in your action in respect of this matter.

Let me say to you gentlemen, you can not divide the protection of the Mississippi Valley by States, counties, or sections. It is a connected, and necessarily a consistent, improvement.

Let me give you an illustration; and I am sorry I have not the time to go more thoroughly into this. In the State of Missouri, north of my home, is a levee district that was not able to construct levees to resist the pressure brought against it in the flood of 1927, but our levees held, and yet because of a bankrupt condition in the State of Missouri, to the north of me, there was a crevasse in its line of levees and the flood waters poured into my district and created a damage of $8,500,000 and destroyed lives of people behind that levee who had invested their money to build securely for themselves. Without the flood ways in Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Missouri go down, and tell me that a section of your Nation with 4,500,000 acres of land only in cultivation can stand the shock of a loss of $300,000,000 in one year in the face of conditions that prevail generally in the agricultural regions of the Nation; and tell me that they will be able to make further contributions for the protection of their lives and their property! Gentlemen, you are dealing with this problem on a money basis when other things are involved that are more important. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DRIVER. Can the gentleman yield me one minute more?

Mr. REID of Illinois. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. DRIVER. Due to the time—I am trying to embrace everything I can——

Mr. FREAR. Let me yield the gentleman three minutes. I believe the gentleman is entitled to it.

Mr. DRIVER. I certainly appreciate that, Mr. FREAR. Your courtesy has been constant throughout our labors, and I appreciate it.

I want to say that I respect the views of the gentlemen who are opposing this plan, but this is what I want to impress upon you. There is not one section of our Nation that is devoted exclusively to agricultural pursuits that can stand the shock of the loss that was suffered by the acreage I have mentioned to you in the Mississippi Valley and be able to rehabilitate themselves by the most determined and energetic efforts within a period of 10 years.

This 4,500,000 acres of land, my friends, to-day carries the burden of liens of $450,000,000, spent in a determined effort to protect themselves, without calling for the aid of any force on the face of the earth. The financial interests have withdrawn from that territory. We can not negotiate a bond to-day, neither can a single landowner increase the amount of the liens against his property. Then tell me that these bankrupt and prostrate people shall be called upon to provide the means by which their lives can be protected and their property rehabilitated and brought into a condition to enable them to pursue the ordinary affairs of this life.

Why, gentlemen, one-half of the land that was flooded last year remains idle the present year and will not return a dollar of money. The houses were swept from their foundations, teams and food and everything on earth they possessed went into the Gulf of Mexico, and the reconstruction of the property is a matter of years of hard work. There are other features not mentioned, like the loss of labor. Out of 700,000 people that were affected and crowded into refuge camps fully 25 per cent of them were forced to resort to industrial centers in order to find means of livelihood. They are there to-day. The farms are without tenants. They are without houses. These lands must be reimproved. Labor organizations must be reformed before they can continue activity and maintain what little equity they have in the land in that area.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman explain the difficulties with reference to the constitution of the State?

Mr. DRIVER. Their constitutions will be required to be changed, and by the time that can be done there would be nothing left of that for which we are now making provision for protection. [Applause.]

The devastated people of the Mississippi Valley are seriously disturbed over the congressional situation with respect to flood control. They received assurances while the mad waters were surging, overtopping, and crashing through the protective works representing the sum total of their energies through the course of history, wresting from their foundations their homes and destroying their livestock, feed, tools, and equipment provided for the necessary and useful operation of their properties. These assurances, conceived to be from authoritative sources, were like cooling draughts in the fevered hour of suffering. The keenness of distress was allayed, the spirit of hopelessness was turned into one of faith and determination to return to their barren acres and commence the work of rehabilitation, the necessity for which had so often presented itself and so frequently availed that only a major catastrophe as was hurled upon them in 1927 could utterly destroy.

History is replete with instances of great duration of wars between people, the outstanding one covering a period of 100 years. The supply of men, munitions, and food is the determining factor in such tests of endurance and conclude the issue between warring nations without reflecting on the courage of the participants, but the struggle in the Mississippi Valley, which is attended by all of the elements of war, has been persistently prosecuted with unrelenting vigor and undaunted courage for 211 years, but it must be conceded that the munitions of war are exhausted and the gallantry of the defenders of that vast domain has failed in purpose, without a definite program for adequate protective works provided by the National Congress.

The wonder is that in the face of an unequal struggle such determination could have so imbued mere man that he would be unwilling to relinquish the task. The answer, of course, is a want of appreciation of changed conditions which the pursuit of progress has inevitably and consistently produced, carrying with it greater burdens in every step upon those battling elements of the valley. It is strange, indeed, to he who lives in the present hour that the dweller in the alluvial valley failed to appreciate the meaning of continued developments in the great breadth of country comprising 1,240,900 square miles and aggregating 794,176,000 acres of land, extending from the lower areas of two Canadian Provinces through the very heart of the Nation, and from the continental divide to the high peaks of the Appalachians, covering in whole or part 31 of the sovereign States of the Union, and draining 41 per cent of its area. This flood plain is divided into six distinct basins designated as the upper Mississippi, including Minnesota, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and a portion of Missouri, and containing 165,900 square miles, with an annual rainfall of 30.9 inches; Missouri Basin, including North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and a portion of Kansas, Missouri, Wyoming, Montana, California, and Utah, containing 527,100 square miles in extent, with an average annual rainfall of 20.7 inches; the Ohio Basin, including Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and a portion of New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and Alabama, containing 201,700 square miles in area, with an average annual rainfall of 44.2 inches; the Arkansas Basin, including parts of Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas, New Mexico, and Colorado, comprising 186,300 square miles, with an average annual rainfall of 29.8 inches; the Red River Basin, including a portion of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Oklahoma, 90,000 square miles in extent, with an average annual rainfall of 38.3 inches; and of the Central Valley, including portions of Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, with an area of 69,000 square miles, and an average annual rainfall of 48.8 inches.

When De La Tour, the French engineer, conceived the levee system as a protective measure for the newly founded city of New Orleans the Mississippi Valley was an abiding place for the buffalo and Indian, covered with forests and with pools and sluggish streams, into which the waters accumulated and through slow processes wended their way sluggishly to the Gulf, but the adventurous spirit of the pioneer brought him across the mountains and the plains, where he found a situation inviting, and located his habitat and commenced to fell the forests and to drain the pools. He removed the humus and constructed boats with which to carry his produce to the market and demanded the straightening of the stream, thus accelerating the velocity of the waters. As others joined with the early settlers the development swept inland, carrying the demands and accomplishments of development until the people had built cities and towns and paved them on the main stem of the river and all of its principal tributaries and built roads and drained them, and the commerce grew and navigation improved and more drainage was provided, more creeks and small rivers were straightened, and more forests were felled. Boards of health were organized, with advice to the people to provide more efficient drainage by eliminating the stagnant pools and other places where the waters were accustomed to accumulate until the flood heights assumed dangerous proportions, flowing over the agricultural land of the valley and threatening destruction. The only answer available to the limitations imposed upon the threatened people was levees and more levees. The valley could not stay the hand of progress. They could not provide against reclamation in the upper reaches, but they thought they could fend against it. They strengthened their levees, using the dollars inuring to them from the operation of their property interests to build them broader and taller; but when the floods came the levees were breached and overtopped, and their accumulations were swept away. Their conception following the disaster was that the levees had not been constructed sufficiently wide or to the necessary height. So, when the burden became too heavy for the individual landowners to bear, they organized themselves into levee districts, with authority to charge the cost of the protective works against their land, and with this means of support they built their levees broader and made them stronger and higher, continuing their developments behind them and feeling secure they rebuilt their improvements, restocked their farms, and commenced the struggle anew, investing as usual their accumulations in the levees and in new improvements; and the flood crests reached new heights and their levees were destroyed and their improvements swept away. They issued bonds, secured additional money, increased their tax rate, and built their levees larger and better; and so it has been, as rapidly as they could accumulate and strengthen as frequently came the floods, with greater crests, and wiped them out.

The alluvial plane of the Mississippi extends from Cape Girardeau in Missouri to the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 1,100 miles, and is an average of 50 miles in width, divided into seven basins, to wit, the St. Francis, in Arkansas and Missouri, comprising 6,706 square miles; White River, in Arkansas, 956 square miles in area; the Tensas, in Louisiana, with an area of 5,370 square miles; the Atchafalaya, in Louisiana, containing 6,085 square miles; the La Fourche, comprising 2,024 square miles; the Ponchartrain Basin, comprising 2,001 square miles; and the Yazoo Basin, in Mississippi, comprising 5,648 square miles.

This area also includes the delta sections of Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in all aggregating 29,790 square miles, and containing 19,065,600 acres, subject to overflow, and all comprised in levee districts except the extreme lower rim of Louisiana, the marsh area, practically on sea level immediately along the Gulf shore, and the unleveed basins on the east bank of the Mississippi in front of Tennessee, covering 487,000 acres, and a like basin south of Natchez in Mississippi, comprising 700,000 acres, leaving 17,456,647 acres embraced within the 34 levee districts existing within the alluvial plane, with approximately 5,000,000 acres of such land in a state of cultivation.

Pontchartrain Levee District containing 480,000 acres, with 250,000 in cultivation, and a bond issue of $1,383,865 outstanding.

The Orleans Levee District comprising 120,000 acres, with 88,000 acres in cultivation, and including the metropolitan city of New Orleans, with an outstanding bond issue of $7,000,000.

The levee districts mentioned have constructed and maintained 2,453.21 miles of levees, and against which levee bonds are outstanding in the amount of $43,805,451 and real-estate liens of $205,650,492. The amount of indebtedness charged against the land is in excess of the combined levee bonds and real-estate mortgage debts, for in practically all of such districts large issues of drainage bonds are outstanding, the amount of which was not ascertained and is difficult to secure an accurate apportionment to the alluvial lands because in most instances large areas immediately adjacent to the alluvial plane are included in the existing agencies created for the purpose of providing drainage works, and which lands share in common with the lands of the alluvial belt in the expense of such improvement, but it is a fact that the drainage issues are greatly in excess of the amount of bonds outstanding for levee purposes. The actual per acre fixed lien is $17.60 on the area within the levee districts.

On the basis of the cleared acreage which must be depended upon to provide the revenue to meet maturing obligations, annual interest charges and maintenance, is now charged with a lien of $23.45 per acre for levee and drainage bond issues, and on the basis of the same calculation the sum of $51.41 per acre on mortgage liens, in addition to the heavy obligations imposed through State, county, municipal, school, and road taxes. The much larger acreage denominated locally as cut-over lands, which means the area from which timber has been removed but has not been reduced to cultivation, and, therefore, nonrevenue-producing property, possessing much less value, is thereby necessarily limited in the amount of its contribution for the support of the burden, and especially is this condition true in the matter of mortgage indebtedness in the face of the ever-prevalent rule that only revenue-producing property is regarded as satisfactory security for debt, and therefore the heavy mortgage liens are applied exclusively to the cleared area.

The most highly controverted question growing out of the demand for adequate flood-control protection arises from the demand for continued contributions by the local interests. These interests as now constituted are in the nature of separate and distinct levee-district organizations, created under the authority of the laws of the States in which they exist, with power to levy taxes against the property within such districts and through which the cost of the improvements and maintenance is secured. The extent to which such levies may be made vary according to the laws of the State of origin, with the right confined to real estate alone in Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and in addition an ad valorem tax on personal property, baled cotton, and occupation in Louisiana and Mississippi.

The financial condition of the levee districts as reflected from the above statement is sufficient to convince a reasonable mind that no immediate financial contribution is possible from the units mentioned, but the story has not been told.

From these 5,000,000 acres there were 246 lives lost and there was swept by the floods of 1927, 7,879 houses, 17 gins, 118 stores, 2,997 barns, and 16,971 outbuildings, together with 12,626 horses and mules, 25,716 head of cattle, 133,174 head of hogs, 2,560 sheep and goats, 719,647 poultry, $1,628,711 in merchandise, $1,317,515 worth of farm implements, $3,054,544.50 in feedstuffs, and $4,730,627 in household goods and effects; also 58,844 houses were damaged, 2,148 stores damaged, 285 gins damaged, 11,994 barns damaged, and 36,723 outbuildings damaged. Altogether inflicting a loss on these acres, together with damages to growing crops, school buildings, lumber and cooperage industries, highways and bridges, aggregating $236,334,414.06, without including practically $20,000,000 lost by the railroads.

To the member representing an agricultural constituency it is not necessary to picture conditions antedating the arrival of the flood waters of 1927 to know how illy prepared these lands, devoted exclusively to agriculture, were to withstand that enormous damage. Our record is replete with conditions prevailing in the agricultural regions of the Nation. We know that the period of deflation was visited upon such areas in an unfortunate and devastating way, and that such areas have staggered under the burdens imposed through the inequalities under which agriculture suffers, and that conditions have grown worse from year to year, with the landowners adding to the mortgage indebtedness until their equities have been conveyed in trust. I challenge, especially my colleagues from that constituency, to point to any single area of 5,000,000 acres, with existing encumbrances, able to withstand the shock of the loss of $236,000,000 of its property interests at one fell swoop, and be able to survive. Calculating from the most favorable attitude, I also challenge anyone familiar with such conditions to deny that many years would be required of most energetic action to rehabilitate that section of their areas struggling under such unfortunate conditions as would result from the staggering losses mentioned. I quote this because of frequent mention in my presence by those who seem to find difficulty in appreciating exactly the financial conditions prevailing in the flooded regions, and who seem to feel that the suggestion of the Secretary of War to the effect that possibly it may become the duty of the National Treasury to finance certain of the devastated areas through bond issues which can not now find a market. The suggestion was inspired through a genuine desire to afford relief, and it is not my purpose to criticize the spirit in which it was offered. I do say, however, with all due deference to its source and the high motive actuating its author, that such financial aid would only tend to complicate the most serious financial situation now existing, in this: That the affected levee districts find themselves without a market for their securities, the financing organizations having withdrawn from the flooded territory, and the individual landowner finds himself without a market from which to secure additional funds on his real estate with which to reconstruct and repair the improvements necessary to enable him to profitably operate his property interests.

The condition is so acute that in most instances the States have been called upon to forego the collection of their annual revenue exactions for necessary expenses of governments. Defaults have occurred and are occurring in the payment of the annual interest on the bonded debts of these districts and the landowners are unable to meet the annual interest on the mortgage indebtedness. It is entirely a matter of speculation as to the duration of time required to inspire confidence of the financiers of the country through which such agencies and individuals may secure the necessary funds with which to meet such obligations and to provide for the rehabilitation of such properties. There can be no doubt of the necessity in the near future of refunding these large bonds issues and renewing the vast debts charged against the individual holdings, and in so doing the bond issues required to meet the contributions demanded would tend to destroy the very foundation upon which their relief must depend, and sweep from those who have the courage and determination to remain and struggle through in reliance upon the promise of national aid, every vestige of interest upon which that aspiration is based.

Another suggestion which contributes to the immediate danger of the financial structure is founded in the proposed plan of control. The works outlined in both the report of the Mississippi River Commission and of the Chief of Engineers are based upon a presumed superflood 25 per cent in excess of the 1927 flood crests if the waters at that time had been confined. In such plans the levee only theory is discarded and flood ways and spillways are provided as an auxiliary system to levee control, and it is further provided that at the junction of the tributary streams with the Mississippi River channel large areas are to be left open for the purpose of creating permanent storage basins, the aggregate of such backwater areas being in excess of 3,000,000 acres, about 33⅓ per cent of such areas, together with 25 per cent of the 2,150,000 acres proposed for flood ways, or about 1,500,000 acres of farm lands will be withdrawn as revenue-producing properties from the several districts.

One illustration will suffice to present the general influence. The southeast Arkansas levee district comprises 727,264 acres, of which 290,905 acres are in a state of cultivation. The Jadwin plan proposes to dedicate 225,000 acres of the lands of such district to the Boeuf River flood way. This land is now charged with levee and drainage liens equal in acreage to the other lands of the district. It comprises slightly more than one-third of the area of the district. Even though the amount of the present liens be relieved against through the purchase of the same for flood way purposes, the annual revenues of the district in the future will be diminished to the extent of more than one-third and leave to the district through such lessened revenues an inadequate sum to pay the expenses connected with the operation of the agency. This situation can only be met by placing the loss upon the remaining lands of such district and thereby increasing their burden.

The same rule, as a matter of course, applies to all the districts along the Mississippi River, and especially could the illustration be emphasized by quoting from the enormous diminution of revenues which will result to the Louisiana levee districts through which the Boeuf River and Atchafalaya flood ways are to be located and in which the backwater areas at the mouth of the Red, Black, and Atchafalaya Rivers meet.

The financial ability of each levee district becomes a criterion of safety under any plan requiring contributions to the expense of flood-control works. The want of integrity in the line of levee maintained by anyone of the several districts on the river destroys the protective value of every other line of levee maintained below it on the same side of the river, without regard to the amount of money expended or the strength and security of its protective works. The situation is illustrated in the disaster of 1927, when the unprecedented flood heights in the Arkansas River crevassed the levees at Medford, Pendleton, and Big Bend, hurling death and destruction upon the residents of the 3,000,000 acres of lands in the Tensas Basin, driving the inhabitants to the house tops and to the trees, sweeping from their farms every vestige of improvements and their personal possessions. Not through the failure of the people resident there to meet the demands of existing law or their failure to build to the fullest security under the plan provided for their safety, but through the inability of the neighboring levee district on the north to provide the funds with which to maintain the integrity of its works.

Reaching nearer home, I may use the Dorena break in Missouri as a further illustration. The levee structure in front of the St. Francis District of Arkansas withstood the crest and remained intact. That district was solvent and had hurried its construction program, but south of Cairo and more than 100 miles north of the lower St. Francis levee line a levee was breached and the flood waters poured through, following the flood plane along Little River to the west and thence to the St. Francis, covering thousands of acres in the district where the levees held and destroying more than $8,000,000 of the property within such district. This was through no fault of the St. Francis District of Arkansas, which is without authority to build up and maintain the levees in Missouri to grade and section to afford the protection. This situation is recognized and was commented on by the members of the Mississippi River Commission, who are in accord on not only the theory of the necessity for a consistent and connected system of works, but that it is an impossibility to secure such consistency under the operations of the local units as they now exist, and upon which reliance must be placed for conformity to any plan of improvement which can be devised for the security of the valley.

Such recognition is carried in the report of the Chief of Engineers of the impossibility of performance commented on, and the recommendation is made that the States supplant the local units and assume the burden. The suggestion carries the same answer; the same want of unanimity and control must necessarily enter into the operation of any agency which may be established by the State. The failure of Missouri in any essential inflicts upon the State of Arkansas the same damage suffered through the failure of the existing unit. But the failure is not the sole incident of danger connected with a change of responsibility.

The great delay necessarily incident to securing legislation and legislative authority is met with at the very threshold. In some instances, notably Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, comparatively small areas of the States affected are involved and, therefore, it would become necessary that organizations be created and a campaign undertaken to bring the State as a whole to a realization of a duty and form sentiment with which appropriate aid could be procured. In some of the States it would be necessary to secure constitutional warrant for legislative action, which would necessitate two sessions of the legislative bodies of such States, with an election between in order to make the essential constitutional change. In the history of floods, before such changes could be effectuated, should the recurring visitation be of the magnitude of the one just passed, there would remain nothing of the areas for whose relief and protection such measures were initiated.

Again, the intricacy of the problem can be understood from a consideration of the questions arising for determination between the States, by an allusion to conditions necessitating a method of control for the protection of the city of Cairo in Illinois, around the limits of which swirl the flood crests from both the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, and where the lives of 15,000 American citizens and millions of dollars of property values are in imminent danger, with but one avenue of relief open. The levee heights have reached the limit of safety, but the flood heights have not reached the maximum even in the 1927 experience. Both of the engineering plans submitted assume a flow of 2,250,000 cubic feet per second is a possible maximum, which would necessitate the construction and maintenance of levees 65 feet in height. There must be diversion of water at that point, with two suggested locations—one through the natural flood plane from Cape Girardeau south through the Little River and St. Francis River basins, estimated by the diversion board to cost more than $300,000,000, the other from Birds Point south to New Madrid in Missouri, at a expense of $32,500,000. There is a certainty of the necessary reduction in the flood heights at Cairo through the more expensive system, and quite a doubt is expressed of the engineering estimate on reduction through the Birds Point diversion. However, the selection of either method is considered to be for the sole protection of Cairo. The question naturally arises that under the suggested theory of State responsibility Illinois would pay the bill. The question then arises as to the State authority to authorize the expenditure of money in the adjoining State. If this question is answered in the affirmative, the question then occurs, how long would it require a sentiment to be built up in Illinois to cause its legislature to enact the necessary law through which funds could be provided and the situation saved; and in the meanwhile, will Cairo survive?

Exactly the same situation exists with respect to the benefits accruing to the States of Mississippi and Arkansas, through the suggested flood ways in the Boeuf and Atchafalaya River Basins of Louisiana. If the salvation of the two States depended on their ability to provide the necessary machinery for the collection and application of the necessary funds with which to compensate Louisiana for the vast acreage to be dedicated for their protection, before any progress could be made in the building up of the necessary protective works through which the waters could be diverted and for the confining of which levees could be constructed, at least one or a succession of floods would in all probability destroy both Mississippi and Arkansas, even if the necessary protective measures could be authorized with all the celerity possible and urged by the utmost good faith and sincerity of purpose.

Disregarding in its entirety every statement with respect to the necessity of a unified and consistent plan of improvement, the great loss of property, the stupendous burden of debt, which renders 22 of the 28 levee districts in the alluvial valley utterly insolvent, and the certainty of calamity before it is possible to shift the necessary authority from the levee districts to the respective States, it is to my mind an indefensible position to seek to place upon the citizens and their property the duty and responsibility of providing the necessary protective works against the flood waters of so vast an area of the Nation as a whole. In taking such position I realize that "It will not be done because it can not be done" is not a sufficient answer, but it is an answer to say that when the magnitude of the task is created by conditions over which local interests have no control and against which they can not fend in the exercise of the largest measure of authority, it can not be accomplished by other than the national authority.

No one will gainsay that the early settler in the Mississippi Valley was not a trespasser and that he was in the exercise of a privilege which inured to every citizen of the Republic, if not at the direct invitation of a nation whose interest in developing a civilization along what was at that early date conceived to be its most important artery of commerce, establishing means of communication and for protection against the encroachments of a foreign power. It is recorded history that the Mississippi River was the direct and inspiring cause of the purchase of that great domain designated on the map as the Louisiana Purchase. The civilization so constructed in the valley was the bulwark relied upon to effectuate the purposes and aims of the Government in such acquisition. It was upon such foundation the future developments were predicated and the necessary attraction was afforded to the thousands who joined fortunes with the pioneers to give value to the conception of the distinguished Executive in whose administration that transaction occurred. The importance of developing and preserving the navigability of the river was the subject of debate in the various sessions of the Congress, from which this theory stands out:

> If there was not a single inhabitant in the valley, the control of the waters of the Mississippi River is essentially necessary.

To preserve the regimen of the river, levees and revetment have been the sole reliance of those under authority and direction of the Congress to attain such end. Without revetting the banks and providing stability therefor, the waters in the channel would be so charged with silt that the bed of the stream would soon become clogged and navigation thereon be destroyed. Without levees to confine the waters within the channel, the current would be so reduced in velocity that the sedimentary matter could not be carried to the Gulf and the 12,000,000 tons now disposed of would have long since placed the bed of the stream on an even surface with the bank and a repetition of conditions existing in several of the noted streams of the Old World would be true on the Mississippi.

The commerce clause of the Constitution is sufficient warrant for complete national responsibility in this instance; for it is inconceivable that this great Nation, with its wonderful diversification, but withal interdependent, could and would permit a condition to arise that disturbs the business relationship necessary to the welfare of all of its inhabitants. Commerce is not sectional, and when disturbed in any area carries a pronounced influence on the business concern of the Nation and frequently manifests itself in an international way. Commerce to-day does not mean the tonnage which finds its way from the producer over an improved waterway of the Nation, nor is it the volume of material finding its way over the railroads of the country, but the improved highways of the Nation have developed and are increasing by leaps and bounds a trucking system destined to compete favorably with the other established methods. Through the area in the alluvial valley subject to overflow sufficient commerce was developed to induce railroad construction on an elaborate scale, there being 10,000 miles of operating tracks, providing a system which not only traverses the length and breadth of such area but bisecting trunk lines which reach from ocean to ocean. These carriers handle troops, munitions, and food in the stress of war. They handle a great volume of commerce and postal matters in peace time. There are constructed and in usable condition several thousand miles of improved highways, over which the commerce of that area finds its way to the concentration points on the transportation systems where ease and facility is given to its transmission. Over these roads are distributed the mails when discharged at the distributing points. More than 3,000 miles of railroads within the overflowed area was out of commission for from 10 to 120 days, and the several thousand miles of highways were covered with water for periods from 30 to 90 days. Commerce was destroyed, and the mails piled mountain high at the distribution points provided for the proper handling of such matter. An army of employees under experts devoted weeks of time rerouting this enormous accumulation of matter, establishing lines of communication over the flooded lands by means of water craft, with many of the offices swept out of existence and much of the equipment flowing into the Gulf of Mexico.

It is inconceivable that a nation would permit an area of 40 to 50 miles wide and a thousand miles in length to be carved out of its very heart and feel that no national duty was involved. On this national aspect the question of recurring periods of destruction of life and property is offered. Under the general-welfare clause this Nation can not permit this condition to continue. It may be conceded that where conditions over which those whose lives are imperiled and whose property is in jeopardy present the duty of exercising every facility within their power to afford such protection, there certainly must be found somewhere an anchor to tie to when those same lives and property interests are deprived of the means of protection and are rendered defenseless against an assault by forces over which they are denied the right to exercise the necessary control.

No one village or township, levee district, county, or State within the alluvial valley is able to combine the power available to each and mold it into a weapon capable of defending against the conditions wrought by the greater number of people, the greater areas of territory, and the greater rights of all of the States from which pour the flood waters producing the dangers with which they are assaulted. They can not stop the wheels of progress, nor curtail the activities of the citizens. They can not stay the construction of highways, the paving of streets, the tilling of lands, the denuding of the forests, the removal of the humus, the construction of artificial canals, the straightening and deepening of streams through which there pours an ever-increasing volume of water which finds its way with greater velocity into the lower valley, swelling the flood heights, topping and tearing through the pigmy lines of defense offered by the local people to the 60,000,000 horsepower of strength which is loosed upon them.

But we are told the problem is one of reclamation, and that when reclamation is provided the value should be assessed against the beneficiary, the landowners of the valley. It seems difficult to differentiate the theory of reclamation from the problem of flood control, because it is admitted that the effect of such works when security is afforded, will result in the enhancement of land. It seems difficult to convince the mind entertaining such conception that with the complete protection provided, but a reestablishment of the values based upon confidence in the protective worth of such works may only be hoped for. It does not take that which is nonproductive inherently and add the elements which enter into a productive capacity. It does not add one dollar to the producing power of the lands sought to be protected. I believe this is a fair illustration: An acre of improved land in the Mississippi Valley has a certain fundamental value based upon its measure of fertility when reduced to cultivation and provided with the necessary conveniences with which to properly operate it. The cost of clearing and improving the land averages $50 per acre. The location of improved highways for which the lands must pay gives added value and its location with respect to convenient shipping markets and school facilities, offers an additional modicum of value.

When the Mississippi River Commission fixed the 1914 tentative grade and section for the levees on the river, and the progress to completion neared, the lands of the valley were enhanced to their maximum, based upon the confidence of complete protection. The flood of 1927 breached the levees wiping out a large measure of such value, which was further lessened by the want of confidence in the ability to secure protection. Thus, striking from the values then obtaining at least 50 per cent, driving from the territory all of the financial aid theretofore available and in effect, destroying the actual market value of every acre of such lands. Should the Government assume the full responsibility for the construction of adequate flood-control works, the utmost to be hoped would be for a restoration of values existing prior to the tragedy of 1927 and to share with the rest of the Nation in the reasonable enhancement which should enure from the promotion of reclamation and developments incident to the general improvement in the various localities. In other words, it would merely place them on a basis of equality with the other lands of the country and enable them to prosecute their necessary works without fear, hindrance, or the destruction which has so frequently been visited upon them.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two minutes. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman who has just spoken. He has been a very able member of the committee. I wish to correct the figures that he gave, if I understood him. He said that $450,000,000 was the indebtedness of Arkansas.

Mr. DRIVER. Oh, no. I said that was the debt against the whole valley.

Mr. FREAR. I was going to say that if the gentleman would make an examination he would find that the indebtedness is $91,000,000 for all purposes in the State of Arkansas, and that is not nearly the indebtedness of my own State. The State of California in this bill offers to contribute one-third, and that State has a per capita indebtedness of $142.81, while the Arkansas per capita is only $51. I realize, in all fairness, that that is not all the question involves. The State of California is offering to pay two-thirds of such a project and has a per capita indebtedness of $142.81.

Mr. DRIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. DRIVER. The State of California has all of its houses on their foundations and all of its mules and horses and household effects, and they are ready to go to work. It is an entirely different situation from that which prevails in Arkansas.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] stated that I offered no substitute for the McNary-Haugen bill. Every other gentleman in the Congress knows that four times I offered a substitute better than that bill, but that is as near the truth as Mr. FREAR approaches. [Laughter.]

I am sympathetic with him because the Republican leaders kicked him out and for four long years he has been on the cold, cold grass. He is now making a frantic effort to get back into the good graces of the Republican leaders. I hope he succeeds, for the Democrats would like to see that sort of leadership in the Republican Party. [Applause.]

I believe Mr. FREAR's heart is good, but his mind or attitude is twisted out of plumb on these questions. I have known him 15 years, and I have found no one who can recall that he was ever on the right side of any question. I am glad that he is opposed to this bill, because by that token I know that I am right. [Applause.]

If he were not a fellow Member of the Congress, I would refer to his wild, monstrous, and exaggerated statements with reference to the lower Mississippi Valley as garrulous chatter, which would be an entirely correct appellation. Except that people away from Washington and maybe some one in the White House might take seriously his wild statements, I would not refer to them now, because no Member of the Congress pays any attention to what he says. His influence in the House is nothing and his opposition to a bill means support for it.

In Mr. FREAR's statement published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 4, 1928, under head of "Engineers' estimate of cost to Government," he states that the Boeuf and Atchafalaya flood ways will contain 3,713,696 acres at $75 per acre, or $278,600,000. The estimate of $75 per acre originates in Mr. FREAR's fertile imagination to compensate he says for other probable costs that he anticipates have not been taken care of in the estimate. By reference to page 4811 of volume 6 of the hearings it will be noted in the summary that the total number of acres of land affected by flood way—Cypress Creek to the Gulf of Mexico—is placed at 3,041,300 acres and the valuation of this land is placed at $76,095,533. Mr. FREAR is off the truth only 700,000 acres and $200,000,000, which is not bad for him. [Applause.] The item of $76,095,533 can be further reduced by 50 per cent if the costs of flowage rights be used instead of value. If it is recalled that the backwater area at the lower end of above flood ways is now subject to overflow at ordinary flood, it is evident that applying a valuation of $75 per acre to the 1,000,000 or more acres of this character of land—involving at least $75,000,000—is done for no other purpose than to swell the cost to a fictitious total, which is Mr. FREAR's evident purpose. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 17 Mr. FREAR asserts that the flood control bill is covered by a known cost of $1,000,000,000, and to get this amount he conjures up a value on the land at $75 per acre, which is eighteen times as much as the land or flowage rights will cost. [Applause.]

The bill, while it recognizes local contributions as sound, gives the valley credit for the $292,000,000 the local people have already spent. During the course of the hearings before the Flood Control Committee of the House testimony was given to show that the losses during the 1927 flood were approximately $250,000,000; and in addition to this, it was estimated that there was an indirect loss of $200,000,000. Mr. FREAR lays great stress on the danger of large landowners selling their land for $75 per acre, while telegrams from such landowners to-day show that they will turn the land over to the Government from $5 to $15 per acre, and the flowage rights at $3 to $5 per acre. According to Mr. FREAR's own figures he proves conclusively that flood control with local contributions is impossible and hopeless. He grows frantic over what he claims to be the possibility of a cost of a billion dollars to the Government, and yet his own figures show that he would impose upon the helpless States of the valley a crushing burden, as follows:

Amount already expended by local contributions	$292,000,000
Actual property loss during 1927 flood	250,000,000
Very conservatively estimated cost to business	200,000,000
Cost of land in flood ways, at $75 an acre	278,600,000

Mr. FREAR seems excited over the possibility that the Government might expend a billion dollars, yet according to his own figures he would tax seven States in the valley, with the burden falling upon three States, the sum of $1,020,600,000. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to myself in order to answer the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], who apparently has not the faintest understanding of what the facts are. The Army engineers reported 3,713,000 acres. That is their statement. The gentleman misquotes me. He says that some other figuring is right. He does not know. They made the examination. He lives down there in Louisiana and he guesses at it. That is his trouble. He assaults everyone who disagrees with him. Without any question he is an able gentleman and a good friend, and yet he has agreed with me on any amount of legislation.

Mr. ASWELL. Name one piece of legislation on which I agreed with the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. All right. Did the gentleman vote for the Mellon bill?

Mr. ASWELL. I apologize to the country if I ever agreed with the gentleman on anything.

Mr. FREAR. Good. Did the gentleman vote for the Mellon bill or the soldiers' bonus bill? Those are things that I helped fight on this floor. Of course, he did.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Were you two gentlemen together on the Volstead Act? [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. I do not know what he stood for at that time.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman does not want to slander me by saying that I voted for the Mellon bill?

Mr. FREAR. No. Of course, you did not and neither did I. That is the point. We happened to be together. The gentleman showed excellent judgment at that time. I have given no statement to the press, and I have given no statement to the White House. I have not been asked to. My statements made here have been on the basis of information that I received from what I believe to be the most eminent and able men I could find. I did not give alone an estimate of $75, but I gave the estimate at $50 and $25, all that were furnished to me.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I get this time to say a few words in reply to the self-appointed spokesman of Tammany Hall who sought to explain my amendment. Of course, he could not understand my amendment, because he has not even read the bill under consideration. When the sum total of legislative service in this session or any other session of Congress is taken, I think I am willing to compare my contribution to that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and I leave that to every Member of the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] talks about my survival. He need not worry about my political survival or to what party I belong. I say this to the gentleman from New York, the self-appointed spokesman for Tammany Hall, that every time he speaks for five minutes in the House here Al Smith has to apologize for three weeks. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], speaking by self-appointment for Tammany Hall, refers to my future candidacy. When I ran against the gentleman's party on a city-wide ticket I carried the city, and when I ran against his party in the district, whether on the Republican ticket or as an independent, I defeated his party's candidate.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not speaking to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair, the gentleman is within his rights and will proceed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What I have been trying to do here is to reconcile the differences in this bill.

I have at least read the bill and the hearings; I have studied the report; and the amendment which I suggested for the consideration of this House was based on figures submitted by the proponents of this bill on the Democratic side of the House. If the figures given by the gentleman from Louisiana or the gentleman from Arkansas or the gentleman from Georgia are correct, then my amendment indeed is modest, because it would require only something over a 5 per cent contribution. I am taking their figures. What I am trying to do is to bring about some understanding, so that we can pass a bill in this House that will give relief to the people of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. A gentleman said that the gentleman's amendment is based upon an editorial in the New York World of this morning, and he immediately ran to cover.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the gentleman was not here yesterday. I did not see him on the floor of the House. I suggested my amendment yesterday in my remarks, and if the gentleman had read the RECORD to find out what took place when he was not here at the time he would have known that I suggested my amendment yesterday and the editorial in the World appeared this morning.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman has brought articles appearing in the newspapers into this controversy. Is there any truth in the article in the newspaper to the effect that Al Smith is now drafting a dry plank for the Democratic platform? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] can answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I was here yesterday and read the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD. The gentleman has been in politics for a good many years. He now assumes to himself not only the leadership of the Republican Party in this House but also all the knowledge and all the intelligence of the entire New York delegation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no; the gentleman's remarks speak for themselves. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show. I leave it to the judgment of every Member on that side of the House.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself 45 minutes.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two gentlemen are present. A quorum is present.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the Members will give me their attention I will try to explain to the committee what this is all about. [Applause.]

I am not a candidate for the Presidency or the Vice Presidency, and I have no candidate, so that there is no politics in my remarks, and no religion, but a lot of facts will be presented that I think will stand the acid test put upon me by the minority.

At the opening of this session of Congress the President sent a message to Congress outlining a comprehensive plan for the control of the Mississippi River. That plan is the basis of all the talk you have heard to-day. It is not the creation of the committee or of any member of the committee. It is not due to the authorized agency of the United States for flood control, namely, the Mississippi River Commission. For some unknown reason the laws of the United States were set aside, and the Chief of Engineers usurped the powers of the Mississippi River Commission and produced the plan you hear so much about and know so little about.

THE PROBLEM OF FLOOD CONTROL

The problem before the committee was how to control a raging torrent of 60,000,000 horsepower? That is a lot of horsepower, and when it goes over the bank of a river into the side of a levee, and the levee slips down the valley, it must bring great destruction. I think some of the Members here would feel uncomfortable with wet feet, so that you can imagine how it feels to be driven from house and home.

THE FLOOD-CONTROL PLAN

For the purpose of elucidation of these maps [indicating] we will speak of Cairo as the head of the lower Mississippi, and this control covers the St. Francis Basin, running from Cairo to Helena at the mouth of the St. Francis River. That is the northern section. Then the middle section is the Tensas Basin, taking in part of Arkansas and part of Louisiana on the west side and part of Mississippi on the east side; and the lower part, the Atchafalaya Basin, takes in from Red River Landing and all south of the junction with the Mississippi River.

In the lower part you talk about the city of New Orleans. Somebody said it is the thirteenth city in the United States, and second in rank in the matter of foreign commerce, with a population that goes back even before the United States thought of occupying the important position it occupies to-day.

Now, you have heard a great deal about the Atchafalaya River. The Atchafalaya River is supposed to be another outlet of the old Mississippi River of the olden times. The distance is 50 miles direct to the Gulf, and it is one hundred and some odd miles by the Mississippi through all its wanderings down into the Gulf of Mexico. The problem before the committee was to try to work out some plan to control the destructive floods, so that in the hearings we made inquiry as to what was the matter with the present system.

We learned that there is no law in the United States compelling anybody to control these destructive flood waters or putting the duty of flood control upon any agency. The United States has not that duty expressed in any word. No State in the Mississippi Valley has that duty imposed upon it by any law, and no State or the United States has acted on the theory that it was either a State duty or the duty of the United States to take care of the destructive floods on the Mississippi River. Consequently the problem is: How are we going to get the money to build flood-control works if our engineers can devise the plans? We thought of schemes, and we had even worse schemes than the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] now suggests. We had schemes to take the river out of its path; we had other schemes that somebody was going to paddle the river and others were going to pipe it all around. We finally came to the conclusion that if you are really going to have flood control, it has got to be done by one agency in a uniform and coordinated manner. It is impossible to have flood control by local option. If you will just put that in your minds you will understand a good many things I am going to tell you about later.

The Mississippi River from Cairo down has a number of basins. These basins are interdependent, and in the basins are levee districts which themselves are interdependent, and a weakness in one of these basins will affect the entire country.

South of Cairo the lands affected would be the so-called Missouri flood way. That could be left out and the Missouri people would be left to their own proposition, because all of the water comes back into the Mississippi River.

The problem which the engineers have now given us is to get away from the levees-only policy. They built the levees higher and higher until they thought they had them high enough, but it rained exceedingly hard, and the synchronization of the tributaries was such that the water overtopped the levees at several places. So having to abandon the policy of levees the question was how to prevent the damages from floods in some other way.

The engineers began to look around for some plan that would divert the water from the main channel and yet not have it go back into the river. They found they could do that only in two places, and that was in the Tensas Basin, bringing it down here [indicating on map]. They worked out one plan set forth in the General Jadwin plan, known as the Birds Point to New Madrid spillway, which is a spillway 5 miles wide and 70 miles long. They are forced to do a thing that is not correct in engineering, because it would bring the water back into the river, and the testimony is that where you bring that water back you put a hump in the river again and have an obstruction which is worse than the condition you had before. That will be the foundation of a great deal of the engineering testimony, as you will find it in the record.

The next problem was how to take water from the main river of the Mississippi and protect Mississippi at the same time, because the water can not be discharged on the east side anywhere, and it would all come back into the Mississippi River. So it was finally decided to put a diversion channel through the Tensas Basin. The Tensas Basin gets its name from the Tensas River. In the lower section there is what is known as the Cypress Creek diversion, a natural diversion right here [indicating on map].

There the water runs down of its own accord and down into the old river at a pool which is discharged through the Atchafalaya Basin.

The Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, has worked out a plan to take the water at Arkansas City, the place I show you here [indicating], and bring it down this flood way through the territory that you have been hearing about that has very great value or no value at all. It is brought down here to a pool. The pool will bring it into what is known as the Old River. The Old River is a connection with the Red River and with the Atchafalaya River, and sometimes the Red River flows into the Mississippi, and when the Mississippi is full the Red River goes down the Atchafalaya River, but in engineering talk, when you get this water down here, you have 3,000,000 cubic feet per second in the pool.

The trick they had to work out was how to take care of this 3,000,000 cubic feet per second down the main channel, which could only carry about 1,500,000 cubic feet. So the problem was to bring about a diversion. The Chief of Engineer's plan brings 1,500,000 cubic feet to the Atchafalaya Basin, so that the basin as a flood way brings down 1,500,000 cubic feet down the main Mississippi River toward New Orleans, but in order to save the city of New Orleans they have put in a safety device known as the Bonnet Carre spillway. When the water gets at a certain height on the city of New Orleans gauge, the Bonnet Carre spillway begins to work and discharges 250,000 cubic feet, which takes it into Lake Pontchartrain and on through to the Mississippi Sound. In this way it never gets back to the river.

The Mississippi River Commission's plan for the protection of New Orleans also provided for a spillway at Caenarvon, but the Chief of Engineers did not think this was necessary under his plan, and consequently that is left out of the plan which the Chief of Engineers has submitted.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL] said he could not understand what plan was adopted. No one could expect the gentleman to understand that, but because it has been a theory in Congress that some project must be adopted at all times, consequently they had to write in the name of a project, so they wrote in the project of the Chief of Engineers.

OBJECTIONS TO "FUSE-PLUG" LEVEE

There was a great deal of criticism of the plan of the Chief of Engineers on account of a new device he has brought into use, known as the fuse-plug levee. The fuse-plug levee is a piece of the old levee that they are going to allow to remain so that when a flood comes the water will deteriorate that levee and let the water down into the flood way that you see here on the map, and in the Jadwin plan they also favor this fuse-plug levee to let the water back to the Mississippi River.

The objection to this is that you can never tell how much water you are going to get into it, because it is not controlled. It might bring in 250,000 cubic feet or it might bring in 1,250,000 cubic feet, and the problem is to take care of only a certain amount. Consequently, there has been a great deal of criticism because you never know how much water you are going to take into the flood way or how much you are going to leave in the Mississippi River, and the same thing is true over here with respect to the spillway. Instead of having a controlled and regulated spillway, as recommended by the Mississippi River Commission, whereby you can let in or let out any amount of water necessary to take care of the floods, he has provided for a fuse-plug levee at Arkansas City, and in order to protect that city he has put a ring levee around Arkansas City.

But when the levees begin to break and the water begins to overflow, the same objection is made. You can not tell how much water is going out of the Mississippi River. You have 3,000,000 cubic feet per second flowing into the Mississippi, and the problem is to take out 1,500,000 cubic feet per second. You may take out a great deal more than that, or you may take out only half of that amount. If you take out a great deal more than that you will flood the entire States of Arkansas and Louisiana all the way down, and if you do not take out enough, you will break the levees and flood the entire State of Mississippi.

So you can see this is why there is a great deal of criticism of the so-called fuse-plug levee.

BIRDS POINT-NEW MADRID FLOOD WAY

The two plans in a general way are in accord, except that the Mississippi River Commission does not think it is necessary to have a flood way in Missouri. They think Cairo ought to be taken care of by pumping the sand out of the Mississippi River and raising the level. The Chief of Engineers was generous enough to say that the State of Illinois would supply the sand if somebody would pump it out to raise the city of Cairo, because Cairo now is way below flood height; and while we are talking about the New Madrid flood way, we might as well tell you that the people here believe this is the most highly developed part of the Mississippi Valley. The improvements there are as fine as any in the world and it is wonderful land. They do not want the flood way. This flood way does not do them any good but does them harm. It would be just like having them ask you to allow them to run a sewer through your back yard. It does not do you any good, but it may do others around you some good. Consequently these people in testifying, testified from that viewpoint and stated they hoped they could put the price so high that the Government would not want to buy their lands for a flood way. Consequently you have in the record the data upon which the gentleman from Wisconsin based his idea of $75 or $150 an acre for this land, which is based on the fact that the people do not want this flood way.

The Mississippi River Commission says about the Jadwin plan, which recommends this improvement, that it is neither economically sound nor engineeringly feasible. If the Mississippi River Commission, that has been working on the river for 40 years—and nobody doubts the ability of the engineers on it—says it is not right, of course, you can not expect the committee to decide the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is their alternative?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Their alternative is to raise the levees and perhaps make a spillway up below Cape Girardeau, which will bring the water through the St. Francis River. Their objection is you bring the water right back into the river, and you have a hump here [indicating], and you will not get the lowering of the flood height at Cairo that they expect to get, and consequently the city of Cairo is liable to be wiped out some time if the flood way does not carry water that it is expected to carry.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman tell us again how they dispose of that 3,500,000 cubic feet per second?

Mr. REID of Illinois. You have 3,000,000 cubic feet in the pool here. The plan is to take care of about 2,800,000 cubic feet at Arkansas City. You have 950,000 cubic feet coming down here; and the accumulation of the tributaries brings it down to this pool; and the Army engineers' plan is to take 1,500,000 cubic feet down through the Atchafalaya Basin; and in order to do that they put levees, on the average about 16 miles apart, bringing the water down here [indicating] and into the Gulf of Mexico.

They take 1,500,000 cubic feet and drop off 250,000 cubic feet at Bonnet Carre and then on into the Gulf and take the other 1,250,000 down past New Orleans, which they think is sufficient to provide safety and protect the people.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the Army plan?

Mr. REID of Illinois. That is the Army engineers' plan.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the Bonnet Carre higher than New Orleans?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes. In the levee district in Pontchartrain they did not have money enough to keep the levees up, and consequently New Orleans is frightened to death because a break there would destroy the city of New Orleans. If there was a break there, it would drown out New Orleans, and there would be no way for them to get out. That is the disaster that the engineer talks about.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. How would it come down; through the river?

Mr. REID of Illinois. No; through the back.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the little red area on the map?

Mr. REID of Illinois. That is the city of New Orleans. The objection to the Bonnet Carre spillway is that when the wind was blowing right it raised the water 4 feet, and consequently a great many people object to the spillway. You must get it into your minds that nobody wants flood control where it is going to be at their expense. Consequently you will get no flood control unless it is by an overpowering agency to go in and do the work in spite of them.

INTERDEPENDENCE OF LEVEE DISTRICTS

Now, here is a map of the levee districts. Just below Cairo they have 26 miles of the Mississippi River, and coming down lower there is a district of 58 miles, and then here is a district of 160 miles. The Cotton Belt Levee District is 25 miles. Here is a district of 28 miles. Then you have here a district of 75 miles to the south of the Arkansas Levee District, and then down here is the Tensas Basin Levee District, which has the most of any of them.

How are you going to get the money? You can not get it from the States. There is no chance on earth of doing that. In order to work out Mr. LAGUARDIA's proposition you would have to amend the Constitution of the United States to permit the creation of levee districts. That was the idea of the Chief of Engineers.

Now, the Jadwin levee district would not take in certain States which you are talking about. If it was equitable you would have to take in 31 States. If you are going to take in 31 States you might as well take in the rest of them, and inasmuch as it is for the general welfare of the United States you have to consider it as a national problem. And if it is to improve the Nation it must be taken out of the General Treasury.

There is no connection between this project of flood control and a reclamation project. There is not a foot of land to be reclaimed, for it is not worth it.

I am in favor of flood control that will keep the people from drowning and their property from being destroyed. That is all I am interested in. I am not interested in any land.

Now, suppose the land is to be acquired up here and then you start here and you begin to get land at Arkansas City. Who is going to give the land? The State of Arkansas is not in the levee district. The highlands do not like the lowlands, and there is no chance for them to get together. There is no more chance of that than there is of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and the gentleman from New York [Mr.

LAGUARDIA] getting together. [Laughter.] The highlands would not vote to tax their people along the river, and consequently there is no chance of these local people getting together. Why should the people of Louisiana pay for the protection of the people of Mississippi? Why should these people in the Atchafalaya Basin pay for the protection of the city of New Orleans? New Orleans is a rich city, and why should they not pay for it themselves, they ask? It can not be left to the local interests. If you can say to a community, "You can either get protected or not," that is another proposition; but in order to have effective flood control from Cairo to the Gulf, it has to be unified; and in such a way that no particular community can stay in or out, as it pleases, because if anybody stays out, it spoils your entire system. The links here that you see that are weak are the ones that cause the flood. Take the break at Dorena. They did not have enough money there to bring up their levee to the grade of 1914, and all the way down here.

If there are any other questions about these maps, I will be glad to have them asked now. Here is another map of the Mississippi Basin which shows 1,250,000 square miles of drainage area which must be taken care of from Cairo down. That area stretches from New York up to Montana and clear over here to New Mexico. You use this great stem here for the ditch. It is a new idea when the ditch has to carry the load for the entire drainage system, and under no theory of our law would there be a right, if it were between private people, that these people up here could so accelerate their drainage as to harm these people down here without paying for it. That is the reason that they are before Congress here to-day.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. What would be the cost of the construction of the work at any one given point, like this spillway?

Mr. REID of Illinois. About $11,000,000 for the Bonnet Carre spillway.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. So that there is no chance of levying that locally?

Mr. REID of Illinois. No. That is what I say. That is for the benefit of the city of New Orleans.

Mr. CRISP. How many States are included in that drainage basin?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Thirty-one. You are asking this lower portion to take the entire burden of that drainage district. Some say that it is the natural drainage ditch. Well, it is said that it used to be swamp land here in front of the Capitol and that the water used to come up nearly to the steps of the Capitol when the Potomac River overflowed. Under the Jadwin plan, if the river overflowed, you could go down here and take all of the property along Pennsylvania Avenue and say you have a right to do it, because this was the natural flood way once, and that you have a right to put it in there again.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does this plan take care of the tributaries?

Mr. REID of Illinois. No. It is not intended to take care of the tributaries. We have in the bill a section which provides for a survey of the tributaries.

FACTS NECESSARY TO UNDERSTAND THE ISSUES—TWO SIDES OF QUESTION PRESENTED

In order to understand the flood-control problem of the lower Mississippi River, it is necessary to know the different schools of thought that have developed in the long years it has been under consideration, and which in turn involves its history and a knowledge of the legislation and upon what that legislation was based.

There are two schools of thought. One we will call the nationalists, who believe that it is and always has been the Government's obligation to control the destructive flood waters of the lower Mississippi, not only on account of its terms of acquisition and its national use, but also on account of the development of the United States in the great West and Northwest and progress in the East, deluging intermittently the lower Mississippi Valley.

The other school we will call the local contributionists, who believe that levee building is a private matter and that the Government's interest is one of navigation only, and that its participation and payment should be so limited.

Originally levee building was a local and private matter, not only as to districts, but as to individual landowners themselves who only protected their own properties.

With the increased floods caused by artificial drainage the task of protecting private property became too great for the individual to cope with singly, so he and his neighbors organized levee districts. Faster came the floods than levees could be built; even levee districts were impotent and crevasse after crevasse overflowed adjacent lands. This summarized the private standpoint.

All this time in another jurisdiction a more important problem to the Nation was being wrestled with, however, not with individuals or localities as the factors, but the great engineering talent of the United States Army, backed by the entire resources of the Nation endeavoring to make and keep the Mississippi River a navigable stream, so that the Nation might prosper.

After spending years of study and great amounts of money, the United States engineers finally determined that the only hope for the navigable channel for the Mississippi River lay in the use of levees to keep the river water under control at all times.

In conformity with this engineering opinion Congress passed laws embodying the recommendations regarding the use of levees as an aid to navigation, and finally in 1879 it created the Mississippi River Commission, which was charged with the duty, among other things, of giving ease and safety to navigation of the Mississippi River, and preventing destructive floods, promoting and facilitating commerce, trade, and the Postal Service.

ERRORS IN JADWIN PLAN POINTED OUT

Regarding the assumptions that the natural bed of the Mississippi River is the alluvial valley and the United States is engaged in a reclamation project, it is sufficient to state that the Supreme Court of the United States has held just the opposite in the case of Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission (241 U. S. 351), the syllabus on exactly this point being as follows:

> The conditions existing in the valley of the river demonstrate that the work of the Mississippi River Commission, and of the various State commissions, in constructing the series of levees from Cairo to the Gulf is for the purpose of prevention of destruction and improvement of navigation by confining the river to its bed and is not for purposes of reclamation.

In deciding this point the Chief Justice, who rendered the opinion, one of the most eminent jurists in our history, said that the contention that the building of the levees was a work not of preservation but of reclamation was unsound, and was "wholly irreconcilable with the settlement and development of the valley of the river."

As to the assumption that the destructive flood waters have an easement, the general's position is not well founded, as will be seen from the following quotation from Ruling Case Law:

> Acceleration of flow or increase in quantity of water: Without a grant, either express or implied, an upper owner has ordinarily no right to accelerate the impelling force of a stream of running water, as by deepening the channel or removing natural obstructions therefrom, to the injury of a lower owner. (27 Ruling Case Law, 1099.)

The true difficulties of this problem will now be appreciated. We can protect Louisiana by simple means from all ordinary natural floods. But the great problem with which we have to cope is to ascertain how to protect her from the deluge created by the artificial improvements which are accelerating the drainage of the prairies and diverting the collected waters from their natural course through the lowlands.

It will thus be seen that it is the pursuit of individual and public interests through all of the northern States of the Mississippi Valley that pours the excess of water down. It may possibly be considered, therefore, that it is the common duty of the States to guard the land which these improvements now endanger.

The justice of this position lies in the fact that the water from 31 States is poured uncontrolled into the Mississippi River. It is the national ditch of the Government and a moral duty rests upon us to prevent the waters from some of those States from destroying the property of the others. If between private parties this would be illegal. This is what the Government is doing; more and more each year they close natural drains and bayous, and thereby divert the natural flow and increase the natural burden in the lower States. The Government participates in this. In this its acts are illegal unless at the same time it protects the lower States against such increased burdens. From a legal standpoint, when the Government thus increases the waters in the river by drainage and levees, it becomes our duty to protect the States along the river from this increased flow of water.

With reference to the general's assumption that the swamp lands were donated by the Government to the States for the building of levees on the Mississippi River: That this is entirely erroneous is shown by the facts upon which the swamp land acts were based, as the swamp lands were donated to 15 States of the Union, including Alabama, California, Oregon, Iowa, and other States entirely out of the Mississippi Valley, and is further shown by the debates in Congress at the time of the passage of the acts.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that all of the swamp land acts of 1849, 1850, 1860 expressly provided that the provisions of those acts extended to all of the other States of the Union and not merely to the States specifically mentioned?

Mr. REID of Illinois. The gentleman is correct about that.

The assumption that participation in his flood-control plan should be optional with local communities needs little comment. The United States are not in the business of keeping people from drowning for a fee and are not dedicated to the idea that these people may drown if they wish. Even in religion we save even though the individual does not think he wants to be saved.

Would anyone think of expending millions of dollars for flood control only to have the whole system fail and the money wasted because one local district elected to stay out? The integrity of the levees is the prime factor in the control of the destructive flood waters. Local communities can not be forced to raise funds or be compelled to enter into a flood-control program which entails the expenditure of private funds.

The assumption that the project should be paid for in the same manner as reclamation projects can not be sustained upon the facts. A reclamation project has for its object the reclaiming or bringing into existence lands theretofore not susceptible of cultivation, while the lands herein involved have been in cultivation for hundreds of years. This is not reclamation but preservation.

It is then contended that benefits will result and those receiving the benefit should pay part of the cost of the work. It is useless to contend that no benefits will ensue; but it is contended that the benefits are not the kind upon which a special tax upon adjacent property is warranted. The benefits may be listed as follows:

Human life will be saved.

Sickness and disease will be prevented.

People will not be driven from their homes and made objects of charity.

Suffering and misery will be prevented.

Land will not be washed away.

Property will not be destroyed.

People will be able to follow their occupations.

Industry will continue.

Interstate commerce and the United States mails will not be interfered with.

There will be a feeling of security that will restore confidence.

No court or law of the land ever levied a special tax on land based on these elements and to require a payment for these benefits would be levying a tax on saving of human life, on occupation, on industry, on opportunity, on progress, and on prosperity. [Applause.]

These benefits are some of those for which our National Government is organized, and always has been, are properly paid out of the General Treasury, and are given freely and without price in order that general welfare may be furthered.

The Federal Government has spent, and will continue to spend, millions of dollars to develop this country so that its citizens may prosper, and it will be a bold Congressman who will advocate a tax on the opportunity to make a good living and a small-caliber one who would begrudge an American citizen this good fortune.

Our country can prosper only in proportion as our citizens prosper, and the misfortune of great numbers affects the fortune of the Nation. Why States as such should be considered in this matter is not quite clear. The States asked to pay have no part in producing the destructive flood waters. Floods know no State boundaries and can not be controlled by fiat. The States as such can not legislate regarding the control or use of the navigable waters of the Mississippi. The States have authorized the organization of levee districts and provided for the raising of funds and there is no more they can properly be asked to do.

Levee building is a matter between the Government and adjacent landowners, one for navigation, the other for protection. The landowner has followed the lead of the Government and has spent millions of dollars and all there is to show for it is a collapse of the system and a poverty-stricken and disappointed people.

Every argument made against the "Government pay all" proposition is equally strong regarding the "Government pay 80 per cent," with this difference, the 80 per cent Government payment secures no adequate flood-control protection while the 100 per cent Government payment insures the absolute success of the undertaking. [Applause.]

While reclamation is important to a landowner, its importance to him sinks in insignificance when compared with the importance to the Nation of maintaining this great river highway as a commerce carrier. Levees are essential to such, so why hesitate to construct them? Shall we neglect matters of national concern because individual citizens might profit therefrom?

Can it be, too, that the vast interests of the Nation in interstate commerce and in the transportation of the mails are not important enough to warrant the Federal Government to take all necessary steps to prevent their being interfered with by flood waters?

Millions of dollars are spent protecting our commerce abroad, yet no one would think of taxing those engaged in commerce to pay the cost of the protection. The lower Mississippi Valley produces more wealth for the United States Treasury than our foreign trade does, yet there are those who pretend to have business insight and who would begrudge this same protection to our home people.

At the present time there is a great deal of talk over our marines being in Nicaragua. Would any one contend that the people whose business is down there in Nicaragua or who own property down there should be taxed so much per person in order to pay the cost of the protection that they and their business is getting? That is a parallel case.

General Jadwin's plan does not take into consideration the regions from which the floods come, and of course no solution of the problem can be found without so doing. Thirty States pour their flood waters down on Louisiana, and yet, after having erected levees sufficient to take care of the natural flood waters, it is forced to contribute large sums to take care of the floods produced by artificial drainage caused by the prosperity of other States. The one causing the damage should pay. It is our boast that there is no wrong without a remedy. This is a vain boast unless the Federal Government does its whole duty to the people of the lower Mississippi Valley. Fair play and common justice would require that, after having the benefit of privately paid for levees to aid navigation, the Government should do the fair thing and build the levees for navigation that will aid these same people.

This is not a reclamation project but is a humanitarian one, pure and simple, and the United States should not attempt to drive a hard bargain when the safety and welfare of so many of its citizens are at stake. Shall it, like Shylock of old, demand its pound of flesh for its ounce of gold, especially when this work is made necessary to correct the mistaken policy of the Government itself in the control of the Mississippi River?

That the Jadwin plan would work successfully dependent on local contribution was doubted even by its author, for, while stating certain conditions, he made provision to waive their compliance when it became necessary to do what he thought was desirable. Congress itself should fix the exceptions, if there are to be any, and should not leave that to the agency doing the work.

JADWIN PLAN PENALIZES ONE DISTRICT TO BENEFIT ANOTHER

Another of the serious objections to General Jadwin's plan, and one which is most strongly urged by the officials and people in the affected States, is that it proposes to protect certain districts and States at the expense of other districts and States. And not only is this so but it proposes further that in some places certain works shall be erected to protect a city or territory, which will result in other territory, sometimes in another State, being periodically flooded, and calls upon the latter district to pay for the works.

As expressed in the brief filed by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas, in referring to the Boeuf Basin flood way proposed by General Jadwin, which would flood over two and a half million acres, much of it productive land, and destroy many cities and towns in Arkansas in order to protect a portion of the State of Mississippi, Arkansas is being asked to "pay a portion of its own funeral in order that other sections may survive."

A similar proposal in the Jadwin plan has aroused the people of southeast Missouri. The general recommends that in order to protect the city of Cairo, Ill., on the other side of the river, the present levees on the Missouri side shall be cut down and set back 5 miles, and a river-bank flood way created between Birds Point and New Madrid, Mo., which in times of flood would lay waste and devastate 144,000 acres of land, 60 per cent of which is highly cultivated and productive. And the cost of this work, estimated at millions of dollars, is to be borne by the people of Missouri, while the city of Cairo, Ill., is not to be asked to put up a cent.

Such inequities and injustices in the Jadwin plan convince the committee that the legislatures of the valley States will never agree to it, and that, therefore, no flood-control work will be done, as the plan provides no work shall be done until the States have consented to the plan and agreed to provide the money.

Instead of the Jadwin plan, if adopted by Congress, providing protection from the floods for the lower Mississippi Valley, it might result in the recurrence of a disaster like that of 1927.

LOCAL CONTRIBUTIONS

The phrase "local contributions" is intended to mean local payment toward the cost of the construction of flood-control works.

The committee found it the controversial point of the whole discussion, so it investigated thoroughly every phase of the subject, and was forced finally to the conclusion that it was not practical and that its incorporation in the proposed legislation would result in its nullification, thus leaving Congress no further advanced, in the solution of the problem, though after more than 40 years spent in the effort and an expenditure of nearly a half billion dollars.

The following question was asked of witnesses time after time for months at the committee hearings:

Question. Have you any practical plan to offer the committee, or have you ever heard of one, to collect money from local interests or State?
Answer. (?).

The question remains unanswered to-day.

Everyone who has studied the subject at all has abandoned the claim that flood control will bring a direct, tangible benefit to the adjacent property owners and have gone from the levee districts as a basis to the State or several States as the source for payment for the flood-control works. Though often requested, no one has offered to present or sponsor a plan of local contribution that would be workable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. REID of Illinois. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. REID of Illinois. I shall use 20 minutes more.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more of my time. I have already yielded some.

Mr. REID of Illinois. The committee is of the opinion that the "local contribution" policy of the Government should be abandoned and believes that to make the construction of flood-control works dependent upon local contribution will result in the failure of the whole plan and another disaster such as that which appalled the Nation last year might happen. Divided responsibility resulting from the local contribution policy has been the primary cause for the failure of the protective works, and permitted weak levees, which, when they failed, not only flooded their own districts but also brought disasters to the neighboring districts and neighboring States.

A system which permits local interests to build or not to build adequate levees is doomed from the beginning, and there is no way under the law to compel a district to build flood-control works or force the collection of any assessment for the same.

Under the present law, and similar proposed laws, money for flood-control works must come from the levee districts along the Mississippi River or from the Government. These levee districts, while authorized by State law, are in no way connected with the State. They get no State funds and they are not permitted to use the credit of the State. Every property in each levee district only pays the amount assessed in legal proceedings, and, of course, it can never amount to more than the certain per cent of the increased value produced by the levee works, and the assessments must be uniform and equal.

If property is already burdened with levee bond issues and is not producing enough to pay past-due assessments, there is little hope that they will be able to pay for future assessments, and then, of course, there will be no flood protection if that is made dependent upon local contribution.

There are some who say that there are rich landowners and rich corporations in some of these levee districts that should come to the rescue and put up the money. This might be the case if the United States Government was a besieging enemy sending word that unless a certain amount of money is forthcoming the city will be destroyed. The day has not yet come in America when we are going to demand tribute for saving the life and property in a community or levy an assessment upon a man to save him from drowning.

The raising of this "local contribution" is not to be likened to taking up a collection for a charitable enterprise, where rich men are expected to make large donations and poor people small ones, but all money-raising campaigns must be handled in a legal manner.

The advocates of local contribution fail to take into consideration that the damages are caused by agencies outside of the levee districts or States, and that the damage is not caused by any act or negligence of those suffering from the damage. Under every theory of American law the source of damage and the responsibility therefor is the main factor and the penalty is laid against the party or parties causing the damage.

However, under the local contribution theory these people that are damaged not only suffer the injury, but also have the additional penalty laid upon them of having to pay the money necessary to prevent the damage from the outside source. The advocates of local contribution practically pay no attention to the "regions from which the flood waters come," and without this, of course, there can be no fair solution of the problem. A new levee district that would be fair would have to take in 31 States or more.

It would have to include the 31 States, and I am sure some wealthy people in Pittsburgh and elsewhere would be willing to help the people down here; but it is unconstitutional, and if you wait for the States to amend their constitutions, all the people in the South will be drowned and the historical allusion that we learned about in our childhood as to how terrible the British were in driving out the Acadians from Nova Scotia would be repeated.

Taking into consideration the amount of money already invested by the United States in the levees, the absolute necessity of levees in navigation, the direct taxes that will flow into the United States Treasury on account of the resumption of normal activities, the prevention of interference with interstate commerce and the delay of the United States mails, the amount of money already contributed by local interests amounting to $292,000,000, the United States can ill afford to do anything else than supply the funds for flood-control works.

A mere reading of the statements of the conditions of the levee districts and the necessity of having a unified, comprehensive system of flood control under one authority, as contained in the hearings before the committee and in its report, is sufficient to convince anyone that the position of the committee is justified.

The testimony showed that the local interests have not been able in the past to supply the money necessary to bring the levees up to the 1914 standard grade, and after the flood of 1927 their financial condition is so bad that there is no hope that they will be able to raise any money to apply toward the payment of the costs of the new flood-control works necessary.

Colonel Potter testified that some levee breaks resulted from the inability of local districts to pay a share of the expense of levee construction.

Any plan which is constructed around the idea that local interests must contribute, even if financially unable to do so, is, in the opinion of Commissioner West, "a paper plan" only, doomed to certain failure:

Mr. Cox. Measures dictated by your judgment or by the judgment of the commission you have not been able to put into effect because of that inability to cooperate?

Mr. WEST. Quite frequently that has occurred; yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Cox. Yes. If they have been unable to contribute in the past, it is fair to assume that now they are unable to contribute, is it not?

Mr. WEST. Far less able now than in the past; yes, sir.

And according to Mr. West the system requiring local contributions has made an unequal partnership with "too many small partners of varying strength and disposition" and has now caused a delay of three years in the execution of work under way.

INABILITY OF LEVEE DISTRICTS TO CONTRIBUTE FURTHER

The testimony given in the hearings established the fact that those districts in which the greatest damage was done and in which the people are most in need of aid are the districts in which the people are least able to contribute to the cost of flood control. The sparsely settled agricultural districts given over to plantations, where cotton and cane are the principal products, were so overwhelmingly ruined that years will be required for their rehabilitation.

In some of those districts the bonded public debt, representing previous local expenditures for flood control, runs as high as three-fourths of the assessed valuation of the districts; and in other districts it will be found that the total liens and liabilities against the property of the districts, including the bonded public debt and real-estate mortgages against private property, exceed the total valuation of the property of the district available for assessment for taxes or benefits.

Many public officials testified that their districts have reached the limits of bonding and taxation under present laws, and that it will be absolutely impossible for them to participate in any plan for flood control which contemplates that they shall bear any part of the financial burden. They have the spirit and the courage to put themselves in to the extent of their ability, to fight the elements in order to win back their homes, but of goods, wares, and merchandise they have none, having reached the point where individual credit and public credit are alike ruined.

Not only did the mighty flood sweep away their homes, their cattle, and their tools and implements, but the water remained on the ground for so long a time thereafter that there was no opportunity for them to plant crops during the year. Under these depressing circumstances, it is no wonder that districts defaulted in the payment of interest on their outstanding bonds, the records of which will be found in the hearings, and that individuals could not meet the payments of principal and interest provided for in their mortgages.

This situation involved the merchants of these districts and also the local banks upon which the planters and merchants rely for financing from one season until the next. Every bank in one of the counties in Arkansas had failed as a result of the dreadful conditions brought about by the flood and the consequent failure of crops. How can it be expected that these people, without money and without credit, shall contribute to the great expense of establishing additional flood control?

Aside from the economic survey made through officials in the levee districts, the committee also received communications from mayors of cities, public officials, bankers, merchants, and scores of people generally throughout the districts affected, all testifying to the fact that the people in those districts have been bled white by taxation to provide the $292,000,000 already expended by the taxpayers in the lower valley on levees for flood control. They submit that these expenditures have reduced them in many districts to a condition of insolvency. They say they have exhausted their credit, both public and private, and ask if they may be relieved from any further burden at this time in protecting them from the floods which periodically descend upon them. The details of their unfortunate situation appear in the record of the hearings.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman was just talking about money, and it has been stated here that the Government's expenditure would run to a billion dollars or more. On the other hand, would the gentleman tell us of the direct losses that have accrued from the year 1902 to the year 1927, plus the $292,000,000 local contributions? I understand from 1902 to 1927, during that quite recent period, the value of property destroyed has exceeded $800,000,000. When you add to that $800,000,000 the $292,000,000 already paid by way of local contributions and confine yourself to that limited period you find at once a liability that has fallen on the people of the lower Mississippi Valley exceeding $1,000,000,000?

Mr. REID of Illinois. There is no question about that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And that does not take into consideration the enormous destruction of property that preceded the year 1902.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Exactly. I think that good business judgment would prompt us to take steps to prevent such losses in the future.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have made no reference to the destruction of human life, which has been very great, and the sufferings to which the hundreds of thousands of people have been subjected.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Neither does that take into consideration the economic loss of produce and the failure of the development that would have come if these floods had not come.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes. If they could not raise the money to repair the crevasses to keep the coming floods out, they certainly can not produce any money for future flood-control work, and that is the answer to anyone who says that local contributions will insure flood control of any kind.

Illustrative of the inability of some of the local levee districts to meet the situation confronting them following the 1927 overflow and to make contributions for the closure of crevasse breached levees, it is noted that the Mississippi River Commission had to waive the requirement of local contribution in the following instances and rebuild the levees at these localities entirely at Government expense. This was done with the approval and consent of the Secretary of War.

To adhere strictly to the local contribution requirement for financing the flood-control work would, according to Colonel Potter, make it impossible even to do the work necessary to bring the levees up to the 1914 grade, according to his testimony which follows:

Mr. WILSON. Then to make the plan effective, even if you are going to bring the levees up to the 1914 grade and section, it will be necessary for the Federal Government to do the work; furnish the money?

Colonel POTTER. If you are convinced of the financial inability of those districts to put up the money, that would be undoubtedly true. We do not know or we have no way of knowing—I really believe, and I believe it more than I did when I wrote that paragraph of the report; that is, I believe it more now, that they are unable to put it up, than I did believe it when I wrote the paragraph in the report.

The United States should build the levees regardless of whom it benefits:

Mr. Cox. Colonel, if there was not a living soul in the valley, would you not still favor the controlling of these waters in the same manner as recommended by the commission?

Colonel KUTZ. Our plan might be different.

Mr. Cox. But still you would favor the harnessing of the water or controlling the water and not permitting them to split the country in two?

Colonel KUTZ. I think the Mississippi is a valuable part of the transportation system of the country and that even if there was no one living in the valley the river ought to be controlled for that reason.

Mr. Cox. As a matter of national defense, if for nothing else?

Colonel KUTZ. Yes, sir. (P. 2847.)

It has been ascertained and declared by the Mississippi River Commission, composed of some of the most eminent engineers in the world, that levees should be constructed along the banks of the river as works in the interest of navigation, without any reference whatever to the protection of alluvial lands from overflow. This point was made perfectly clear by the testimony of the engineers who appeared before the committee and whose statements are printed in the hearings of 1890. The following colloquy between Senator Gibson and Lieutenant Colonel Suter, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, for many years a member of the Mississippi River Commission, is pertinent at this point:

Senator GIBSON. You stated a moment ago, in reply to a question by the chairman, that if you were improving the Mississippi River, even if it were running through a wilderness, if the country through which it ran were not peopled, you would still build levees on the banks?

Lieutenant Colonel SUTER. Yes, sir.

Senator GIBSON. Why do you hold that opinion?

Lieutenant Colonel SUTER. Because I consider that the improvement of the stream for navigable purposes without it is impossible.

The situation, then, is this: It is impossible to improve the stream for navigation without levees; this is the Government's interest.

No public improvement, however, of any character whatever is ever free from the objection that some particular locality or some particular enterprise or some particular individual is especially benefited by it. This, however, is not a good reason against improvement.

We have heard a lot about the South, and I want to refer to a former Illinoisan, Abraham Lincoln. I want somebody to think about what he said when they make the statement that somebody is going to make some money without working for it.

In a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on the 20th of June, 1848, Mr. Lincoln criticized President Polk's veto of the river and harbor bill, and in that speech discussed at length this very question:

Now, for the second portion of the message, namely, that the burden of improvements would be general, while their benefits would be local and partial, involving an obnoxious inequality. That there is some degree of truth in this position I shall not deny. No commercial object of Government patronage can be so exclusively general as to not be of some peculiar local advantage. * * * The Navy, then, is the most general in its benefits of all this class of objects, and yet even the Navy is of some peculiar advantage to Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston beyond what it is to the interior towns of Illinois. The next most general object I can think of would be improvements on the Mississippi River and its tributaries. They touch 13 of our States. * * *

Now, I suppose it will not be denied that these 13 States are a little more interested in improvements on that great river than are the remaining 17. These instances of the Navy and the Mississippi River show clearly that there is something of local advantage in the most general objects. But the converse is also true. Nothing is so local as to not be of some general benefit. * * * The just conclusion from all this is that if the Nation refuses to make improvements of the more general kind because their benefits may be somewhat local, a State may for the same reason refuse to make an improvement of a local kind because its benefits may be somewhat general. A State may well say to the Nation, "If you will do nothing for me, I will do nothing for you." Thus it is seen that if this argument of inequality is sufficient anywhere, it is sufficient everywhere, and puts an end to improvements altogether. I hope and believe that if both the Nation and the States would in good faith, in their respective spheres, do what they could in the way of improvements, what of inequality might be produced in one place might be compensated in another, and the sum of the whole might not be very unequal.

That is good judgment. [Applause.]

The river has no respect for State boundaries and deluges Arkansas through breaks in the levees of Missouri, and overflows Louisiana by floods passing across the Arkansas line.

Heretofore as long as the flood-control policy was one of "levees only," it was the general rule that expenditures for levee work were confined to the payment of work within the levee district itself. There was, it is true, a recognition of the fact that different levee districts within the same natural basin were interdependent as regards protection from overflow, and particularly was this fact realized by the district further downstream, that freedom from overflow depended upon the integrity of the levee line in the sister district, as well as on that of its own levee district. But this recognition did not go to the extent of the lower district coming to the financial assistance of the upper district in promoting their common safety. Probably this was for the reason that there was always work to be done in every district bringing the levees up to the continually increasing grades and the local work was given priority in consideration and execution. It should be stated in this connection that there was one exception to this general statement, which was the Tensas Basin levee district in Louisiana that did spend money in Arkansas for its own protection.

In the present plans submitted by the Chief of Engineers and by the Mississippi River Commission there is a broader conception of the flood-control problem than was shown in the "levees only" policy, and there is brought forcibly to mind the fact that a comprehensive flood-control plan must obliterate levee district lines and even State lines in the working out of a solution for the whole valley.

Taking, for example, the Birds Point to New Madrid riverbank flood way, and assuming that it is the correct solution to apply in the situation, the Chief of Engineers disregards district lines and even State lines and plans a work in Missouri to protect a city in Illinois.

In the instance of the Boeuf diversion, the resultant reduction of the flood height on the main river by abstracting enormous quantities of water from the main river will ameliorate the situation confronting the levee districts in the State of Mississippi and in Arkansas above the mouth of the Arkansas.

Similarly the Atchafalaya spillway will reduce the high-water burden of those levee districts on the main river below Red River Landing, including the Pontchartrain district on the opposite side of the river below Baton Rouge.

The city of New Orleans in common with the Pontchartrain district, the Lafourche district, and the Lake Borgne district will be the beneficiaries of the flood way in the Atchafalaya district.

In his testimony, it may be noted, General Jadwin naïvely suggests that any district which may fail for any reason to contribute to the cost of flood control might have turned onto that unfortunate district the fury of the flood. In this connection attention is invited to the fact that the districts which have borne the brunt of previous flood disasters are the districts which are now unable to raise any money to contribute further, and to the people of those districts the plan of General Jadwin constitutes a pronouncement of doom.

FLOOD CONTROL INDORSED BY NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

I want to pause right here to make a comment. Somebody twitted the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN] about the chamber of commerce. You may not like the chamber of commerce, but I would like to have anybody stand up here who does not regard the American Legion of some importance in these United States. They have unanimously indorsed this proposition of Government control at Government expense. Then, maybe, they are bold enough to say that the American Federation of Labor does not know its business. I would like to hear from any chorus that will say they do not know it. Then even the American Farm Bureau may not know what they are talking about. The organizations to which I have referred have gone on record and heralded to the world, as many thousand other organizations have—local, State, and otherwise—that this is a national problem and should be done at national expense. [Applause.]

FLOWAGE RIGHTS IN FLOOD WAYS

There is no change made in this bill in the plan as presented by the President in his message. There is no change in the Jadwin plan in any detail at the present time. The only change is, Who is going to pay for the flood-control spillways and flood ways necessary? There has not been any change. It is a matter of mere control, and the plans stand just the same. If the land a few months ago had the enormous value somebody has said, it certainly ought to have been told to the country; but I am not much concerned about whether the amount is too high or too low, except that if the Government shall pay for the rights of way you would not have the engineers using the whole State of Louisiana for a flood way. I wish you would listen to that. If the engineers knew that the United States was paying, they would work out an engineering plan that would do the very same thing with a great deal less use of flood ways than if somebody else were paying for it. [Applause.]

To my mind that is one of the big things that must be considered. If we are to do something, if we have all the money we want and somebody else is paying for it, why not? But they have great engineering ingenuity and I know they can solve this and do it economically without any scandal. The President would not be a party to any scandal under this bill. The President is running the Secretary of War and I am certain the Secretary of War would not be a party to any scandal, and I am sure the Chief of Engineers would not be in on any scandal. All of this talk about scandal is a matter of imagination and it was only prompted by people who did not understand what this bill was about, because nobody I have talked to is really against flood control or flood protection for the South. They have their ideas that somebody is wrong about the economical plan or the engineering plan, but nobody down in his heart wants to prevent it. I told a certain individual that I could take a tin cup, go out to the churches and theaters of the United States, and collect enough money to pay the amount that it is said the local interests should contribute. But that is not the principle involved. The principle involved is that you want flood control and it has got to be done by an overwhelming agency that can go in and do it in spite of a local district and in spite of the local States. I think that if the Red Cross could collect what they collected for relief I could collect more than that to prevent it.

RESERVOIR SURVEY

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman tell us something about what the plan is in the bill for reservoirs?

Mr. REID of Illinois. The reservoir plan in the bill is that there shall be an investigation of the reservoirs on the square. There seems to be the impression in the committee and elsewhere that the reservoir proposition was only treated as a stepchild when it was considered by the Government engineers, but you can read the report as to that. The bill as amended by the House provides for a reservoir survey, and there is a provision in the bill that if it should be determined that reservoirs will help to control floods in the lower Mississippi Valley, then they might be substituted in place of some of the proposed flood ways. The Mississippi River Commission said that reservoirs should be considered on the Arkansas and on the Red, so that they would not need to take all of those lands out of cultivation for the flood ways and avoid all of this great speculation which is spoken about. I think that is the bill.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS IN FEDERAL COURTS

I want to agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] that it is a sad commentary on this House if the United States Government can not get justice in its own courts. If anybody will stand up and say you can not get justice in your own courts, what kind of flimflam have you been putting over on the people when you have led the people to believe that the United States courts are integrity itself, that no one in any way could put anything over either on the judges or juries, and that protection to the ordinary individual is their supreme guaranty; and that if the Federal courts undertook to do a thing they would do it right. I have heard no scandals connected with our United States courts in any way, and I am surprised that any Congressman would even think of it.

FLOOD SUFFERERS WOULD BENEFIT FROM ADEQUATE FLOOD CONTROL

Now, comment was made that the 700,000 people who were rendered homeless would not benefit by this proposed legislation. I can not believe they meant this, because if we have flood-control work these people will be able to work and earn some money. In the last analysis the man who pays the levee assessment is the man who produces the crops. In the South it is either the poor white or the colored man. Up to date the slave has not been free. We had a paper freedom according to the President's emancipation proclamation issued in 1863, but the black man to-day is under worse slavery than he ever was, because just when he gets a good crop and thinks he is going to have enough money to live respectably and provide himself with comforts, along comes the Mississippi and wipes him out, and, consequently, there is a debt piled on him each year which crushes him worse than the ownership which he formerly had; and anybody who pretends to have any feeling of humanity in his veins will look to that end alone. The black man bears the burden of this entire thing, and I might say here in regard to the great landowners that have offices in the same building in Chicago with each other that they do not get their feet wet, they do not get washed away, and this is not for them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SCHAFER. About what percentage of the land in the valley does the black man own?

Mr. REID of Illinois. He owns little or none, but he supplies the labor that pays the taxes, that makes the levee districts able to do the work, and he shares not in money like we do up North or in Wisconsin, but shares only from the crop; and if there is no crop he is worse off than ever, and must be taken care of by charity over the balance of the year. At the present time the Red Cross is taking care of a great many of these families down here.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not also fair to state that according to the testimony before our committee when the tenant makes a crop he gets his part of the crop before the landlord gets a dollar?

Mr. REID of Illinois. There is no question about that.

Do not get the idea that anybody is a Santa Claus. Your Uncle Sam is not Santa Claus, and you are not doling out charity here. You are in the same position of a man who has a wild bull or a savage dog. All you have got to do is to keep that wild bull within the pasture or that savage dog or that mad dog in the pen. This river is the river of the United States. The State of Illinois or the State of Arkansas or the State of Louisiana has no jurisdiction over it, can not legislate in any way in regard to it, and yet it is permitted by the United States, the only agency that has control over it, to run wild and do this harm.

As I have told you, the people in Missouri would stop this project in a minute. They would never give the flood way. The flood way in Missouri does not help them. Why should the people in Louisiana give anything? It does not help them, but helps the people in Mississippi. So you see that if you depend upon any local interest for favorable action, there will be no flood control.

CONCLUSION

We are confronted with a condition, not a theory, and every hour's delay may add another chapter to the awful story of misery and death. The results of the flood of 1927 are listed hereafter, even if the horrors of that disastrous flood are not still fresh in the reader's mind. Under the present law the United States says to the threatened ones, "No pay, no protection." To stave off famine and probably the horrible fate of drowning, the people of the lower Mississippi Valley appeal to us. What shall our answer be? Let those loyal to the dollar stand aside while those loyal to humanity come to the front. No cold, discriminating policy of economy will decide this issue, and any party advocating such a move had better look to its laurels.

Some say that it is not the affair of the United States Government to do this work. But who can stand idly by and see that land devastated and depopulated, business interests destroyed, commercial intercourse cut off, and people starved and degraded?

It may be the naked legal right of the United States Government to stand thus idly by, but, if it does, it is not worth the name. And those who do so say do not represent American sentiment; they do not represent American patriotism.

This Congress is being appealed to; the South, the whole United States, and the whole world will judge our actions. Shall we stamp ourselves as petty and provincial, or shall we be recorded as magnanimous and national?

Is our civilization so little removed from barbarism that it will permit hundreds to be drowned and thousands to be made homeless and destitute? That they can not pay is not on account of their own indolence or neglect but because the progress of industry in other States pours down upon them oceans of destructive flood waters in order that those States may continue to progress and prosper.

As early as 1850 Congress was warned that the process by which the country above is relieved is also that by which the country below is ruined; yet we permit the destructive waters to ravage our towns and destroy the lives of our people. The river is as cold and heartless as an enemy in war. Yet we do not defend against it.

The Mississippi River has worked the deadliest wrong to this country—its gifts to the South are discontent, impoverishment, and degradation.

The farmer and his family must live in semistarvation, in wretched hovels, amid squalor and privations, barbed by the thought that any little money earned by labor and sweat from day to day will have to go to the Federal Government to pay for levees.

The loss in human life can not be measured. For who shall put an estimate upon the value of the souls destroyed by the same causes, and who shall gather the tears of the widow and the orphan, the bloody sweat of anguished families, and the griefs for loved ones lost, fortunes broken, and hopes destroyed, and weigh them in the scale with a pitiful appropriation of money?

After the flood had subsided these people had no homes to which to return; their fields have grown up to weeds, they have no mules, no implements of husbandry with which to begin anew the cultivation of the soil; they have no seed; they have nothing; yet they are asked to pay a special tax to be permitted to earn a living and to be saved from drowning.

The conscience of the whole country has been aroused by the frightful destruction in the lower valley. Nothing less than an adequate, comprehensive plan of 100 per cent flood control without local contribution will satisfy the people of this Nation.

If anyone asks why the Federal Government should be urged to take hold of this problem on a national scale and assume full responsibility for the time, labor, and great cost involved in obtaining complete control of the Mississippi River, surely it is sufficient to remind him that the drainage basin of this great river covers 41 per cent of the total area of the United States. Besides the great investment in the levees, the need of the Mississippi as a carrier of United States and foreign commerce, the havoc wrought to interstate commerce, and the interference with the United States mails when uncontrolled, the increase to the National Treasury when industry is not stopped, the safety of life and property, and the promotion of its general welfare—these formulate an adequate answer to his questioning attitude. To these might be added one thing that would be worth all the cost—national defense. No foreign foe can ever conquer us as long as navigation is kept open on the Mississippi.

There can be no flood control by local option. Let our duty be met squarely. We have evaded our responsibility long enough. [Applause, the Members rising.]

I have two minutes remaining, and I will be pleased to yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], and then I will answer any further questions I can in that time.

Mr. FREAR. If I can talk for a moment in the gentleman's time, I will say that I have enjoyed his speech very much. It was an excellent presentation from his side of the question. There is no question about that.

Now, may I yield 15 minutes to myself, Mr. Chairman, and this is in no controversial spirit? I could talk like every Member of the House on the sympathetic side of the question, and I would be delighted to do so, but I am going to present to you several facts, if I may, in connection with what the gentleman has fairly presented, and I say this because I believe it. It has been a good argument from his side of the matter.

We have in the United States to-day a policy adopted over 10 years ago in the case of floods on the Mississippi River that one-third contribution shall be furnished by the localities. I am not now discussing the merits or the fairness of it, but this policy has been in existence for 10 years.

In the bill before us there is a provision for California. They have had a flood in the Sacramento Valley that is just as serious in its proportions as the Mississippi River flood, and this same committee of which I am a member—and we did this because we thought it was fair and proper—decided that the State of California should contribute one-third, the people who live in the valley should contribute one-third, and the Government of the United States should contribute the remainder of all the money that would be required to build levees and protect these people from the disastrous floods they have in California. That is part of this bill.

This has been the policy of this Government, and I am not questioning at this moment whether it is the proper policy or not; but it has been the policy of the Government for over 10 years in the only two large cases that have been proposed.

Mr. TUCKER. Were those floods in navigable rivers?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; in both cases; and I have seen both of them, because I have been in the Sacramento Valley also.

The situation that confronts the American Congress, as I think, can fairly be taken from the address of the distinguished chairman——

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask if the Sacramento flood, to which the gentleman alludes, involved one State or two or more States?

Mr. FREAR. One State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then interstate commerce was not affected?

Mr. FEAR. No; it does not affect that.

The question is as to the saving of life and the saving of property. It is the one issue——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman let me make a connected statement?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I asked the gentleman to yield—I am entitled to some respect.

Mr. FREAR. I object to yielding now. There is no distinction, as I said, in the arguments that have been made here between interstate streams and State waters. Many of these projects that are now knocking at the door of this committee and of the Interstate Commerce Committee—many of them do not carry interstate commerce; but the seriousness of the situation is that the Mississippi River practically contains every proposition coming before us to-day. Are you going to decide that in all these cases you will not exact any contribution? That is for Congress to decide. If you do that——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not now. We were very generous to the chairman of the committee because he was talking on the sympathetic side. I want to talk about the legal side. I can not understand a single reason to be advanced why the Wabash River, the Sacramento, the Arkansas River, the Red River, and other rivers can not come to us and say, What are you going to do for us, and why should we not be treated just the same way?

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not now. If you are going to take that position, I say to you that you do not know where the end will be in omnibus bills that will come here for charges against the United States Treasury.

Now, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 17 you will find that I introduced the opinion of as wise and experienced a body of engineers as were ever engaged in flood-control work, officials representing the Government. I am quoting from the Mississippi River Commission, which you will find on page 81 of the document before us. I read:

[From Report of the Mississippi River Commission on Contribution]

(P. 81, Committee Doc. No. 1, 70th Cong.)

The commission is firmly of the opinion that some degree of local financial cooperation is essential to a successful accomplishment of a flood-control project. This opinion is based not on a belief that local interests should share in the cost by reason of their being beneficiaries, but on the belief that without a local sharing in the cost the commission, as an agent of the Federal Government disbursing Federal funds, will be confronted by inordinate demands for flood-control works of large cost which will, if granted free of cost, be demanded for the protection of areas insignificant in size and value, merely because the owner would need to underwrite no part of the cost. Even with a local contribution of one-third, as is now required, the commission has been importuned to levee areas unworthy of the cost of such protection. The commission has been able in the past to apply Federal funds according to its best judgment by its adoption of and adherence to a policy requiring that applicants for Federal aid prove the worthiness of their levee projects. This has been possible because the only cases presented would, if approved, entail liability on the applicants for the costs of rights of way and one-third the costs of construction. With no restriction on demands the commission foresees a multitude of projects of little or no merit which it should deny in the interest of the public whose funds it will handle, but which, lacking authority to call for an outlay of funds by the applicants, it would find difficult or impossible to deny.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FREAR. Not until I finish my remarks. If the gentleman will give me a chance to finish my argument, I will yield. I will say this, the gentleman would not ordinarily interrupt me. I never did it to anyone else in this manner. I want to make my statement, and then I will answer the gentleman's question.

The report of the Mississippi River Commission continues:

The commission would view with deep concern the adoption of a Federal flood-control project that would absolve local interests from participation in costs in levee maintenance. It believes that part of the cost thereof should be borne by the local beneficiaries. On the other hand, it believes that the Federal Government should pay part of the maintenance costs and should reserve full control of such work. The Federal Government alone is equipped with vessels and plant to meet emergencies and should stand ready to perform that function.

The commission believes that protection of lands of small value, except for timber and basins of small area, will be discouraged by a requirement for local participation in cost, as outlined in paragraph 356.

The commission is aware that its operations in the past have been at times hampered through the failure of some levee districts to furnish assurance of their share of the funds needed for levee work, thus adversely affecting the prosecution of the work, but believes that the advantages derived from local participation in costs would more than compensate for such disadvantages.

Of this commission it has been suggested that Colonel West made a statement to the effect that it was difficult in some cases. He lives at Greenville, which is in the center of the flood district. I do not blame him for feeling that way, but he agreed on this subject of contribution to the report I have read.

Now, I want briefly to answer some questions that have been put whether or not a part of this work can be carried on without the entire work being started at once. We have an amendment to offer in which the Government shall offer to any State, provided you determine it has any State agency, to accept money from the Federal Government and repay it as they do for any other purpose—sufficient in amount to meet their share of the contribution for flood ways or whatever it may be.

Beyond that we have a provision we desire to offer providing that the Secretary of War may take any place required in the general plan——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will not until I am through.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Then the gentleman intends to yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; publicly and privately I will yield to the gentleman and we will have a private talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. I only wanted information.

Mr. FREAR. I am giving it to the gentleman, but he does not listen. [Laughter.] Here is a letter from the ablest man we have had before our committee, the ablest engineer, a man the Government is relying on in the next bill to follow this. A man that has expended a billion and a half dollars. That is to say, he represents the Government in these expenditures. This is a letter from General Jadwin, and I think you are entitled to it, and without any criticism of the man. I believe last year he was the president of the American Board of Civil Engineers, the highest position that can be attained by any man in that profession. Anyone who knows him is familiar with his ability. I said to him that what disturbed me and what I wanted him to settle in my mind was in case of failure on the part of any particular district to comply and no money is advanced what the situation would be so far as this whole project of the Mississippi River is concerned. Here is a letter of April 12, and I will read you a portion of it. The whole letter can be found in the RECORD of April 17, 1928, at pages 6661–6662.

If there should be delay in effecting the necessary adjustments for the proposed Birds Point-New Madrid flood way, minor modifications can be made as indicated below so that only that section of Missouri immediately behind that flood way will be left unprotected against the superflood. The riverside levee from Birds Point to New Madrid is now lower in elevation than the levee around the city of Cairo. Excess water will go over that levee and relieve the situation at Cairo as it did in the 1927 flood at Dorena crevasse. The levee grade now is above the flow line of a flood equal to that of 1927, and even the lands back of the levee are protected except for a superflood exceeding that of 1927. A break in this section overflows a relatively small section of the St. Francis Basin east of the Sykeston Ridge. A small amount of levee work on the Sykeston Ridge will protect the lower St. Francis Basin from any accident due to the delay in constructing the flood way. Above Birds Point the levee can be raised up to Cape Girardeau and thus protect the northern part of the St. Francis Basin against a superflood. This area did not get wet in 1927. As a matter of fact, this entire section is not hard up on account of the 1927 flood, since there was no failure in southeast Missouri except that at Dorena. The water from this crevasse did get over the Sykeston Ridge in limited amounts. However, that contingency can be corrected as indicated at small cost.

The backwater or natural river-bed country on the Tennessee side has always been subject to the vicissitudes of the Mississippi River, and always will be, unless the channel is narrowed beyond safety, and narrow strips of land are reclaimed at unreasonable and uneconomic costs. The Reelfoot territory, the only land now protected on the east side of the river in this general latitude, is to be given additional protection under the project proposed because it is already behind a levee. This additional protection is to cost the United States about $25 per acre protected. You can see that, if merely enlarging existing levees will cost this much, building new levees would cost a great deal more.

The entire letter covers every part of the Mississippi Valley.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REID] spoke particularly about the difference between the Mississippi River Commission plan and the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, in regard to the situation at Cairo. When I first went into committee I said that we had to protect Cairo and that we had to protect the city of New Orleans, and I say that to-day. That is the first thing that we must do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. I shall take five minutes more. The Mississippi River Commission proposed to build a levee 66 feet high at Cairo and leave Cairo in that dangerous position. That is, the Mississippi River Commission now in charge. I think it would be most dangerous and unfair to put the people of that city in that jeopardy. General Jadwin proposes, in the New Madrid district, to run this water off so that it does not increase the height at flood time on the levees at Cairo to over 56.6 feet. There is a difference of 10 feet between 66 feet and 56 feet. That is a difference in principle. The Chief of Engineers is trying to protect that city and trying to keep them from danger of flood, which might be brought about by the Mississippi River Commission plan.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FREAR. No; I am not through yet. I have something interesting to the House, if it is not to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield. He has the floor.

Mr. FREAR. I take up now the Boeuf flood way. General Jadwin proceeded there in the same way. Next there is the Atchafalaya, and you will find that in the RECORD of April 17, 1928, at page 6662. In this case he makes provision, as he does in every case, and he said that there is no danger but that can be taken care of by them. In addition to that, if they can not raise the money, if you have a district down the valley that can not raise the money, we propose to take care of it rather than break up the plan. I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in fairness what proportion you want to require of these local communities? I am seeking light. The chairman says that 100 per cent is to be paid by the Government. What does the gentleman say the local communities ought to contribute?

Mr. FREAR. The suggestion is made in the Jadwin report of 20 per cent.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. FREAR. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is one-third in the case of flood ways, and I am willing to support any of them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of the flood ways only.

Mr. FREAR. I am willing to support any one of those—anything to establish the doctrine of local contribution and to make it effective, because of the situation that we can see that is going to confront not only us but the American Congress in the future because of the demands that will be made in behalf of every tributary.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. You are asking that these Southern States contribute, say, 20 per cent. Has the National Government asked the city of Cleveland, in my State, to contribute anything toward preparing harbor jetties, or have they done anything of that kind at New York?

Mr. FREAR. No; because that is for the general commerce of the United States.

Mr. MURPHY. And this is for the general welfare of the United States.

Mr. FREAR. In California they are asked to contribute one-third for the State and one-third for the people. If you say nothing is to be paid locally, an unlimited demand will come upon you.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has advocated local contributions where, as I understand it, the community is actually able to contribute.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman determined in his own mind or has he proposed any method or instrumentality by which he could determine that question?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. The Secretary of War or the Board of Engineers will make that examination.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On what basis? By valuation of real estate? What would be the basis?

Mr. FREAR. I would not care to go into that. For 10 years we have been providing that they should do it. Without question we have been providing that and are providing it in other States. You can offer an amendment in any way you choose to provide the exact machinery.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman's suggestion was to leave the method of ascertaining the local responsibility to Executive action?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. As Chairman REID said a few moments ago, the Mississippi River Commission did invest the money in case of emergency. Of course they did; and they did right, although in doing so they technically violated the law.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LUCE. I have prepared a little statement which might be of interest and value, being pertinent to the subject the gentleman has been discussing. With the gentleman's permission I would like to insert it at this point.

Mr. FREAR. Very well.

Mr. LUCE. In the matter of costs perhaps the pending proposal and possible substitutes can be better understood if we try to think in and emphasize terms of acres rather than terms of millions of dollars.

The report of the Chief of Engineers gives $224 an acre as the value of the property in the region subject to overflow—omitting the city of New Orleans.

The local expenditure for its protection has been $24.93 an acre.

The Federal Government expenditure has been $5.92 an acre.

Of late years two-thirds of the expenditure has been borne by the Federal Government, one-third by local interests. Were this basis continued, the pending proposal would mean $18.05 an acre of contribution by the Federal Government; $9.60 by local interests.

The Chief of Engineers recommends that four-fifths should be borne by the Federal Government, which would be $21.66 an acre; and one-fifth by local interests, or $5.42 an acre.

The pending bill proposes that all be borne by the Federal Government, $27.08 an acre.

Were the advice of the Chief of Engineers to be considered, the question would seem to be whether property now worth $224 an acre would with adequate protection be worth at least $229.42 an acre, being the present value plus the local contribution. If so, then there would be no local burden in case term of payment were adjusted to the situation. The increment would balance the outlay. If the increment were more than $5.42 an acre, a little in excess of 4 per cent, then the property owners of the region would by so much gain at the expense of the country as a whole.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman made the statement that the problem before us is taking care of the flood waters of 31 States, quite a different problem from that of the State of California in that it involves only one river.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is taking my time. The Red River, the Arkansas River, and every other river is subject to the same argument that the gentleman is making. They are all interested, just as is the Mississippi Valley. The gentleman has been listening to these discussions for five months, and he ought to be familiar with the facts.

Mr. MURPHY. Does the gentleman ask the State of New York to take care of the harbor in New York?

Mr. FREAR. No. The gentleman should understand the distinction.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not understand the distinction when 31 States are throwing their water down into the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3740) for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes, reported that that committee had come to no resolution thereon.

LAW LIBRARY OF THE LATE ELBRIDGE T. GERRY

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3640 and put it upon its immediate passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3640) authorizing acceptance from PETER G. GERRY of the gift of the law library of the late Elbridge T. Gerry

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chief Justice of the United States is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States, for the use of the Supreme Court, the gift of PETER G. GERRY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, of the law library bequeathed to him by his father, the late Elbridge T. Gerry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDRESSES BY HON. MARY T. NORTON

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including the address delivered by the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] on April 18, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. MARY T. NORTON, a Representative in Congress from the State of New Jersey, at the Daughters of the American Revolution Convention, Washington, D. C., April 18, 1928:

WOMAN'S PATRIOTIC PRIVILEGE

It is a privilege and a pleasure to come here to-night to address this very representative American audience and to greet your distinguished president general, Mrs. Brosseau, and the delegates gathered here in the interest of the welfare of our beloved America.

Your organization, more than any other, perhaps, is expected to lead in those things that have been in the past and shall continue to be in the future the broad-minded policies of a free people. So it is with a very secure feeling of understanding and cooperation that I address myself to the subject thrat has been assigned to me, "Woman's patriotic privilege."

The title brings me back many years, to my youth, when our progressive farseeing sisters started on a very discouraging crusade to establish patriotic privileges for women; and the thought has come to me that, perhaps, it would be well for me to-night to ask whether or not we have availed ourselves of those privileges, as well as to present to you some reasons why we should do so.

To the first question, I would say that according to statistics we have completely failed in recognizing our privilege and availing ourselves of the means whereby we could make a real worth-while contribution to good government. It was hoped that giving the vote to women would arouse a more general interest in the obligations of election day. For the last two presidential elections the average has been less than 50 per cent. There is no way to divide the total vote cast by men and women; but of the 27,000,000 votes cast it was estimated that only 37 per cent represented the vote of women in 1920, the first election after the adoption of the suffrage amendment.

The senatorial vote of 1922 revealed some astonishing facts. In not a few of the States the vote cast for senatorial candidates was less than 50 per cent of the total vote. In not a single case did the successful candidate secure anywhere near a majority of the total vote; in other words, they were elected by the minority.

In the presidential election of 1924 a great effort was made to get out a larger participation on election day, and prominent patriotic organizations and individuals attempted to get the people to the polls. When the vote was counted it was found that it showed little improvement over the results of 1920, 51 per cent of the voting strength of this country discharging the obligations of citizenship.

When we hear of corruption in politics, what has been our reaction? If the corruption touches us, we naturally recoil from it and are horrified that such conditions do exist. If it does not touch us, we decide that it is none of our business and forget about it if the newspapers permit us to do so.

Do we ever think that part of the condition is our own responsibility? Rarely. And yet this is true, for we have been given a weapon to fight with that is greater, if correctly used, than all the arguments ever spoken or written to purify politics. Our country is just as good, or just as bad, as its citizens; and unless we all take a proper and sincere interest in government, and use that sacred weapon, the ballot, we have no right to criticize or complain of the very worst government. Do you realize the great moral strength that can be secured to government through the proper use of the ballot? Must it come through a great calamity, that all the women of the country shall use the ballot?

If you thought that to-morrow your country would again find itself in a position of defending its honor, and your sons were called to that defense, would you still stand aside and allow a minority to assume the responsibility? I think not.

When the unthinking women of the country are clamoring for peace, and are led along by propagandists reared in the school of sovietism—to believe that peace can be secured only through destroying the great American Army and Navy, and this sinister influence is reaching out to destroy those who would uphold the sacred traditions of our country—would you, then, use your patriotic privilege? I think you would. Why wait, however, until the necessity arises? We have in our country the finest types of womanhood to be found anywhere in the world, and their influence at elections would be tremendous if only they could be brought to realize their importance and organize their full strength.

We hear pacifists all around us, imploring us not to add sufficient strength to our Navy to give us even a fighting chance to save our honor if we were called upon to defend it. Unthinking, well-meaning people who do not realize the dangerous element at work to undermine the foundation of our country.

We want peace; we long for peace; but the peace that is worth having is worth being prepared at all times to defend.

When a doctor is called to a patient, if he knows his business, he isn't satisfied with merely prescribing for the ailment; he takes precautions against the possibility of a more serious ailment, and his dose of prevention is always worth a pound of cure.

This, then, in a greater sense, seems to me the position we are in regarding peace.

We are not preparing for war because we intend to keep our Navy in good condition. We are merely taking precautions against any condition developing that would lead us into war.

I voted, very recently, to add 15 cruisers and 1 airplane carrier to strengthen our Navy, and I say to you to-night that I did so hating war with all my soul; with the never-fading picture before my eyes of millions of boys stricken in their young manhood, when life held the greatest promise; with the recollection of days and nights of great sorrow, when orders came to the camps to prepare to go forward. We were unprepared then, but it did not keep us out of war.

You have heard what took place at the Geneva conference. You know that it is true we were the only nation to live up to the 5–5–3 agreement, and in view of all this do you believe the pacifists who are preaching the philosophy of unpreparedness?

Last year I spoke before you at the Conference on National Defense and urged you to bring all the influence at your command in order to pass an appropriation bill to secure the building of three cruisers to add to our national defense. You did so.

To-night I am here to urge you, as a patriotic privilege and duty, to again do your part to have the Navy program bill, which has already passed the House, acted upon favorably in the Senate, that it may be signed by the President and become a law, not to promote war but to safeguard peace.

We must be prepared to serve notice on all the nations of the world that we want peace so much that we stand ready at all times to defend it.

I am a member of the Veterans' Committee, where the aftermath of war is constantly before me, where never, for even a day, can I forget the suffering of those human derelicts who, a few short years ago, had reason to feel that life held every promise of joy and happiness; and yet with a heart full of sorrow for their great suffering I say to you that we must have no quibbling with well-meaning, but poorly informed, pacifists, who, if their theories were permitted to govern the actions of those responsible for our country's safety, would lead us not away from but into war.

Perhaps I have wandered slightly from my subject, and yet it is interwoven with all that I have said to you to-night, for through your patriotic privilege you can do much to bring about all of the things for which your organization stands and prevent many of the errors entered into through mistaken impulses and, more often, false propaganda.

It is a matter of regret that our country, to-day, to a great extent, is controlled by propaganda, good and bad, but more often bad. In many instances hate is taking the place of love; racial and religious controversies are brought into the most innocent gatherings, and without realizing the insidious propaganda responsible for the intrusion of subjects that should be sacred to us, as individuals, we permit our passions to rise and forget the teachings of the Master, who came on earth to preach peace and good will to all.

It, therefore, behooves us, as patriotic women, to inform ourselves of all that concerns the well-being of our country, and realizing our responsibility, avail ourselves of that sacred and patriotic privilege which came to us through the hardship and labor of those courageous women of this and a past generation who, realizing that the time would come in the life of our beloved America when its women would be needed, bequeathed to us a priceless gift to use intelligently and with which to defend the policies of a country whose flag typifies all that is purest and best and whose Constitution brought freedom and happiness to the people of all races and religions, who came to our shores from every country in the world.

If I have succeeded to-night in arousing in you your responsibility as a patriotic American; if the teachings of your organization mean all that they should mean to you individually; if the presence of the Unknown Soldier in our beautiful cemetery at Arlington stirs your imagination and brings to your mind that never-to-be-forgotten spring day when hundreds of thousands of the best America had to offer crossed the ocean to answer the call and dedicated their young manhood to the cause of justice and patriotism, then may I beg you organize and bring to the elections next November your full strength in votes, thereby proving, not only to our own people at home but to our sisters abroad, that woman's patriotic privilege is appreciated and that the women of America will answer the call for honesty in government and keep the Stars and Stripes flying in all its strength and purity.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, to print a speech made by the same Representative.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by Hon. MARY T. NORTON, a Representative in Congress from the State of New Jersey, over the radio, April 17, 1928, in the "Voters' service" program broadcast from station WRC, Washington, D. C.:

ISSUES BEFORE THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN 1928

Visioning my great American audience, it is a privilege to address you, and may I hope that my message to you to-night will awaken the conscience of those men and women who constitute the silent voters of the country. A minority that could bring about any reform in our Government.

I have been asked to discuss the issues before the Democratic Party in 1928.

It is a big subject to dispose of in this short time. Therefore, of necessity, I may touch only the high spots as I see them.

The most important issue is whether or not this country shall continue as a democracy or return to federalism? Shall the political philosophy of Hamilton prevail, as evidenced by the constantly increasing bureau control over the States, or shall we reassert our independence and continue the government philosophy of Jefferson? Whether or not paid propagandists are to dominate this country? Any unbiased person who has carefully followed the trend of government during the past seven years must realize that big business and all that it typifies is in the saddle, driving those who are supposed to run the machinery of government whichever way it wills. Efficiency has taken the place of humanity, and God help those who are caught in the wheels of this grinding machinery.

When one thinks of the "Main Street" attitude of our people in many parts of the country, quarreling about nonessentials, when perhaps the very life of the Republic is threatened from within and without, one can not help wondering just what sinister forces are at work to bring about so strange a condition. When it has been demonstrated so conclusively that the Republican administration has permitted a segment of big business, which seeks and receives special favors from the hands of this administration, to frame and carry through the policies of government, even to stealing the properties which belong to and were owned by the Government, it would seem to any thoughtful citizen that the time had come for us to think of the real important issues before us and place in correct position those controversial questions which have no real bearing on the country and should be relegated to their proper place.

Never since Jackson's time has our country been so greatly in need of spiritual rehabilitation. Never since have the forces of public greed and corruption been so demonstrated, and yet there are men and women listening-in to-night so little interested in the welfare of their country that they will not cast a ballot even to save its honor.

They call themselves Americans; yet what part have they played in upholding the integrity of America? "Stay-at-homes," who are too indifferent to avail themselves of the God-given privilege of the ballot to keep their country safe and secure from those who would destroy it.

What kind of Americans are we to permit corrupt business to dominate the policies of the country, to dictate terms to a free people?

Do we want efficiency at the expense of humanity? Do we desire the survival of the few or the happiness of the great American family? Must the dollar mark transcend every inspiration in the heart of America?

I do not think so. Whenever this country has been threatened by exploiters there has always come a rebuke from the thinking people of our land. Those who have revered the traditions of this great country, slow to anger but mighty in action when those traditions are threatened.

A great army of peaceful people, carrying high a banner typifying those things for which our forefathers gave their blood—democracy in its broadest sense, freedom of conscience, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, the greatest good to the greatest number.

These are some of the issues before the people to-day, and their solution will be found in the election of a Democratic President, who will have the courage, honesty, ability, humanity, and determination to carry through the wishes of the masses as against the privileged few who are dominating our country and undermining its foundation.

When we elect a man who will consider the prosperity of the farmer as important as the prosperity of the banker; when the just claims of the great army of Government employees shall be given full consideration and they receive a living wage for their contribution to government; when the claims of the war veterans, who a few short years ago responded with their young manhood to the call to arms to make America safe shall have been generously considered; when we consider charity at home as important as charity abroad, and the flood sufferers in the South have been as fairly dealt with as the bankers of the country—then, and not until then, shall we have established humanity in government and destroyed the spectre of sovietism, which from time to time rears its ugly head.

Ours is conceded to be the greatest country in the world and it is our big task to keep it great. We have all the necessary implements to continue its greatness, but shall we use these implements?

Shall we permit a minority to do our thinking and stand in the middle of the road, or, with conscious individual power, stand together on the side of the road and issue our ultimatum for honesty in government, destruction of bureaucracies, return to State rights, a sound international policy; Army, Navy, and aviation forces that will maintain the respect of all nations and keep peace in our own; a Government concerned in the happiness and well-being of the great American people, who have come to our shores from the nations of the world seeking happiness and freedom in the land of prosperity?

These are our issues, and if you agree with me that the time has come to restore political liberties which have been destroyed through economic opportunities offered to the favored few; if you believe in the distribution of wealth among many rather than the special privileged class; a government to protect the weak; a tariff that will apply to the needs of the farmer in the same proportion that it applied to the industrialist; a return to the good old-fashioned theory of State rights instead of taking orders issued in bureaus at Washington—then I ask you to vote your full strength at the election in November and bring back to power in the Nation the party of Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson; that party who, during the most trying period of our country in the conduct of a great war, emerged without one stain of dishonor.

Contrast those eight years of Democratic rule with the eight years since, under Republican dishonesty and corruption, and your answer will be the election of a Democratic President next November.

FARMERS' CONDITION AND SURPLUS-CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am inserting herewith speech delivered by me over radio WTFF, Washington, D. C., on the evening of April 18, 1928:

The speech is as follows:

In the beginning of agriculture and on down through the ages the farmer's chosen aim was to provide the necessities of his household. He has been the outstanding example of self-dependence. While farmers have not abandoned the primary object of providing for his own family, he has branched out into the fortunes of business. He is now being called upon to clothe and feed the world. He is both proprietor and wage earner. Farmers producing the staple agricultural commodities deal almost exclusively as an individual both in buying and selling; therefore he is attempting to perform a variety of functions such as now obtained in almost no other trade. It is too much to expect a farmer to be an efficient producer as well as an expert salesman. He is supposed to be a judge of market conditions as well as an astute financier. He is to-day the only individual in business that absolutely has no control as to the price he must pay for what he buys or as to what price he shall receive for what he sells.

The farmer's business, while no fault of his, is the biggest gamble in the world. He is dependent upon weather conditions in getting his crops properly started. When his crop is in the most promising condition a wet or dry season may come along and completely destroy it. Or it may be destroyed by pest. If for any of these reasons he makes a short crop, although the price may be fair, he is short of the product. Should God Almighty send forth rain and sunshine ideal for a good harvest and withhold the ravages of the boll weevil, pink bollworm, corn borer, and other crop pests, thereby blessing him with a bountiful yield, the speculator steps in and fixes the price very often below the cost of production. Therefore while he is blessed with a wonderful crop which should prove to be a blessing, it more often proves to be a curse.

There is a class of opponents to farm-relief legislation who know just about as much about agriculture and what farmers have to contend with as a jack rabbit knows about Sunday. They say, "Let the farmers adjust their production so as to meet the actual demand."

The quantity and quality of production on the part of the producer is a gamble. He can cut his acreage, and if blessed with proper seasons and not bothered with crop pests he can produce a surplus. On the other hand, he may increase his acreage, but because of these unforeseen things over which the farmer has no control, his yield may be far below his average production. It is the philosophy of the farmer when prices are low that to be able to pay his obligations and carry on he must increase his acreage, hoping to increase his yield, so as to be able with a low price to bring in the total number of dollars because of the quantity of his production to meet his obligations. Those who do not understand this viewpoint on the part of the farmer will tell you that just the reverse will happen; that is, stimulate the price for that which he produces and the acreage will be so increased that it will bring about an overproduction. It is quite the reverse with every other line of business. Manufacturers can visualize a prosperous season in the future, and therefore take on extra labor, run their machinery full time not only in the day but at night, thereby increasing the output so as to be ready to reap the rich harvest. On the other hand, if they see changed conditions, prospects that look blue, perhaps orders already taken for their merchandise for future shipment are being canceled, they can cut down on their labor, put their plant on part time, and curtail production.

The farmer is the only man in business to-day that can't tell you from one day to the next what his merchandise is worth. Not that he does not know the cost of producing but because, as stated a few minutes ago, he hasn't the marketing machinery, finances, or any way to control distribution or the orderly marketing of his products. He is forced to buy from those who are highly protected under special legislation or from thoroughly organized combinations who are able to monopolize and fix the price. In the meantime, the farmer is forced to sell for prices based on a world's market and through a marketing system owned and operated by millions of middle men and speculators who gamble on the farmer's product and fix the price thereon both to the producer and consumer.

When the cotton farmer of the South buys his fertilizer and plants in the spring, cotton may be selling for 20 cents per pound. When he gets ready to sell in the fall, the speculator may have sold enough futures to put the price down to 15 cents. A cotton farmer may go to his market and sell cotton on Monday for 20 cents, and his neighbor may go to market on Tuesday with the same grade of cotton and get only 18 cents, a difference of $10 per bale. The speculator and the Government may put out bear dope as to farmers' intentions to plant, as to crop conditions, weather, and farm pests and depress cotton prices several cents per pound, and one week later put out reports just the reverse and put cotton up 5 cents per pound.

The cost of living to farmers as well as to all other consumers during the 14-year period from 1913 to December, 1927, inclusive, increased on an average of 72 per cent, according to figures made public by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on January 25. Food in the United States as a whole increased during this period 56 per cent, clothing 63 per cent, housing 60 per cent, fuel and lighting 83 per cent, house-furnishing goods 105 per cent, and miscellaneous items 105 per cent.

It is generally understood that for the past seven years farmers have lost ground compared to workers in other lines and have failed to receive an income equivalent in purchasing power to that of the pre-war period. Since 1920 but few farmers have been able to make ends meet. The majority have failed to maintain their position as compared with earlier years and thousands have lost their property.

We are told by the Census Bureau that about 2,000,000 persons annually for the past few years have left the farm.

In 1910 real-estate mortgage indebtedness amounted to $3,320,470,000. In 1920 it had climbed to $7,857,700,000. In 1926 it had reached the enormous figure of $12,000,000,000. Surely these figures ought to convince those who are now proposing legislation to simply lend additional money to farmers. Farmers are not so concerned about additional loans, but fair prices for that which they produce on a basis of that which they buy, so that they might be able to pay their obligations and carry on like other concerns. Direct taxes from farm property averaged $891,000,000 in 1909–1914. In 1920–21 taxes soared from $596,000,000 to $848,000,000, or about a 42 per cent increase, while at the same time the income of the farmers dropped from $16,621,000,000 to $10,313,000,000, a decline of 39 per cent. (In 1923 farm taxes amounted to $624,000,000. In 1924–25 there was a 236 per cent increase.) During the period from 1905 to 1914 farm bankruptcies averaged 14 out of every thousand farms. Nineteen hundred and twenty-four, 1925, and 1926 bankruptcies had increased to 125 out of every thousand. In 1880, 25 per cent of all farms were run by tenants; in 1920, 38 per cent; and in 1925, 60 per cent. From January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1927, we had bank failures numbering about 4,000, with deposits amounting to $1,200,000,000, and three-fourths of these were located in agricultural States.

The Federal Government has been and is spending millions to help control and eradicate farm pests and to increase production. In other words, trying to make two sprigs grow where one used to grow, but after a glorious production, farmers are left as so many individuals, unorganized, to go up against a thoroughly organized and well-financed marketing system, owned by those who buy their products, and a speculative interest to be robbed of his products and his labor. Not only is the producer under the present system being robbed, but because of the millions of parasites operating between the producer and consumer, the consumer is being robbed also.

I am sorry that I haven't the time to enlighten you on prices received by farmers and prices paid by consumers for various farm products, therefore, I shall mention only one product—sweet potatoes—selling in my State, South Carolina, by the producer for 50 cents per bushel, while the consumers in the large cities, for instance, New York, are paying $6 per bushel. It is said by those who oppose the McNary-Haugen farm-relief legislation, "Let the farmers organize and help themselves." This has been tried and tested for the past 50 years, and because of the various types of farmers, their financial condition, as well as many other reasons, they have been unable to organize, therefore I believe with Abraham Lincoln when he said, "That which a people should do for themselves, but could not do, the Federal Government should do it for them."

The world to-day needs every pound and every bushel of farm products, and at a fair price. Therefore it is my contention that if we had the machinery set up under the McNary-Haugen bill properly financed by the Government in the way of a subsidy, which the farmers do not want, or by an equalization fee so as to create the funds for properly organizing and controlling their own products which would bring about orderly marketing, stabilization of prices, that would be fair to the producer as well as the consumer.

Farmers being unorganized have very little voice in their Government compared to other smaller groups like the railroad interests, manufacturing and banking interests, who are not only thoroughly organized financially but politically, and are therefore able to control the administration now in power. In other words, because of the political and financial power on the part of big business and special interests they are not only able to have special legislation passed by the Congress in their interest, but are able to prevent the passage of legislation that would put producers on a basis of equality.

When one who is anxious to represent the great agricultural interests of the country, composed of 30,000,000 helpless citizens under the present system, by trying to legislate for a marketing system, orderly marketing, and the stabilizing of prices so as to guarantee a fair return to the producer he is told that it is economically unsound and unconstitutional.

The Congress, however, in 1920 passed the transportation act increasing the membership of a Federal board known as the Interstate Commerce Commission. While this board is appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, it seems to be almost impossible to get a man appointed thereon unless he is O. K.'d by the railroad interests. This board not only fixes the valuation of all railroad property at a high valuation, including the millions of acres of land given to the railroad interests in the earlier days by the Government, but month by month they absolutely fix freight rates based on this valuation, to be paid by producers and consumers at a figure that will not only pay all expenses, labor, improvements, new equipment, high-priced salaries for officials, but a net income of 6 per cent on their investment. This board absolutely controls the operations of the railroads. If the railroad interest wants to cut out the operating of any line or build new lines or sell bonds, it is passed on by this board. Farmers would be delighted to have a similar board that would take stock of their capital invested in their farms, machinery, etc., counting the cost of operation, taxes, and labor, and then fix prices on their products so as to pay all expenses and give to them a net 6 per cent on their investment. A few years ago when railroads were doing business in competition to each other, without the benefits of this special legislation, they were in just about as bad condition financially as farmers are to-day.

In 1922 a Republican Congress passed what is known as the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill in the interest of the manufacturing interests, not only containing the highest tariff rates ever written in a tariff bill but a provision whereby the President of the United States on the request and by proper showing on the part of the manufacturer can even increase tariff rates, all of which are costing producers and consumers millions of dollars annually in the way of profits to the manufacturer and in indirect tax to the Government.

We are told by the Republican Party that this special legislation is necessary because manufacturers can not compete with foreign markets; yet under the present system farmers are forced not only to pay for this protection given the manufacturers but are forced to sell their products based on a world market in competition with foreign producers. Of course, the party in power has placed in the tariff act certain rates on farm products—for instance, 42 cents on wheat—but even farmers who grow wheat have found out that this is only a joke.

Wouldn't it be just as fair to say to the manufacturer as well as to the railroad interests when they asked for this special legislation the same thing that the opponents for special legislation for agriculture, that "it is unconstitutional and economically unsound. You should help yourselves and not ask for Government assistance."

Farm products in their raw and unmanufactured state are bulky and heavy. You can ship 1 bale of cotton just as cheap as you can 1,000 bales per hundred pounds. A bushel of corn weighing 56 pounds, worth $1, will cost just as much in the way of a freight rate as a suit of clothes that sells for $50 for the same distance shipped. The manufacturer with the tariff is enabled to so increase his domestic price and profit that he is able to dispose of his surplus by dumping same in foreign markets at considerably lower prices than the domestic price.

Under the present system, although wheat growers have been given a 42-cent per bushel tariff rate, they are unable to make it apply; therefore when they ask for legislation to do the very thing that the manufacturer is doing under his tariff legislation he is called a radical.

The same day the President vetoed farm relief legislation he permitted a 50 per cent increase in the tariff rate on steel for the benefit of the Steel Trust of this country.

We passed an immigration law, and I am for it, limiting immigration so as to enable labor to fix prices without competition of cheap foreign labor.

It is said by those who oppose the McNary-Haugen bill that the equalization or stabilization fee contained therein is a tax on farmers' products. Under the bill this fee, say, $2 or $5 per bale of cotton, is to be paid by all cotton farmers into a stabilization fund which is controlled and administered by a Federal board composed of 12 men. Not one penny would go to the Government. If this was a taxing scheme, this money would go into the Federal Treasury like all other tax receipts. On the other hand, for what purpose is it to be used? To be advanced by the board to certain agencies through marketing agreements; to be used by this agency, not the Federal board, to buy up for orderly marketing the surplus when blessed with a surplus, as was the case in 1926. This would enable farmers to hold their own cotton with their own funds, with equal burdens on all cotton farmers, and feed it back into the market in an orderly manner and during short crop years, like the one in 1927, following the large crop of the previous year. Is there anything unfair about this? Mr. Clayton, of Anderson-Clayton Cotton Co., says it can be done and would solve the cotton farmers' problem, but he also says that he is against the farm relief legislation. He is for letting the farmers organize and help themselves.

About the time farmers were ready to sell cotton in the first of the fall in 1926 cotton was selling for 18 cents. Crop prospects were good and everybody happy. About this time a Government crop report was given out estimating a crop of about 15,000,000 bales, and cotton began to decline. Every 15 days these reports were issued, each time increasing their estimate, until a final estimate of about 18,000,000 bales, which carried the price of cotton down to 11 cents for good cotton and as low as 6 cents for low-grade cotton. What happened? Farmers had to sell. Merchants and banks were calling them speculators and buyers of cotton were buying the actual cotton at their own price and selling futures against same, which helped force the price down. During the 12 months that followed mills and speculators in the United States bought 8,000,000 bales and foreign countries bought and exported 11,000,000 bales, making a total of 19,000,000 bales, 1,000,000 more than was produced that year, and 5,000,000 bales more than was bought during the previous year.

After this cotton passed out of the hands of the producers, along came the short crop of 1927, about 12,750,000 bales, and prices advanced to as high as 24 cents first of the fall of 1927. Now, who is paying the tax—the farmers who sold their 1926 cotton at from 6 cents to 12 cents per pound, or those who bought it and sold during the next spring or the first of the fall of 1927 at from 15 cents to 20 cents, a difference of about $50 per bale, or a difference of $250,000,000 out of the pocket of the unprotected producers into the pockets largely of those who opposed farm relief?

In closing I am reminded of the statement of James J. Hill when he stood on the bank of the Red River, which separates Minnesota from North Dakota, and looked across the vast expanse of what was then considered a desert and is now known as the "bread basket" of the world: "Not armies or navies or commerce or diversity of manufacture or anything other than the farm is the anchor which will hold through the storms of time that swoop all else away."

Surely a prosperous agriculture is fundamental to the success of all related business enterprise and to yourself.

SENATE

FRIDAY, April 20, 1928

Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who art more ready to hear than we are to pray, and who hast taught us through Thy divine Son that whatsoever we ask in His name He will do, to the end that the Father may be glorified in the Son, we come to Thee now trusting in this sure word of promise. Not knowing what we should pray for as we ought, we come to Thee thankfully, depending upon the intercession of the spirit who helpeth our infirmities. Be pleased to grant that our great people, whom Thou hast so richly blessed with peace, plenty, and abundant prosperity, may be given by Thy divine providence just those proofs and probations, that fatherly training and discipline, such changes and chances of joy and sorrow as shall best enable them to glorify Thy name and to give Thee praise. Help us to—

Welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough
Each sting that bids not sit nor stand but go.

Give to us a realization of the high calling we have of God to witness to His truth by Christian manhood of plain living and high thinking. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have here a statement concerning the Boulder Dam project which was issued by the American Engineering Council on April 18 of this year. I ask that the clerk may read the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT CONCERNING BOULDER DAM PROJECT ISSUED BY AMERICAN ENGINEERING COUNCIL APRIL 18, 1928

American Engineering Council, representing 43,000 professional engineers, is an organization conducted for the purpose of affording a means through which engineers may express their views concerning national questions of an engineering character. National problems such as flood control, utilization of natural resources, and the like, come within its purview of activity.

Consequently council has given careful consideration to the Boulder Dam project which has been under consideration by the Congress. In keeping with its usual practice, the council appointed a special committee composed of most eminent engineers experienced in such matters to review all data and information available relating to the Boulder Dam project. This committee, after due deliberation, submitted a report to the council which has been approved by the executive committee thereof. The report is as follows:

"Your committee is unanimously agreed that the information set forth in the reports which have been submitted to us is not conclusive as to the engineering feasibility of the plan outlined in the Swing-Johnson bill, and that before either the Government or private capital would be justified on engineering or economic grounds in committing themselves to the expenditure involved, the development of the river for the purpose in view should be further and most thoroughly investigated to determine how the results which it seeks to accomplish can be secured with a reasonable assurance of success."

FRANCIS LEE STUART, Chairman.
ALLEN HAZEN.
CLEMENS HERSCHEL.
J. WALDO SMITH.
LEWIS B. STILLWELL.

Mr. ASHURST. Following that which has just been read there are numerous data regarding the training and experience of the members of the committee. I ask that that be included in the RECORD without reading.

PROHIBITION

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask to have a poem read. It is not for me to say whether or not the author of the poem uses the language of John Milton, the favorite bard of the Muses, but the poem is written with manifest sincerity and a highly commendable degree of enthusiasm. It relates to the subject of prohibition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PROSTITUTION OF PROHIBITION

By Horace C. Carlisle

Many years the liquor traffic,
Fostered by inebriates,
And the licensed liquor dealers,
Throughout these United States,
Spread, commensurate with progress,
Unmolested, near and far,
Until every town and hamlet
In the country had its bar.

Soon the Woman's Temperance Union
And the great Good Templar's Lodge
Set to work to solve the question
That the church preferred to dodge—
For her influential members,
Many of them, seemed to think
That the church should never question
Any member's right to drink.

For full many an anxious decade
Temperance workers pled their cause
With such fervency and favor
That it changed the liquor laws—
And some States then substituted
For this agency of dread,
In the population centers,
The dispensary instead.

But this, too, was fraught with evils,
Just as many, if not more,
For the drunkards kept on drinking
More, perhaps, than e'er before—
And the profits from the traffic
Opened avenues to graft
Which made justice beg for mercy,
While rum profiteering laughed.

With the deepest of convictions
That the liquor traffic was
Enemy to law and order,
And the noble temperance cause,
The dispensary was ousted,
As a national disgrace,
And—to multiply confusions—
Prohibition tooks its place.

Prohibition drove the liquor
Into hiding everywhere,
And the erstwhile liquor traffic,
Still as death, slept in her lair—
But her sleep soon discontinued,
And she rose to do her worst,
In the name of law enforcement,
To relieve the country's thirst.

Former foes of prohibition
Soon became its bosom friends—
Under prohibition's banner
Graft began to seek its ends—
And those trusted with enforcement
Of the prohibition law
Ofttimes proved the vilest grafters
That corruption ever saw.

Bootleg liquor in abundance,
Everywhere, began to flow
Through more undercover channels
Than the world will ever know,
And the bootleg liquor vendors—
And the grafters in the cause—
Soon became the greatest boosters
Of the prohibition laws.

Temperance is a thing of beauty,
And its practice brings a joy
That polluted prohibition
Seems determined to destroy.
For true temperance, like religion,
Thrives on love, but flees from awe—
Product of divine persuasion—
Not to be enforced by law.

Just one year of real enforcement
Of the untried Volstead Act,
Fair, unbiased, and impartial,
Might reveal the fateful fact,
That the jails would all be crowded
With the Volsteadites that choose—
After preaching "Law enforcement"—
To enjoy, themselves, their booze.

Prohibition's false supporters,
Men of prestige and renown,
Are the ones that have completely
Broken prohibition down—
And, so long as it's intrusted
To these traitors to the cause,
There can never be enforcement
Of the prohibition laws.

But, one year of real enforcement,
Jailing rich and poor alike,
Would make prohibition's traitors
Call a prohibition strike—
And, real temperance still is praying
For a real enforcement, that
Yet will show, in all its folly,
Prohibition, "where we're at."

SEGREGATION OF EMPLOYEES IN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an article appearing in the Pittsburgh Courier of Saturday, April 21, 1928, which I ask that the clerk may read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Courier, Saturday, April 21, 1928]

THE ANNOYING MR. BLEASE

The other day Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover, candidate for presidential nomination on the Republican ticket, abolished segregation of negro clerks in his department. That was a good move calculated to make Mr. Hoover more popular with the million or more negroes in the United States who can cast a ballot without fear of lynching. Now comes the annoying Senator BLEASE, elected to his office by a handful of people in South Carolina (because the bulk of the electorate down there is disfranchised), complaining against this action. The Senator screams out the alarming news that Mr. Hoover's order "forced white girls to use the same accommodations as negro employees" and that this tragic action would "destroy all chance the Secretary may have ever entertained of breaking the 'solid South.'" "If the policy started by Mr. Hoover is kept up," the fiery South Carolinian predicts, "those who have been dreaming a happy thought of a respectable Republican Party in the South might as well wake up."

Ah! the delightful Senator BLEASE. We are beginning to realize now what his mission is in the United States Senate. It is, we are compelled to believe, the upholding of white supremacy and the spread of Jim Crowism. To Senator BLEASE an American must be what is called white before he can be classed as a citizen. Coming from a benighted area where negroes are only a notch removed from serfdom, deprived of all political rights and privileges, and whose sweat coins millions for their exploiters, Mr. BLEASE naturally wishes to extend this sort of thing over the length and breadth of the land. To that end he has labored assiduously since his election. At all times he is ready to annoy every public man who is trying to do the fair and right thing.

While we hold no particular brief for Mr. Hoover as a presidential candidate, we believe that the support he will get for his ending of segregation in his department will far outweigh any opposition engendered by the ranting of Senator BLEASE to arouse home and national Ku-Klux sentiment. When it comes to votes, we think those of the negroes in the more civilized areas of the country will far outnumber the handful in South Carolina and neighboring States who are permitted to vote.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I understand that that newspaper is edited by a "nigger." I have no further comment to make on it, except to say that it carries out just what I said as to the object of this candidate for the Presidency in making the rule that he did in his department the other day. It is clear proof of the fact that Mr. Hoover did it to catch the negro vote and as it is stated he will catch it in that article. I am glad, though, to see that Mr. Hubert Work's State seems not to agree with Mr. Hoover in his negro propaganda.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mr. GREENE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bill and joint resolution:

S. 2948. An act to amend section 6, act of March 4, 1923, as amended, so as to better provide for care and treatment of members of the civilian components of the Army who suffer personal injury in line of duty, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution to grant permission for the erection of a memorial statue of Cardinal Gibbons.

WRITS OF ERROR

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12441) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act in reference to writs of error," approved January 31, 1928, Public, No. 10, Seventieth Congress. Inasmuch as the bill has to do with an emergency I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the bill been unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. It comes from the committee with a unanimous report, after consultation on the part of a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee with a committee of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is in regard to the bill which became a law on January 31, 1928. That act abolished the taking of cases to the Supreme Court of the United States from the courts of appeals by writs of error. It abolished the writ of error, and provided that cases should go up by appeal. That measure had been submitted by the American Bar Association, had been recommended by the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and the House, had passed both bodies, and become a law. However, in providing for the simplification of taking cases up by appeal there was no provision for giving bond or payment of costs or anything of that kind, with the result of simply by filing notice of appeal litigants were able to take all kinds of cases to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court themselves became alarmed at the number of cases that were coming up in this way. So, the bill which I now report, which has passed the House of Representatives, is really presented at the request of the Supreme Court. It merely amends the act which we passed by having section 2 of it read as follows:

SEC. 2. The statutes regulating the right to a writ of error, defining the relief which may be had thereon, and prescribing the mode of exercising that right and of invoking such relief, including the provisions relating to costs, supersedeas, and mandate, shall be applicable to the appeal which the preceding section substitutes for a writ of error.

The bill merely provides a safeguard, Mr. President. I can conceive of no possible objection to it. As I have said, it is an emergency measure, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act in reference to writs of error," approved January 31, 1928, Public, No. 10, Seventieth Congress, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The statutes regulating the right to a writ of error, defining the relief which may be had thereon, and prescribing the mode of exercising that right and of invoking such relief, including the provisions relating to costs, supersedeas, and mandate, shall be applicable to the appeal which the preceding section substitutes for a writ of error."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAN FRANCISCO BAY

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I present a report (No. 826, pt. 2) to accompany the bill (S. 1762) granting consent to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from Rincon Hill to a point near the South Mole of San Antonio Estuary, in the county of Alameda, in said State, heretofore reported by me from that committee with amendments.

Inasmuch as this bill is one of very grave importance to the city of San Francisco and inasmuch as it comes here with the approval of the Commerce Committee authorizing the city to build a bridge across the bay, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for its immediate consideration. If there is any delay or any debate or any opposition I will withdraw the request.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the bill in regular form?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, there is opposition to this project on the part of the Navy Department and the War Department, and I think the bill should have the consideration of the Senate. I should like to look into the matter a little before the bill shall be acted on.

Mr. JOHNSON. If there is objection, of course, I can not proceed with it. The bill has been considered by the committee of which the Senator is a member; the committee unanimously reported it; representatives of the Navy Department were there as were representatives of the War Department, and there has been no objection manifested to it at all. I am rather astonished that objection comes from the particular direction from which it does come this morning, but, inasmuch as it is made, I can not proceed; I grant that.

Mr. ODDIE. The Navy, I understand, is opposed to the bill, and I wish to look into it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from California on a certain well-known bill, but I am heartily in sympathy with him in this matter, and I hope that the bill will pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report filed by the Senator from California to accompany Senate bill 1762 will be printed.

TERMS OF COURT AT BRYSON CITY, N. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, without amendment, House bill 8835, changing the times for holding court in the western district of North Carolina. This is a local matter, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8835) to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to provide for terms of court at Bryson City, N. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. CROIX RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. DALE. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate bill 3793, and I submit a report (No. 844) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is a bridge bill in the usual form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3793) authorizing the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River on the Grantsburg Road, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "navigation," to strike out the word "on" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "at or near," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., of Grantsburg, State of Wisconsin, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Croix River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the Grantsburg Road, near the village of Grantsburg, State of Wisconsin, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Wisconsin, the State of Minnesota, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interest in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Departments of the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the highway department of either of such States shall at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge. For the purpose of such investigation the said St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River near Grantsburg, Wis."

PRODUCTION OF TUNGSTEN

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the sudden cessation of the demand for tungsten at the close of the World War, together with the resumption of importations of this mineral from China after the war, left a large surplus of the commodity in the hands of consumers and in bonded warehouses at the time of the passage of the tariff law of 1922. These factors combined to lower the price of tungsten below a point at which its production was profitable, resulting in an almost complete suspension of production until 1925, when the stocks became low enough to warrant a resumption of production, but then to the extent that only those mines with the lowest production costs could operate.

In 1926 the delivery cost on tungsten from China was further reduced, and this resulted in a loss to the domestic operator on every unit produced. Production was, however, continued in the United States during 1927, with the expectation that the internal difficulties in China would cause a diminution of exports from that country, with a consequent advance in the price level to that of 1925; but the heavy imports continued, causing even greater loss to the American producers. At the present time, unless a higher rate of duty can be imposed, production must practically cease.

For these reasons I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution of the Senator from Nevada.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 203) as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it is hereby, requested, under the provisions of section 315 of the tariff law of 1922, to make forthwith an investigation into the costs of production of tungsten in the United States and China, the principal competing country, and to report its findings to the President of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the resolution may go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over for one day under the rule.

APPOINTING AND REMOVAL POWER OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McLEAN submitted a resolution (S. Res. 204), which, with the accompanying manuscript, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "The appointing and removal power of the President of the United States," by Charles E. Morganston, be printed as a Senate document.

AMENDMENT OF AIR MAIL ACT

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that House bill 8337, Order of Business 864, reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads on April 18, be recommitted to the committee. I may say that that motion has the approval of the chairman of the committee. There have been some developments which require further consideration of the bill by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S ADDRESS BEFORE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION CONVENTION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on April 16, 1928, President Coolidge delivered an address before the Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution. In that address he announced very sound doctrines which should commend themselves to the American people, and particularly to the Senate, in view of the irresistible movement in favor of centralization and the destruction of the States. I commend this magnificent address of the President to the American people and to the Senate, and I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Madame President General, because this society is a patriotic organization formed to perpetuate the principles established by the American Revolution, it is a satisfaction to join in your devotions. The human race through the medium of organized society, no less than the individual, has to learn through experience. The record of that experience is embodied in history. It is a record full of meaning. It is impossible to comprehend the problems of the present without being informed concerning the problems of the past. We have no method by which we can project our progress into the future, unless we understand the principles and the actions which contributed to past success. Without clear comprehension of the direction from which we have come, we can not chart the direction in which we should go. It is for these reasons that it becomes so important constantly to contemplate the ideals of the formative period of our Nation. It was a time when pretense and fiction had to be cast aside, in order that the people might bestow their entire attention upon the essential and the genuine. They came into close contact with the great realities.

We do not grasp the full import of the American Revolution unless we consider it in its double aspect. In the first place, it was a struggle for independence. But the victory which, after long years of sacrifice crowned that effort, gave to the Colonies little more than an opportunity. They soon found that independence of the Crown of England was of small import unless they could establish themselves under a national government of their own. In the second place, therefore, the revolution meant the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The war would have been of little value if the peace had not been used to create a nation.

Prior to this period our institutions had been in the making, public opinion had been shaping. It was then that final decisions were made and the definite form of our fundamental law was declared. From time to time it has been broadened and strengthened, but in its main principles it has not been much changed. The Republic which it created is the Republic under which we live.

No more enticing subject for discussion exists than the success with which our country has been blessed from the Revolutionary period down to the present hour. Our growth from 3,000,000 people, inhabiting 13 detached Colonies lying on the Atlantic seaboard, poor in almost everything save character and spirit, to the flourishing Nation of 118,000,000 people, extending across the continent, possessed of extensive material resources and endowed with all the facilities of science and art, education, and charity is a record known to all the world and very thoroughly appreciated by everyone but ourselves. While we are all vaguely conscious of this development, too many of us do not realize the great advantages which it confers upon all our people in comparison with those enjoyed in any other locality on earth.

We have every reason to be content with the progress we have made, and yet as we look about us and see the ignorance that still exists, the crime that still flourishes, the distress that so often overtakes the deserving, and the disease which still afflicts so many, we can not escape the conclusion that in spite of all our successes we have much more to do to secure a truly enlightened civilization. Society is made up of individuals with all their strength and all of their high possibilities, but still with all their imperfections. The most that could be hoped for is not perfection, but the best that can be made of a people in our present state of development. Measured by that standard, the results are exceedingly satisfactory.

Admitting that there yet remains much to be done, but believing that the progress we have made indicates that we have been taking the right course, we reach the conclusion that it is desirable to understand the principles and policies which have contributed to our success and attempt to continue to keep them in operation. One of the most important institutions which became more firmly established as the result of the Revolution was the old theory of local self-government. The race experience of those who took such a prominent part in the affairs of that day, and the whole body of the people that supported them, had always been prone to identify the cause of liberty very closely with the cause of local self-government.

The Colonies claimed that system as a right recognized by their royal charters and naturally inherent in their right as freemen. They cheerfully admitted the sovereignty of the mother country over them while at the same time asserting the long-established privilege, which was theirs under the constitution of the realm, to pay no taxes except those which were the self-imposed levies of their own legislatures. The essentials of government, and especially control of the purse strings, unless they were to relinquish their freedom, they knew they must keep in their own hands. If it was to be delegated at all, they wished to delegate it only to representatives of their own choosing. It was obvious that the farther away from them the power of government was located, and the less control they had over it, the more danger there was that it would be exercised arbitrarily and despotically. Rather than submit to these dangers they resorted to the war which gave them independence.

What they were contending for was primarily the rights of the individual, the security of life, of liberty, and of property. They wished him to be provided with an assurance of justice near his own home and to be protected from all unreasonable impositions by the hand of authority. They sought to make him free to manage his own affairs, whether they were economic, political, or religious. This was the heaviest responsibility that was ever undertaken by any people in the world. But they knew, as we know, that there is no other foundation on which liberty and equality can rest. The history of the past 150 years has demonstrated that so far our country has been able to discharge this responsibility. At certain times and in certain places we have been neglectful of it, and the power of self-government, instead of being retained by the people, has been exercised by those who were serving their own private interest rather than the public welfare. But the people have always aroused themselves and recaptured the control of their own affairs. Sometimes they have been tempted by specious presentations to believe that in some way they could live off the Government and get something for nothing, without having to make compensation through their labor or their loss of freedom.

It is the righteous duty of society to assist the disproportionately weak and afflicted. That is the meaning of charity. The same duty requires the protection of the individual against crime and wrongdoing. That is the meaning of security. But the average run of the people must be personally responsible for their own affairs and their own success. Under our institutions they can not evade this duty by attempting to shift it upon the Government, for they are themselves the Government. Unless they discharge this obligation themselves, there is no one that can discharge it for them. To attempt any other method is to deny that the principle of freedom, equality, and self-government is sound.

If the American Revolution had one note that was more dominant than another, it was the principle that the people were competent to run their own business and manage their own government. That was the pæan of emancipation that rang high and clear through the whole period. It was an appeal to the people to emerge from their weakness and their servitude and rely on their own strength and courage to conquer for themselves a place of power and freedom. The determination of the individual to stand alone, unaided and independent, required a high degree of character. The colonists had had enough of aristocracy, of monopoly, and of tyranny, so that they were willing to take their chances with ordered liberty.

The question is always before us of whether we are to have the capacity, the courage, and the character to maintain the high ideals which they established. There are always those who are willing to surrender local self-government and turn over their affairs to some national authority in exchange for a payment of money out of the Federal Treasury. Whenever they find that some abuse needs correction in their neighborhood, instead of applying a remedy themselves they seek to have a tribunal sent on from Washington to discharge their duties for them, regardless of the fact that in accepting such supervision they are bartering away their freedom. Such actions are always taken on the assumption that they are a public benefit. Somewhere, Lincoln said something to the effect that tyrants always bestrode the necks of the people upon the plea that it was for their good. He might have added that the people suffered the rule of tyranny in the hope that it would be easier than to rule themselves. We have built our institutions around the rights of the individual. We believe he will be better off if he looks after himself. We believe that the municipality, the State, and the Nation will each be better off if they look after themselves. We do not know of any other theory that harmonizes with our conception of true manhood and true womanhood.

We have long since realized that we have become one nation. But it is a nation founded on the individual States. Their rights ought always to be scrupulously regarded. Unless their actions are such as to violate the Constitution and seriously interfere with the rights of other States, they should be left to solve their own problem in their own way under the pressure of public opinion, rather than have outside authority step in to attempt to solve it for them. If we are going to have local self-government with all of its advantages, we can not escape from some of its limitations. When authority is located afar off, it is necessarily less well informed, less sympathetic, and less responsive to public requirements. When it is close at hand it is more likely to be executed publicly and in the public interest. Having a personal contact, it is more humane and more charitable. On the other hand, rights can not be long preserved unless they are accompanied by a discharge of obligations. State rights can not be used indefinitely to perpetuate national wrongs.

Our country to some extent tends to depart from these ideals. We are especially prone to call on the National Government to take over our burdens, and with them our freedom. Through regulations and commissions we have given the most arbitrary authority over our actions and our property into the hands of a few men. Some of this has been necessary to prevent those who are weak from being overcome by those who are strong. But it is a procedure fraught with considerable danger and should only be adopted as a last resort. There is one field, however, which belongs to the people, upon which they have uniformly insisted that the Federal Government should not trespass. That is the domain of private business. Society requires certain public activities, like highways and drainage, which are used in common and can best be provided by the Government. But in general the country is best served through the competition of private enterprise. If the people are to remain politically free, they must be economically free. Their only hope in that direction is for them to keep their own business in their own hands.

Our theory of society rests on a higher level than communism. We want the people to be the owners of their property in their own right. We recognize that they are all capitalists by nature. We want them to be all capitalists in fact. That result is being approached rapidly. Our system is demonstrating by practice that it works.

The theories which are advanced to entice the people into handling their private affairs over to the Government do not take into account all the facts. The fundamental characteristics of humanity are not going to be changed by substituting Government action for private enterprise. The individual who manages the one, with all his imperfections and his selfishness, will have to be employed to manage the other. The very essence of business is the expectation of a profit on the part of those who conduct it. Government is conducted from an entirely different motive. When business is in private hands it is expected to be run for the benefit of the owners. When the Government steps in, the purchasers, users, and beneficiaries of what the Government undertakes to supply insist that the concern should be conducted for their benefit. It does not eliminate selfishness; it simply transfers it in part from the seller to the purchaser. Under these conditions it ceases to be a real business, becomes lacking in enterprise and initiative, and does not have any motive to provide improved service.

Flowing out of these unavoidable conditions, if the Government gets into business on any large scale, we soon find that the beneficiaries attempt to play a large part in the control. While in theory it is to serve the public, in practice it will be very largely serving private interests. It comes to be regarded as a species of Government favor, and those who are the most adroit get the larger part of it. Men in public life are besought to secure places of employment for some persons in their locality and favorable contracts for others. The situation rapidly develops into a position of intrenched selfishness, where a great body of public employees and large outside interests are in virtual control, with the general public paying a high cost for poor service. With all the care that it is possible to exercise, a situation of this kind becomes entangled in favoritism and is always in great danger of causing corruption and scandal.

If it is desirable to protect the people in their freedom and independence, if it is desirable to avoid the blighting effects of monopoly supported by the money of the taxpayer, if it is desirable to prevent the existence of a privileged class, if it is desirable to shield public officials from the influence of propaganda and the acute pressure of intrenched selfishness, if it is desirable to keep the Government unencumbered and clean, with an eye single to public service, we shall leave the conduct of our private business with the individual, where it belongs, and not undertake to unload it on the Government. We shall constantly remember that society can not take any short cuts. It can not escape from itself. It can not get something for nothing. What it has it must pay for. It can not shift, it can not dodge, it can not avoid meeting its own responsibilities. Any scheme to evade, however specious it may appear, will prove to be only a delusion.

The immediate results of the American Revolution were very great. Their indirect influences have been felt in every region of the world down to the present hour. Fundamentally it was an attempt to give the people unrestrained opportunity to proceed with their own development. It was not a promise of immediate perfection, but the establishment of institutions under which the people with the greatest promise of success might work toward perfection. In spite of every discouragement that has arisen, the general results have demonstrated that the correct theory was adopted. Everyone should know that the way will be long and the task hard, but everyone should know that the general welfare of the people is steadily increasing. Those who are in any way connected with the great events that gave our country its independence and liberty and set it on the way to happiness and success may well cherish such relationship with great pride, and through association one with another help to create a public opinion determined to perpetuate what has been so well begun.

DAVID J. WILLIAMS

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration Senate bill 463, Order of Business 859, for the relief of David J. Williams. If there is any objection, I will not press it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 463) for the relief of David J. Williams, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$24,734.78" and insert "$22,160.78," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of David J. Williams, of Tacoma, Wash., formerly collector of internal revenue for the district of Washington, in the sum of $22,160.78, due the United States on account of loss of public funds stolen from the internal-revenue office at Seattle, Wash., March 16, 1920.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3640) authorizing acceptance from PETER G. GERRY of the gift of the law library of the late Elbridge T. Gerry.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10437) granting double pension in all cases to widows and dependents when an officer or enlisted man of the Navy dies from an injury in line of duty as the result of a submarine accident.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. KETCHAM, and Mr. ASWELL were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BINGHAM—ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, our colleague the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] made a very informing and eloquent address at Hartford, Conn., on April 17, before the Republican State convention held on that date. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford Daily Courant, Wednesday, April 18, 1928]

BINGHAM PRAISES COOLIDGE ADMINISTRATION FOR POLICY TOWARD LATIN AMERICA—HOPES MCLEAN WILL CONSENT TO RUN AGAIN—KEYNOTE SPEAKER AT REPUBLICAN CONVENTION HERE COMMENDS STATE ADMINISTRATION—APPROVES FEDERAL AVIATION PROGRAM—JUNIOR SENATOR CRITICIZES LEGAL DELAY IN BRINGING GUILTY IN OIL CASES TO FULL JUSTICE

The policy of the Coolidge administration toward its Latin-American neighbors, particularly Nicaragua, and its achievements in finance and aviation were extolled as outstanding accomplishments by United States Senator HIRAM BINGHAM in his address as temporary chairman of the Republican State convention which opened in Foot Guard Hall here Tuesday night. He also pointed out that in spite of the law's delay, progress was being made in the oil cases, and the accused have already been punished by loss of their good names. He commended the present State administration and expressed the hope that his present colleague, Senator GEORGE P. MCLEAN, of Simsbury, would continue to give his services to the State and Nation.

Senator BINGHAM said:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the convention, we are gathered to elect delegates to attend the Republican National Convention which is to adopt a national platform and select candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

"It is appropriate that we should consider at this time the record which has been made by the Republican administration during the past four years. That record includes the conduct of our foreign relations and the administration of domestic affairs. It is also appropriate that we should consider certain tendencies in American public life and take thought as to how our treasured American institutions may best be preserved.

THREE TOPICS

"It is hardly necessary for me to point out that it is impossible to treat these subjects adequately in the course of one evening, even though I tried to keep you listening long after you wished to rest. Accordingly, I have selected only a few topics drawn from the large field of those which might properly claim our attention at this time. I shall ask you to consider first the American policy toward our neighbors immediately to the south of us, particularly Nicaragua; second, the achievements of the administration as regards aviation and finance; and third, the present state of representative government.

"During the past few months the administration has been under almost constant fire for its activities in Nicaragua. You are all of you familiar with what has happened. You know that from the time of President Taft's administration down to the early part of President Coolidge's administration we had a few marines in Nicaragua in order to preserve order. Their presence was so efficacious that it was thought best to remove them entirely. Almost immediately upon their removal bitter and violent civil war broke out afresh.

"A very considerable number of American citizens and American business houses appealed to us to protect them. Two or three foreign nations indicated to us their fears for the safety of their own nationals and insisted they would be obliged to protect them unless we afforded them adequate safety. Accordingly some marines were dispatched to Nicaragua, but the trouble continued. President Coolidge then sent as his personal representative Col. Henry L. Stimson, formerly Secretary of War and now Governor General of the Philippine Islands, to promote peace between the two warring factions. The agreement secured by Colonel Stimson is a matter of common knowledge. It resulted in the laying down of arms by the Liberal leader and all of his generals, except General Sandino, who alone chose to continue the fighting in the mountains of northern Nicaragua.

GUARANTEE FAIR ELECTION

"We have agreed with both the Conservative and Liberal Parties in Nicaragua to see to it that a fair election is held this fall and that the voters on each side get the opportunity to deposit their ballots without fear or favor. The administration proposes to carry out its agreement with the two parties in Nicaragua. It is said that some of the Conservatives in the Nicaraguan Congress have tried to block the passage of legislation which might facilitate a fair election, because they fear they will be outvoted by the Liberals.

"In the meantime, General Sandino, discredited by the Liberal Party, has been carrying on guerilla warfare and acting more like a bandit than like a patriotic member of the Liberal Party. He has, however, quite a number of sympathizers in this country and they have accused the Republican administration of attacking Nicaragua because it is small and weak, of engaging in hideous imperialism, and of waging war with a country with which we are at peace.

"Speeches have been made on the floor of both houses of Congress intended to convey the impression that we are engaged in an imperialistic conspiracy to deprive our neighbors to the south of us of their sovereignty for the benefit of American finance and of American big business. The Republican administration has been accused in a way to give great pleasure to our enemies abroad. These speeches have been reported and applauded in the press of some of the largest South American countries. Also some patriotic Americans have been misled by them.

"Consequently, it seems fitting that we should look squarely at the Caribbean problem and see whether the history of our recent dealings with the smaller republics justifies the charge that the Republican administration has been engaged in imperialism and in oppressing the little countries of the Caribbean.

SANTO DOMINGO WORK

"In 1916, we found that due to civil war and revolutions an intolerable situation existed in Santo Domingo. We proceeded to correct it. There was no desire to infringe on the sovereignty or the independence of the Dominican Republic permanently any more than there is any wish at present to infringe permanently on the sovereignty and independence of Nicaragua. In both cases the people of the country involved had been intermittently engaged for a long time in bitter civil warfare. In both cases the rights of our citizens as well as those of foreign countries had been seriously threatened. In both cases we felt that we could neither neglect the rights of foreign citizens, unless we were willing to let foreign countries take forcible means of enforcing their rights. In neither case has the Government of the United States any intention whatever of annexing territory, or of obtaining by force, concessions or other financial advantages for the particular benefit of our own citizens. In both cases it has been part of our purpose to give no European power any excuse for intervention in this hemisphere. We intend to prevent any nation from securing a new foothold on American soil.

"It must be remembered that under well-established international law, governments are entirely within their rights when they choose actively to intervene in support of the contractual claims of their subjects. It has not been our custom to do that, but foreign nations have often exercised this power and there was at one time a growing tendency on the part of European governments more and more to aid diplomatically in the enforcement of the claims of their subjects, as was shown by President Roosevelt's Message to the Senate in February, 1905.

MUST PROTECT CITIZENS

"When the United States is placed in the dilemma of either adhering to its usual attitude of nonintervention in such cases, an attitude which frequently results to the great disadvantage of its citizens in comparison with those of other countries, or on the other hand of actively intervening in order to protect the contracts and concessions of its citizens who are engaged in agriculture, commerce, or transportation in competition with the subjects and citizens of other States, it is necessary to follow a course which will in the first place prevent foreign intervention; in the second place bring peace and prosperity to the small republics in which we are interested, and in the third place protect the right of our citizens to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness without ourselves becoming the insurer of speculative risks which our citizens may have taken with full knowledge of the danger involved in these risks.

"After a careful study of the situation I believe that President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg in handling the Nicaraguan situation have acted in good faith and with skill.

CONDEMNS MUD THROWING

"This is not a matter for partisan politics. This is a matter where the good name and the reputation of the United States are concerned. It ill becomes American citizens to throw mud at their own Government without that full knowledge of the facts which few can have without access to the confidential files of the State Department.

"To form opinions and utter bitter criticisms of our Government's foreign policy on the basis of headlines in the daily papers and interviews with discredited or disgruntled individuals, either of American or foreign birth, does no good to America, lowers our prestige abroad, and makes us ridiculous or worse in the eyes of the world. It accomplishes little else.

"In a message from the Department of State on May 28, 1914, to our minister in Santo Domingo, the then Secretary of State said: 'The United States will use all means in its power to aid in the holding of free and fair elections.'

"A little later the administration sent commissioners to Santo Domingo with a plan for a new government, with a demand that hostilities cease at once, that a president be chosen according to a plan proposed by the United States, or else the United States itself would name a president; that 'the United States would send representatives of its own choosing to observe the proposed election throughout the Republic' and to see that they 'be accorded a courteous welcome' and 'the freest opportunities to observe the circumstances and processes of the election.' That if we were not satisfied that a proper election had been held we would insist upon another election, 'at which the mistakes observed would be corrected,' and that we would then 'feel at liberty to insist that revolutionary movements cease.' Furthermore, this was to take place without argument on the part of the Dominican Republic.

BRYAN'S ORDERS

"Mr. Bryan wrote to the commission which went to Santo Domingo: 'You are instructed to observe and follow out with utmost care the plan which has been presented to you by the Secretary of State. No opportunity for argument should be given to any person or faction. It is desired that you present the plan and see that it is complied with.' The facts in this case make the present actions of President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg in Nicaragua seem mild in comparison.

"There is no justification for the claim that this administration is infected with imperialism or obsessed with an idea of disregarding the sovereignty or independence of Nicaragua. Our marine and naval forces have protected our citizens and their property as well as the citizens and property of other nationals and prevented a heavy sacrifice of life and the destruction of that country by revolution and civil war. A singularly felicitous settlement was made by Colonel Stimson, acting as a personal representative of the President. 'This was done on the assurance' as the President says in his message of December 6, 'that we would cooperate in restoring a state of peace where our rights would be protected by giving our assistance in the conduct of the next presidential election, which occurs in a few months.'

WILL WITHDRAW

"We are acting patiently, but firmly, courageously, and fearlessly in carrying out our tacitly conceded obligations 'as the nearest friend of Nicaragua in her relations with the rest of the world.' Furthermore, it is safe to conclude that what happened in the Dominican Republic will happen in Nicaragua. The maintaining of order will be entrusted to a Nicaraguan national police force and when the right time comes we shall withdraw entirely and probably without the necessity of establishing an American military government such as that which held sway over the Dominican Republic from 1916 to 1924.

"Our intervention in Santo Domingo was on a grand scale. The military government which we set up in 1916 lasted for more than six years. In July, 1924, the American occupation ceased and under the orders of President Coolidge the last American armed forces left the country before September, 1924. Since that time the United States has exercised no control over the Dominican Government except the supervision over financial and customs matters provided for in the convention of 1924. The United States exercises no supervision over the ends to which the money is applied or the way it is expended. As a matter of fact, the public works are progressing in a very satisfactory manner and the money is being expended wisely and efficiently with a minimum of waste and leakage. Under a capable and honest administration, the Dominican Government has had full value for its expenditures. Furthermore, it is no longer unusual in Santo Domingo to hear quiet acknowledgment from intelligent and patriotic Dominicans of the good accomplished by the Americans. The entire country is peaceful and tranquil and the present government appears to have the support of the great majority of the people.

OUTSTANDING EXAMPLE

"There was no compulsion for us to depart from Santo Domingo. No one could have thrown us out physically. As has been said recently by a distinguished writer, it would be 'a windfall for the European journalistic beraters of American imperialism' if they could put on record in their columns one similar act of retreat and abdication by a single European power.

"Meanwhile Santo Domingo had arrived at a moral and political condition which seemed to prophesy its capacity to establish and maintain a government based on the principles of peaceful constitutionalism. When that moment came President Coolidge's administration consummated American evacuation of Santo Domingo. It is safe to say that the same policy will be followed toward Nicaragua to our mutual benefit and to the satisfaction of all the rest of the world, except those who would like to secure an excuse for condemning their country in the conduct of its foreign relations. Nothing which has been done really justifies this criticism. The only justification for the fears expressed by some of our neighbors to the south is that they are able to quote the words of American citizens, particularly a few of Congress and some journalists who presumably know more about the whole situation than those at a distance and who accuse the United States Government of imperialism and of making war on a small, weak country, because it is small and weak.

"As for the charge that President Coolidge has exceeded his constitutional rights and declared war on a friendly country, it does not seem to me that this merits very serious consideration. At the same time the author of a recent Government document engages in a laborious discussion to show that since 1903 Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Coolidge, by employing the armed forces of the United States without authorization of Congress, have undertaken to take away from Congress its war-making power. The author of the document claims that President Wilson acted unwittingly in his armed ventures into Santo Domingo, Haiti, and Mexico.

MATTER OF PRACTICE

"The important question has been raised as to whether the use of armed forces in the manner in which they have been used without express legislative authority constitutes war. I shall not worry you with a legal discussion of the difference between war and the use of armed forces short of war, except to point out, as the matter of common historical knowledge which you will all remember, that it has been an American practice from the earliest days of our country's independence for the Chief Executive to employ the armed forces of the Nation in the protection of American interests abroad. President Jefferson instructed our officers to protect our citizens from violations. President Monroe authorized General Jackson to enter Spanish territory in pursuit of the Seminole Indians. General Jackson actually penetrated the territory of Spain and took possession of the Spanish forts. In 1823 men from our naval vessels landed in Cuba in pursuit of pirates and bandits. In 1832 marines and bluejackets landed on the islands of Sumatra for the purpose of punishing the natives for the plundering of American vessels and the murdering of some members of the crew. In 1840 marines and bluejackets from two of our naval vessels landed on one of the Fiji Islands for the purpose of punishing the natives who had attacked an American surveying party. In 1854 American marines and sailors landed in China and cooperated with a force of British marines against the imperial Chinese forces who had seized American property. Several Americans were killed and wounded. In 1856 another force of American marines was landed in China and stormed the Canton forts. In 1863 an American man-of-war attacked several Japanese vessels that had fired upon an American merchant steamer. In 1864 the Japanese Government closed the straits between Japan and the mainland. Our naval forces joined with those of Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands forcing open the straits. In 1868 our armed forces landed in various places in Japan to protect the interests of American citizens. In 1894 marines and bluejackets landed in Korea to protect American lives and property. In 1900 our marines and troops participated in operations against Tientsin and Peking at the time of the Boxer Rebellion.

"In 1914 our naval forces took Vera Cruz as the result of direct affronts to this Government by General Huerta. These are only a few of the cases in which military forces of the United States have been employed by various Presidents representing various political parties without any express authority from the Congress. In fact, it has been our uniform practice to protect American interests abroad by force if necessary. It would be folly to suppose that the Executive while charged with the responsibility of protecting Americans abroad is without the means of meeting his obligations in this regard.

"There is no question that one of the most important duties resting upon the President of the United States is the affording of protection of American interests in foreign countries. He would be grossly derelict in his duties if he failed to use the armed forces at his command in appropriate cases within reasonable bounds.

PRESIDENT HAS POWER

"I believe that the President has not only the powers conferred on him by the Constitution, but such powers as may be necessary to enable him to carry into execution such duties as are specifically conferred upon him. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is charged with the duty of conducting the foreign relations of the United States and of affording protection to American interests and to American citizens. It seems to me foolish to say that the President while charged with these grave responsibilities, while given the exalted position of Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy can not properly use the forces at his command in the performance of his duty. Of course he must exercise sound judgment and discretion. I believe, however, that you will agree with me that, like his predecessors, in his conduct of our foreign relations, President Coolidge has displayed that degree of sound judgment which persons who have held that exalted position are presumed to possess and exercise.

"The conduct of foreign affairs must always be a matter of difficulty and hardship, involving, as it does, the honor, integrity, and pride of two sovereign nations. Where two nations are as much alike in speech, manners, and customs, as are the United States and Canada there need not be great armies, powerful forts, and magnificent fleets to keep them from bitter animosity, bloodshed, and war, but where two nations are separated by language, customs, and inheritance as are the United States and Nicaragua, or any other one of the score of republics to the south of us, it requires a skillful hand, a cool head, patience and wisdom to conduct negotiations without arousing lasting national hatred.

WIDE RACIAL GULF

"We must recognize that there exists a wide gulf between them and us. Our manners and customs are frequently irritating and unaccountable to them. Our hale and hearty informality, our tendency toward shirt-sleeve diplomacy, finds no quick and ready understanding on their part. Their habits of mind, their mental inheritance, even their fundamental principles of law and justice are different from ours. All this makes it particularly difficult to manage the successful conduct of international relations with them. Many of their citizens are all too ready to believe that the bitter criticisms leveled at the conduct of our foreign relations by antiadministration Senators have such an unquestioned basis of fact as to cause them to have just fears for the future freedom and liberty of their native lands. As a matter of fact, there is not the slightest scintilla of evidence to show that the Government of the United States is engaged in an imperialistic conspiracy to deprive the little countries around the Caribbean of their sovereignty, or to do more than help them out of their difficulties and into a period of peace, prosperity, and progress.

"On the contrary the record of the recent Pan American Conference at Habana, the attitude of nearly all the Latin American governments, and the astonishing change which has just taken place in our relations with Mexico all give us abundant reason to be proud of the way in which our foreign relations have been handled by President Coolidge and Secretary Kellogg.

AMERICA NEVER A BULLY

"We must not fail to study the history of our country and indeed of mankind. Premiers like Lord Aberdeen, Presidents like Woodrow Wilson have been driven into war as a result of their own fear and dread of war. On the other hand, neither Cleveland nor Roosevelt was afraid of war. And neither was forced into war. A firm hand, a well-trained body, invite respect not quarrels. A bully may be led to fight because he has strength and ability. A gentleman never picks a quarrel merely because he is prepared. America never has been a bully and never will be. America never has been a coward and never will be. Cowards and cravens have to fight or surrender. The God-fearing, courageous gentleman commands respect. He offends no one and no one cares to bother him. So much for our foreign relations.

"Now as to aviation. The Republican administration has followed a farsighted policy of stimulating the development of safe and reliable commercial flying and of encouraging the American aircraft industry to stand on its own feet and find markets which will make it self-supporting. This has resulted in unparalleled expansion of aerial transport and of the construction and use of aircraft during the last four years. Especially since the President's aircraft board was appointed and held its sessions and prepared its report there has been a steady and encouraging progress. In the military service a status of doubt and drift has been replaced by a steady development in accordance with a fixed program. A definite scheme of expansion has been laid down which permits both the officers and men of the Army and Navy and the aeronautical industry to look forward for several years in their planning. Programs have been enacted with the object of making adequate provision for the national defense in the air and of taking the fullest advantage of the possibilities of aviation, without running into extravagant expenditure or unreasonable expansion of our military forces.

NAVAL AIR PROGRAM

"The recent history of naval aviation furnishes an example. A bill providing for a definite program lasting over a period of five years was introduced in Congress with the backing of the administration very shortly after the President's aircraft board completed its deliberations. It was enacted into law on June 24, 1926. At the time of the passage of the bill there were in the possession of the naval service a little less than 900 airplanes, of which the majority were war-time planes, and had to be classified as obsolete in varying degrees. The number which could be considered as truly useful in modern military operations was only about 350. During the past two years approximately 600 new airplanes have been delivered to the naval service. Obsolete equipment have been eliminated, as have machines about the safety of which in flight there could be serious question. The total number of airplanes nominally available has not appreciably changed, but the number of useful machines capable of military operations, or well fitted for the training of naval aviators has just about doubled in the period of less than two years since the passage of the naval aviation bill and is now about 700. The Army Air Corps has a similar record. Amazing progress has been made in the naval and military services in two years, and the current appropriation bills provide for its continuance. It can be traced directly to the work done under President Coolidge's direction and to the legislation passed by a Republican Congress.

"The remarkable development of commercial flying in the United States without the subsidies which are a general characteristic of air transport elsewhere in the world had its inception in the bold initiative of the Post Office Department under General New some four years ago in undertaking night flying and regularly scheduled transport operations at night. Subsequent growth during the past two years has been due to the passage of the air commerce act in May, 1926, and of the bill providing for contract air-mail services, both of them receiving administration approval, and the former, like the five-year program measures for the Army and Navy, resulting directly from the recommendations of the President's aircraft board. Furthermore, there has recently been passed as the outcome of recommendations made in the President's last annual message to Congress at the beginning of the present session, an act providing for long-term contracts for the transportation of mail by air to foreign countries on terms sufficiently liberal to insure the entry of American business enterprise into the field of international air transport, especially in the area between the continental United States and the Panama Canal.

AIR ROUTES INCREASE

"Through the efforts of the Post Office Department and with the backing of the Republican administration, both in giving air-mail contracts and in providing navigation facilities in accordance with the terms of the air commerce act, the mileage of the air routes regularly flown on schedule has increased from about 3,000 three years ago to nearly 10,000 now. More than 5,000,000 miles were flown on regularly scheduled services during 1927, and 1,449,364 pounds of mail were carried, together with many tons of express and many passengers. Three years ago there was not a single passenger air line in regular operation in the United States. Now there are a number doing a flourishing business. Starting from one Government-operated route in 1925 and with no direct subsidy of any kind, the total mileage flown on American air routes already exceeds that of any European country, and the rate of increase has been so rapid as to justify confidence that we shall gain a growing lead over the rest of the world in air-transportation activity.

"Progress in the aircraft industry has been no less remarkable than in air transport and in the upbuilding of the aeronautical arms of the military services. Three years ago the industry catered almost exclusively to a military market. So far as numbers of airplanes sold are concerned, the Army and Navy purchases have now become a minor part of the whole, and the number of planes annually built for commercial and private use is being measured in thousands. The largest American builder of standardized aircraft engines now sells more power plants for nonmilitary purposes than to the Army and Navy combined. The total output of planes in 1927 was double what it was in 1926, and that year, in turn, had shown a great increase over any previous period. American factories actually built and sold more than 2,000 airplanes in 1927, and only about one-third of them were for governmental use.

MORE PRIVATE OWNERS

"The Department of Commerce has received powers which enable it to control design and construction in the interests of safety, but they have been wisely and moderately exercised, not to put a check upon progress or to impose upon the manufacturer burdens which would force the price of his product unduly high. The airplane remains within the reach of the private owner. That there are more private owners and small commercial operators of aircraft in the United States than in all the rest of the world combined is due in large part to governmental policy. With the stimulus and with the guidance thus furnished the quality of American aircraft and engines is making itself known throughout the world, especially since the great triumphs of Colonel Lindbergh and other users of American aeronautical equipment during the past year. American machines are being sought in foreign markets, and the export sales of airplanes, engines, and parts during 1927 totaled $1,850,000, an increase of 143 per cent over the figure of two years previous.

"This is a most noteworthy achievement in the realm of one of the newest and most important fields of governmental activity in which the members of the Republican Party may well take pride and satisfaction.

SOUND BUSINESS POLICIES

"As regards other characteristics of the Republican administration of our domestic affairs, we are all proud of the record in economy and tax reduction. The administration has followed sound business policies, endeavoring to avoid all unnecessary expenditure, striving hard to pay off the burden of debt inherited from the World War and at the same time reducing the burdens of the taxpayers. As one listens to the debates in Congress even the most casual observer can not help being impressed with the unsound nature of the appeal made by so many members of the Democratic Party who are ever ready to add items of lavish expenditure and at the same time attempt to reduce the revenue of the Government below the actual cost of providing for its expenses and for the reduction of its debt.

"Every business man since the days of Joseph in Egypt knows that there are fat years and lean years. When fat years come it is the part of wisdom to look ahead and provide for the possible lean years. When our income is larger than we expect it is the part of wisdom to pay off our debts and so reduce the annual burden of interest charges which must be met by taxation.

"The administration of President Coolidge has been extraordinary for its financial wisdom. The President himself has repeatedly braved popular disapproval and the condemnation of large sections of the country because of his unwillingness to open wide the doors of the Treasury to satisfy the demands of all who find that their income is not as large as they think it ought to be and who are sure that the Government is rich enough to furnish them with more money.

COOLIDGE POLICY WISE

"President Coolidge's policy has been marked by profound wisdom and sound common sense. This has been appreciated by the great mass of hard-working Americans, even though received with bitter attacks from those who hold unsound economic views.

"In their efforts to secure additional votes, Members of Congress opposed to the Coolidge policies have been ready to vote hundreds of millions of dollars for popular schemes and at the same time they have been ready to vote to reduce taxation below the safety point. They have been actually ready to plunge us further and deeper into debt at a time when we are still struggling with the enormous burden laid upon us by the Great War. It is the courage and sound business sense of President Coolidge and his friends in Congress which alone have prevented the success of many such schemes.

HIGH TARIFF NECESSARY

"Furthermore, many members of the Democratic Party have repeatedly stressed the necessity for lowering the tariff. They have been joined in this by the enemies of President Coolidge. It is unnecessary to state to this audience that every time the tariff has been lowered it has brought suffering to Connecticut. It has meant the closing down of factories, the increase of unemployment, disaster, and poverty to thousands. Our standards of life are such that we can not compete on an equal basis with the workmen of foreign countries unless the tariff wall is sufficiently high to protect us. Yet no actions of President Coolidge have received more bitter denunciation than in connection with the tariff. Consequently it is fair to say that no action of his has been of greater benefit to the people of Connecticut. As Connecticut Republicans we believe in a pay-as-you-go policy. We believe in an economic administration. We believe in keeping the taxes as low as possible, but not lower than is necessary to meet expenses and reduce the public debt. We believe that a protective tariff is wise and beneficial for all parts of the United States. It is the duty of the Federal Government to protect the people of the United States against aggression of all kinds. For this purpose we maintain an Army and a Navy. For this purpose we maintain a protective tariff.

"Now, let us consider for a few moments a dark side to the picture. It was evident four years ago that there was corruption in high places. Four years ago we had to get rid of several Cabinet officers. I said at that time:

"'We have no desire to shield the guilty. We know that the President of the United States is not the kind of man who will take advantage of technicalities to defeat the ends of justice. We know that he is proceeding by proper constitutional methods to seek out the guilty, to recover for the United States whatever property has been improperly acquired, and to punish the wrongdoers. He has appointed able counsel to represent the cause of the people. He wishes to see justice done. * * *

NO WISH TO PROTECT GUILTY

"'There is no wish or thought on our part to protect the guilty or keep them from punishment or to condone any crimes which have been performed by the servants of our Government. Fortunately we know that we have a man at the head of the Government who has kept the law in spirit and in truth. He has observed the proprieties. Not only has he not done wrong, but he has avoided the appearance of evil. He has shown himself willing to sacrifice his future for the sake of what he believed to be right. * * *

"'The guilty must be punished. That body, be it church, lodge, or political party, which contains in its membership a malefactor is unfortunate. The members of such organizations feel ashamed when they learn that they are harboring traitors. * * *

"'If the Republican Party has put into office any men who have not done right it must assume responsibility for having done so and must make every effort to see that they are removed and the harm that they have done be undone. The President has shown that he appreciates this. He said: "At the revelation of greed making its subtle approaches to public officers, of the prostitution of high place to private profit, we are filled with scorn and with indignation. We have a deep sense of humiliation at such gross betrayal of trust, and we lament the undermining of public confidence in official integrity. * * * We propose to follow the clear, open path of justice. There will be immediate, adequate, unshrinking prosecution, criminal and civil, to punish the guilty and to protect every national interest. In this effort there will be no politics and no partnership.'"

JUSTICE SLOW BUT SURE

"As was to be expected, President Coolidge has done his duty. Distinguished counsel has been appointed; a number of cases have been tried. Procedure in the courts has, it has been true, been irritatingly slow, but the fact remains that the guilty parties are now punished by loss of good name, by loss of public esteem, and by the necessity of residing abroad. We are told that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches. Certainly quite a number of American citizens of great wealth and of prominent position, politically and socially, have been deprived of their good name. Furthermore, before long some of them will be deprived of their liberty. The wheels of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceedingly small. It is very easy to be impatient with the slow actions of the court and I wish with all my heart that our brethren who are devoting their lives to the law as a profession would insist upon the speedy, swift, and impartial administration of justice, instead of using their talents as they so often do to prolong the laws' delays, withhold the hand of jusitce and to bring into discredit that very institution which they of all men should be most anxious to see preserved.

HOPE M'LEAN CONTINUES

"So far as the Republicans of Connecticut are concerned, we have reason to be proud of our record. For nearly a quarter of a century we have chosen to place in positions of great power and authority a distinguished citizen of the town of Simsbury. By his keen sagacity, his native wit, and his sound political wisdom he has rendered yeoman's service not only to his State but to his country. We are all of us proud of his record and we hope for many years to come he will continue to be willing to sacrifice his comfort and his desires for a peaceful life of rural retirement for the sake of Connecticut and of the United States. No one questions that we need the services of GEORGE P. MCLEAN.

"The record of Republican administration in the State during the past four years has been one which has caused us to be greatly envied by the citizens of many other States in the Union, particularly by some of our closest neighbors. This is neither the time nor the place to enlarge upon that record. Suffice it to say that we are all proud of that self-reliant, energetic, devoted citizen who began at the very bottom of the ladder and is now our able, fearless, hard-working governor, John H. Trumbull.

"The truth is that the Republican Party strives to secure clean and honest officials and sound, efficient government.

AGAINST LYNCH LAW

"I hold no brief for those who have committed crimes against the Government and the people of the United States. I desire to see them punished according to the law of the land and in an orderly manner. On the other hand, I do not favor lynch law, or "summary justice," as it is called, just because the crimes are great. Because a man has committed murder there is no reason why we should throw overboard the judicial procedure which we have erected to protect the innocent. Because a man has committed a great crime against the people of the United States is no reason why he should not be tried properly by the appropriate courts instead of being given a popular lynching by the great national grand jury or a subcommittee thereof.

"The wisdom and experience of our fathers has taught us that more harm can be done by throwing open the doors of the grand jury room and permitting every breath of scandal to have the widest possible publicity than by having the grand jury proceedings heard in secret. And yet the great national grand jury, applauded by millions of Americans, carries on its inquisitorial proceedings in public and self-righteously justifies itself by pointing with pride to the corruption and scandal which it has unearthed.

"I have read editorials in certain newspapers which regret the present tendency of the Senate but justify it wholly by the immediate results that have been achieved. They overlook the harm done to American institutions. This is a dangerous state of affairs.

NEED SWIFT JUSTICE

"It has been caused in part by the failure of our courts and bar associations to insist upon the swift and impartial administration of justice. We have permitted pleas of insanity to interfere with the prompt punishment of murderers. We have permitted forms of law designed to guard against the hasty conviction of innocent people to facilitate the escape of the guilty. We have disgusted the people of the United States by the easy way in which we have made it possible for criminals to escape punishment by continuous appeals on technical grounds.

"Consequently the Senate has been a great national grand jury, because the action of our judicial system appears to be neither impartial nor prompt. Such conditions cause the approval of lynch law. The first results of lynch law are usually good. The ultimate effect is bad. It leads to tyranny, cruelty, and loss of rights.

MUST CURB CONGRESS

"The Congress is encroaching on the liberty of the people with their consent, because the people are not satisfied with what the States do. We must strive for efficient State government, so that the arbitrary power of Congress shall not be urged to grow. To mention only one specific case, the Republican Party should urge upon State legislatures to pass adequate laws for the regulation of aviation, so as to avoid the necessity of having more rules made in Washington.

"The inefficiency of the States is not a sufficient reason for the growth of Federal power and the spread of bureaucracy, but it seems so to the average voter, and hence his representative in Congress.

"The Connecticut representative republican system of government is based on the belief, so well expressed by that hard-headed countryman who said, 'I make no claims to great knowledge, but I'm a good judge of horses and men.' This is sometimes called horse sense or common sense. It is the logical foundation on which successful popular government may be built.

NEED MORE TOLERANCE

"The glory of America to-day is her tolerance. There is still room for improvement. But the record of the Republican Party shows its faith in the people, its belief in liberty, its tolerance in matters of creed, and color, race and religion. Some of our modern orators appear to be afraid of liberty and tolerance. Let them have no fear.

"Tolerance means charity. Toleration suffereth long and is kind, is not puffed up. Toleration is the very essence of the American spirit. Without toleration we can not have liberty. Without toleration we can not have freedom. Intolerance and bigotry stifle liberty and freedom, crush initiative and invention, destroy opportunity and character.

"Nevertheless we can not tolerate crime. We can not tolerate corruption. We can not tolerate theft of private or national resources. Neither can we tolerate unjust curtailment of individual liberty. The State must protect us against covetousness, theft, and murder. But the State must not interfere with my home, my church, or my school. I must fit myself to be a good citizen. That is my duty. But how I do it is my affair. If I fail to be a good citizen let me be punished. But I demand the opportunity to succeed.

"Furthermore we must not be tolerant of bigotry and intolerance. They are crimes against civilization. They would set brother against brother, clan against clan, race against race, religion against religion. The result would be anarchy and civil war. We must not be tolerant of crime or treason. But, thank God, we have separated church and state. A man no longer is held to commit a crime because he does not worship as I do, nor is he a traitor because his church is not my church.

MUST FIGHT BIGOTRY

"So we must be on our guard against bigotry, intolerance, and standardization in human affairs. We demand for each man and woman the right to worship God in his own way—the right to educate his children in the kind of a school he prefers, the right to mind his own business in his own way so long as he does not interfere with his neighbor in doing the same. In the old days a man who longed for freedom to worship God, freedom to raise his family according to his own ideas, freedom from bureaucratic rulers and regulations, could go West, into the wilderness. To-day the wilderness is gone. But we can find that freedom in the towns of Connecticut.

"The city voter is frequently too busy with other things to think about politics. That is the tendency against which we must struggle. Furthermore, now that the radio and the rural free delivery and the telephone are bringing city life so vividly into country homes our country-bred citizens must guard against any tendency to permit their lives to become so full of personal business and personal pleasure that they can not give that time and attention to political affairs which has been their practice in the past and which has been perhaps the greatest safeguard of American liberty.

"We must beware of seeking for immediate benefits which are so obvious as to be desired by large numbers of citizens, but which, when carefully studied, are shown to be likely ultimately to produce serious ills in the body politic.

PUBLIC OPINION

"It has been said that there is no subject more widely discussed in these days than that of the observance and enforcement of laws. Thoughtful students of the art of government have been reminding us for years that laws are properly the crystallized result of public opinion and that if we attempt to mold public opinion by making laws we are so reversing a natural process as to cause laws to fall into disrespect. As 'Uncle Joe' Cannon once said, 'We are a people who like novelty and a short cut to perfection. We are always able to make ourselves believe that the social millennium is just one lap ahead and we can catch up with it if only Congress will enact some new-fangled law.' Some people constantly forget that you can not make a man honest by legislation. It is not law nor the Constitution which molds and controls the development of our civilization so much as it is an intelligent and righteous public opinion. When law goes beyond the spirit of the people it lacks that support which alone makes it certain of obedience. When law follows public opinion it can and will be observed. But when a well-organized minority using powerful propaganda appeals to emotional Congressmen we secure legislation by hysteria and we indulge in rash experiments. On the other hand, when a responsible political party through its legally chosen representatives deliberately adopts a political platform and commits itself to a definite course of political action we avoid hysteria and fall back on common sense. If in the adoption of our platform we proceed with deliberation and are governed by the combined wisdom of all our Members, listening to the counsels of the most conservative as well as those of the most liberal, we shall be on safe ground. As President Coolidge once said, 'Do not hesitate to be as reactionary as the multiplication table; do not hesitate to be as revolutionary as science.'

"Our greatest problem as American citizens is how to make popular government successful. Our ancestors were convinced that heredity rule is not in the long run successful. We agree with them. To be sure, one man may make a great ruler. He may be the ideal, benevolent monarch. His son may inherit his qualities and may grant speedy justice and promote the general welfare of all his subjects. Nevertheless, they are subjects and not citizens. Sooner or later a monarch arises whose tendencies are more evil than good, whose love of power is greater than his love of justice, whose wishes for self-enjoyment are more compelling than his wishes for the public welfare. And as a result we get tyranny and despotism, oppression, and suffering. These are due to the inherent tendencies of human nature. Then the only relief is revolution and civil war.

REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT BEST

"The world has tried many different kinds of government. We believe that the safest and best kind is government by the people through their representatives.

"Consequently, we are constantly seeking to strengthen and maintain those forms of government which will assure to us and our children the inherent rights of man; his right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our great problem is to make government by the people operate successfully for the people.

"In a very small community the people may govern directly. In a large community they must govern through their representatives. These representatives must be chosen and elected. They must win the support of the majority of the people. To win that support the representatives must please the people. Consequently, the representatives will usually be chosen from those who are anxious to win the next election, or in other words, those who may be justly accused of taking a constant interest in public opinion. Some folks call them 'politicians.'

"On the other hand, if we are going to provide for the steady development of a sound citizenry and are going to insure the training of good citizens for the future, if these representatives are going to guide the 'Ship of State' so that it may safely weather all possible storms, they must be chosen from citizens who have the inclination and the ability and will take the time to look beyond the next election. If they look too far beyond it, they are not likely to be elected. Their services may be lost to the State. If they do not look beyond it, they may be elected, but their services may be lost to the next generation.

GOVERNMENT BY PEOPLE

"The trouble with many earnest students of government and some would-be statesmen is their failure to be interested in making government-by-the-people work. Actually they are not particularly interested in winning the next election. Their trouble is that they are not interested in the opinions of the man on the street. They are not interested in winning the approval of the great mass of people who in fact constitute the sovereign power, 'We, the people of the United States.' In other words, they are not interested in winning the next election. Actually they do not believe in government by the people. They believe in government by themselves; government by a small group of wiseacres; government by an organized minority.

"Many of our fellow citizens do not look very far ahead. If their immediate wants are supplied, they are satisfied. Their idea of the proper duties and functions of government is limited to their personal wishes for safety, comfort, ease, and amusement. They know all about the heroes of the sporting world, the notorious wrongdoers of the criminal world, and the world as represented in four-column headlines. They know little and care less about history or even current politics unless the dish is served with the sauce of scandal and the spice of shattered reputations. They work hard at their chosen jobs. They mind their own business. But they do not consider their duties as a citizen to be part of their life work. And this is one of the greatest handicaps in the way of making popular government permanently successful in a vast continent inhabited by more than 110,000,000 people.

PURE DEMOCRACY IMPOSSIBLE

"As I see it the fundamental basis for popular representative government, sometimes called a republican form of government, assured to the States by the Constitution, is that while the average citizen may not know much about law, public finance, or the larger problems of public administration, he has a God-given capacity to size up the men he knows. The long process of evolution through the ages eliminated those who were not able to judge of the character of their neighbors. Most people are good judges of human nature. This enables them to select good representatives from the people they know personally instead of having to depend on what they hear about successful advertisers who are particularly keen in pleasing the whims of large numbers of those people who have little time or inclination to give to the deeper aspects of legislation and of legislative policy. It is through the choice of representatives from among those actually known personally to the voter that popular government has been successful. We must preserve the representative system. The larger the country the more impossible it becomes for pure democracy to function, the more necessary is the careful preservation of representative government.

"Have faith in representative government first put into the form of a written constitution in Hartford. Have faith in Connecticut. But remember that 'faith without works is dead.' Have faith in her institutions. Show your faith by good works. Choose representatives who are worthy of your confidence. Then give them a free hand. Trust their judgment until they give you some evidence of failure. We believe in Connecticut. Let us show our faith by working for Connecticut. We believe in America. Let us show our faith by working for America."

POWER TRUST INVESTIGATION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Mr. Eliot Harris and appearing in Labor, reviewing the work of the Federal Trade Commission in investigating the Power Trust.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POWER TRUSTS "EDUCATING" THE PEOPLE; PROPAGANDA AGENTS REVEAL SECRETS—"JOHNNY WALKER" WHISKY FOR ILLINOIS LEGISLATORS; SCHEME TO BRAND ALL PROGRESSIVES AS "REDS"; COLLEGE PROFESSORS "ASSISTED"; NEWSPAPERS AND SCHOOLS FLOODED WITH "DOPE"

By Eliot Harris

Whisky for legislators, propaganda for high schools, scholarships for college students, and "aid" for their professors, "kept" newspapers to stuff the general public with misinformation, and a stock of "bolshevist" scares to hurl at anyone who advocates municipal ownership or protests against the dirty work of private monopoly.

These are the trump cards in the public-utility game as Samuel Insull and Ira C. Copley—the latter a one-time Congressman—play it in Illinois and as it was revealed before the Federal Trade Commission last week.

The star exhibit was a letter from Robert B. Prather, assistant power lobbyist in Illinois, to the chief power lobbyist in New York, January 20, 1921:

"The legislature is in session here, and it looks like a very stormy session, and I could use very handily a little Johnny Walker; and it occurred to me that you could do me a very great favor if the first time you are coming west you would call up a friend of mine in New York and bring me half a dozen bottles."

LETTER TO MR. AYLESWORTH

Four years later Mr. Prather wrote another letter on much the same lines, saying that he had to have something "to sweeten the palates of the legislature."

On the stand he denied vigorously that he had ever given a bottle of whisky to a legislator. (N. B.—He didn't say anything about contributions less than a bottle.)

But taking the two letters together it seems that a thirsty man could get on quite comfortably in the legislature if he only were "reasonable" toward the utility trust.

Mr. Prather is secretary-treasurer of a branch of the National Electric Light Association, which is the propagandist organization of the Power Trust. As showing how the trust runs things in that bailiwick, Prather testified that he was formerly secretary to the public utility commission of Illinois.

The whisky letter was addressed to H. M. Aylesworth. Mr. Aylesworth, thus pressed into service as bootlegger for the solons of Illinois, is the son of a clergyman—"it is dark underneath the candle."

He began his public career as a member of the utility commission of the State of Colorado, and was so satisfactory to the institutions he was "regulating" that he was made chief propagandist of the Power Trust. After several years in this position, he became broadcasting czar of radio.

CALLS COPLEY A LIAR

This revelation of Power Trust methods of controlling public opinion and public officials came out in a singular way. Ira C. Copley, formerly

Congressman from Illinois and owner of four or five newspapers in that State, recently bought a string of newspapers in California, and on taking over one of them made this announcement to the public:

"I have no connection with any public utility anywhere, and no connection with any other business than the newspaper business anywhere."

This statement came to the notice of Willis J. Spaulding, manager of the municipally owned electric light plant at Springfield, Ill., which furnishes current to householders at 5 cents per kilowatt-hour, and is making money at it, when Insull, in Chicago, with a bigger and better plant, charges 9 cents.

Spaulding knew the Copley statement was a lie, and said so in a letter to Senator NORRIS of Nebraska. NORRIS read the letter on the floor of the Senate, and suggested that the Federal Trade Commission look into the matter. The commission began looking last week.

PAPERS SUPPRESSED THE NEWS

Spaulding testified that Copley owned utility stocks and bonds to the value of $10,000,000 to $15,000,000; that his paper in Springfield, the Illinois State Journal, suppressed Senator NORRIS's account of the work of the municipal plant when other papers printed it on the first page.

He reminded the commission that Copley gave $25,000 to Frank Smith's senatorial campaign. When this gift was made, the Copley utility interests had an important case before the Illinois Utility Commission, of which Frank Smith was chairman.

In view of such testimony, it is not surprising that Spaulding summed up by saying that the regulation of public utilities by the Illinois commission had become a "tragic and scandalous failure" since the incoming of Frank L. Smith.

John Callan O'Laughlin, vice president of the Copley Press—which is the Copley newspaper owning corporation—took the stand and said that Copley bought newspapers because they were "a splendid investment."

AN EDITOR WITH A "PAST"

A little questioning brought out the fact that the Illinois State Journal cost Copley $1,000,000, and never paid more than $60,000 per year—6 per cent, when other witnesses had shown that Copley got 22 per cent out of some of his utility investments.

O'Laughlin is the man who was editor of the Army and Navy Journal when that magazine published on the front page an article by the notorious Fred Marvin, denouncing Senator WALSH of Montana and claiming that E. L. Doheny was a "patriot."

He declared that he (O'Laughlin) was opposed to public ownership, and "hoped" the other Copley editors were.

No one who followed the testimony doubts that Copley is buying newspapers not for direct profit or for the pleasure of running them, but to fight the battles of the Power Trust against public ownership.

Aside from Copley and Prather, with his whisky bottles, the chief evidence dealt with the work of the Illinois committee on public utility information. This organization certainly covers a wide field.

PROPAGANDA IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Its director is Bernard J. Mullaney, vice president of the People's Gas, Light & Coke Co., the Insull concern which supplies Chicago with gas. The assistant director is Rob Roy MacGregor. Both were on the stand. Their testimony showed—

That this Insull committee is flooding the schools of Illinois with utility propaganda. More than 75,000 pamphlets were distributed to high schools last year.

That the committee furnishes speakers' bulletins and weekly "news" bulletins which go to 900 papers in the State. Five thousand columns of this stuff were printed last year.

That scholarships are offered to college students and "aid" to university professors who want to study utility questions or matters connected therewith.

That lecturers are sent to clubs and civic organizations, and even moving pictures used to spread utility propaganda.

MacGregor said in reply to questions that everyone in the State above the grammar schools had been "reached" by their propaganda.

PUT "RED" BRAND ON CANDIDATES

Part of this stuff is a direct attack on public ownership. Part is devoted to branding anyone who opposes the utilities as a "communist" or "red." MacGregor wrote a speech to be used in campaigning for the United States Senate against any candidate who favored public ownership.

"Pin the bolshevik idea" onto such a candidate, wrote the Truthful James. "Logic or reason is of no use in a political discussion."

Mullaney admitted constant personal efforts to discredit all advocates of public ownership as "communists." He admitted fighting public ownership and operation at Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, and everywhere else. Asked why he was so savage at public ownership, he answered:

"Of course, we're not heartily in favor of anything that would destroy our business."

ORGANIZATIONS ON "BLACKLIST"

The Insull committee has circulated "confidential information" listing the following organizations, among others, as "communistic, socialistic, and pacifistic":

American Association of University Women.
American Farm Bureau Federation.
National Education Association.
League of Women Voters.
Religious Society of Friends.

Apparently Mr. Insull, besides being the heaviest investor in United States Senators, has been a strong promoter of that "red" scare which frightens old women of both sexes.

While yelling "bolshevist!" the Insull committee keeps track of the work of educators and speakers, and of the trend of public thinking over the country.

This committee reprinted an address by Dean Ralph E. Heilman of Northwestern University. Mullaney asked Heilman to go over a "municipal credo," which he—Mullaney—had prepared.

Charles E. Merriam, of the University of Chicago, a known and valued Progressive, is listed by the Insull committee as "all wrong." William B. Munro, of Harvard, is called "fair."

AIDS IN PREPARING TEXTBOOKS

Splawn, of the University of Texas, later put on the railroad commission of that State, is described as "sound." Splawn is the man who, as "neutral" arbitrator, gave the conductors and trainmen the worst of it in their western wage case a few months ago.

Prof. E. R. Dillavau, of the University of Illinois, is listed thus: "Generally his conclusions are as they should be."

The Insull committee makes a regular business of giving "help" in preparing textbooks and getting them published.

Twenty-three States are listed in a card index showing the attitude of the public on utility questions. Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, and Nebraska have leagues favorable to municipal ownership. Arkansas, New York, and Texas are declared friendly to private ownership. Others are divided or indifferent.

One of the most amusing bits of evidence presented was a letter from the Nebraska Power Co., asking for special help from the Insull committee, "on account of Senators NORRIS and HOWELL."

FEDERAL LAND BANKS AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, extracts from a number of publications and other data relating to the Federal land banks and farm relief.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Extract from the Pacific Homestead, Salem, Oreg.]

LET THE FARMERS OPERATE THE LAND BANKS

The farmer borrowers through the more than 4,000 cooperative farm-loan associations of the country are pretty weary of imitation cooperative land banks; they want something besides a dream with a nightmare as the "morning-after" effect.

The farmers have good reason to be tired, too. They have not only advanced the unquestioned collateral security to permit of making the loans, but they have subscribed to the capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks to the extent of 5 per cent of this sum, and have assumed a liability against the repayment of their neighbor's loans to the extent of 10 per cent of these loans. In other words, they have advanced more than $2,500,000,000 worth of farm property as security for the loans now outstanding against the repayment of the mortgages of all farmer borrowers of these associations, subscribed to the capital stock, assumed the legal liability to secure the banks, and, after having done this, these farmers find that they have not one word to say about the administration or operation of the various Federal land banks.

NO OTHER PRIVATELY OWNED BANKS LIKE THESE

Just contrast this against the man who owns but $100 worth of private bank stock—national, State, trust, etc., but who gets a vote on who shall direct the bank each year, and you have a slight contrast between the two methods.

We farmers for more than 40 years fought in getting a land-bank system. The original intent of Congress when the original act was passed, in July, 1916, under the Wilson administration, was that these land banks should be turned over to the farmer owners when the $100,000 necessary to capitalize them had been repaid by the farmers making loans. But Congress took this promise away from the farmers—after they had subscribed to the bank stock—and vested supreme control in the hands of the Farm Loan Board of the Treasury Department, of which the Secretary of the Treasury is the ex-officio chairman.

FARMERS HAVE NOTHING TO SAY ABOUT HOW BANKS SHALL BE OPERATED

Since that date, the farmer owners of these banks have had nothing to say, and will not have until the system is turned over to them.

Every farmer ought to know this, because the word has gone out that we have a "cooperative farm-loan system." We have just to this degree: We take orders from the Farm Loan Board, or their delegated appointees in the land banks. We cooperatively subscribe to capital stock, and assume liability, but that is about as far as the cooperative bug travels.

Would it be fair and just, sprinkled with ordinary common sense, for the more than 7,000 national banks of the country to take orders only from a room in Washington? How would business prosper? About like farming has under such conditions.

Then why should farmers allow this board to dominate the Federal farm-loan system which they own, when they advanced the security upon which the loans are made, own the capital stock, assume the liability?

Have American farmers reached a stage where they need a guardian to manage their business or are they competent and intelligent? "Is taxation without representation" still considered "tyranny"?

HAVE NO FAITH IN FARMERS

Members of the Farm Loan Board have repeatedly advised Congress that they have no faith in the ability of the farmer to run his own business; only these political appointees can do that properly. They have tried time and again to sweep away from the local farm-loan associations, by amendments to the act, even the right to name their own secretary-treasurers, etc., in spite of the present more than 4,000 successful loan associations, which illustrate the success of cooperation in agriculture better than any other agency of ancient or modern times.

The Federal land banks should be turned over to the farmer-owners at once. Farmers ought to demand that Congress fire politicians from the system and let the rightful owners operate their own banks.

FARMER OWNED AND CONTROLLED BANKS MAKE GOOD IN HUNGARY

(Mr. Hoover's Department of Commerce gives a most interesting report as result of survey by his agents of German territory, and shows dividend payments made by industrial and banking institutions. A notable success was made by the farm-mortgage land banks of Germany, which are operated entirely by the farmer-owners instead of politicians. In face of most unfavorable conditions during the past year, every one of these farmer-owned German banks paid dividends as good as or better than the previous year. Below is the report, as given.)

MORTGAGE BANKS MAKE BETTER SHOWING

The position of mortgage banks is somewhat better. The first and last quarters of the year brought mortgage-bond sales to a higher level than they had been for some time previously; consequently an increase in dividends is noted in some instances. On the whole, however, the dividends of mortgage banks, like those of commercial banks, were no higher in 1927 than in 1926, as evident from a compilation of the percentages paid in the two years:

	1926	1927
	Per cent	Per cent
Bayerische Hypotheken und Wechsel Bank	10	10
Berliner Hypotheken Bank	10	12
Braunschweigisch-Hannoversche Hypotheken	9	10
Deutsche Hypotheken Bank	10	10
Hamburger Hypotheken Bank	8	8
Hannoversche Boden	12	12
Mitteldeutsche Boden-Credit	10	12
Preussische Central-Boden	9	9
Preussische Pfandbrief Bank	10	10
Rheinisch-Westfaelische Boden	8	9
Saechsische Bodencredit	12	12

It will be noted that German land banks paid a higher percentage of dividends than did Federal land banks under political domination and control.

DANGEROUS DOSES OF PATERNALISM

Paternalism presupposes that the individual is unable to care for himself. Have Americans reached the point where they wish to be so classified? If so, they will ultimately find themselves mere wards of the State with their every act regulated by law, edict, or public official.

WOULD DESTROY INDIVIDUAL OPPORTUNITY

Socialism never builds up anything despite its theories. It waits until an industry obtains great success, and then it wishes to step in and operate that industry according to theories, which in the past have usually produced dismal failures.

[Extract from the current program of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States]

IF IT ISN'T GOOD ENOUGH FOR BUSINESS, WHY IS IT GOOD ENOUGH FOR AMERICAN FARMERS?

Favors utility regulation—not ownership—by Government: In the national chamber's confession of economic faith, this principle stands paramount—that Government scrupulously refrain from entering any of the fields of transportation, communication, industry or commerce, or any phase of business when it can be successfully undertaken and conducted by private enterprise. The chamber, to be sure, recognizes that the utilities invested with a public interest are subject to Government regulation, but it insists that such regulation be so exercised that it become not burdensome as to cost and not palsying to that initiative without which adequate and efficient service is impossible. This is the keynote of the chamber's view of the relation of the Government to the essential utilities—railways, merchant marine, coal, telephone and telegraph, radio, and all phases of power development.

ILLINOIS EDITORS OPPOSE GOVERNMENT OPERATION

Recently the Illinois Committee on Public Utility Information sent a questionnaire to a number of Illinois newspaper editors, of whom 223 answered. Asked if they favored Government ownership or operation of any industry now privately owned, 191 replied "no" with but 2 replying "yes." The rest were evasive and did not directly answer the question. To a question asking if they favored putting Government in business or industry in competition with existing private enterprise, 194 replied in the negative and 3 in the affirmative.

The committee could not have chosen a better way of ascertaining public opinion on this important issue. The viewpoint of State editors is the best possible index of the general opinion of citizens in any community.

With an editorial vote 70 to 1 against the Government competing with private enterprise, it does not look as if proposals for political ownership of industry in this Nation would be popular. The people no longer confuse an intriguing theory with grim reality.

SHALL WE DESTROY DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA?

Why should the state, in a free country, attempt to crush the business of its private citizens? Why is it not better to permit those who own property to completely manage it, free from political dry-rot that immediately afflicts any monopolistic governmental function?

One of the strongest arguments against enlarging the power of public officials to monopolistic proportions is the mere fact that the officials themselves seek this enlargement of their authority.

It is easy for the private citizen to give up rights; it is hard for him to get them back. The minute he closes one avenue of private enterprise, he has limited his future possibilities by that much.

Thus, another branch of business would be taken over by the state to the exclusion of its private citizens and to the enrichment of thousands of new public officials.

POLITICAL PLUNDER

It is high time that the citizens of America—the great, thrifty, and self-provident classes—along with all others opposed to political extravagance and socialism in government should awake to the injustices and dangers of thus picking upon one class of the people for political plunder.

[Extract of letter written by Edson S. Lott to a manufacturer]

Mr. MANUFACTURER: If you, like many farmers in North Dakota, do not believe in the American plan of every business running its own business, but want the Government to run it, do not believe in profits on what you buy, how can you conscientiously ask a profit on what you sell?

You invest capital in your plant and believe you have a right to make a profit on the investment. Why, then, deny a profit on the capital invested in my business?

You would not like to have your own business taken over by the Government, would you? Yet, perhaps you are thinking of joining or have already joined the abortive effort to put my business into the hands of politicians.

If so, how would you like it if the thousands of men in this country in my line of business would join hands to have your plant, and all other plants like it, put into the hands of the Government to operate?

You can't spill gasoline all the way from your house to my house and then set fire to my house without running the risk of having your own house burn.

Is it fair to apply one economic standard to what you buy, and an entirely different one to what you sell? The arguments that appeal to you for Government operation of my business can be applied to your business. If you adopt those principles as to my business, you are plainly inviting the application of them to your business, are you not?

Why not think this over?

If Government ownership and control is good when applied to one line, why should it not be applied to the following businesses:

Wholesale and retail dealing in groceries and provisions, dry goods and clothing, hats and caps, boots and shoes, hardware generally, and house and farm furnishings.

The manufacture of groceries, flour and bakery products, tea, cocoa and chocolate, sugar and sirup, candy, preserves and spices, butter and cheese, bacon and meat products, tobacco products, standard clothing and hosiery, boots and shoes, rope, brushes and brooms, coal and tar, cement and bricks, rubber, barrels, motor trucks and carts, bicycles, and printed matter generally.

In Russia they have already gone this far. In the United States the Government has already taken over the farmers' land banks.

When Socialists have all they want everything will be taken over.

Yes, Mr. Manufacturer, think it over!

[Extract from address by Edson S. Lott]

LET THOSE WHO PAY DO THE BOSSING—SOME THOUGHTS ON MONOPOLISTIC GOVERNMENT-OPERATED BUSINESS

What is the objection to giving those who pay the premiums their choice of insurance carriers?

When a state insurance fund has a monopoly, employers must accept whatever may be given them in the way of service and pay whatever may be demanded of them in the way of premiums. As there is no competition, there is no escape. The management may be competent or the reverse. It may be fair or the reverse. It may be conducted as a well-managed private commercial enterprise is conducted or the reverse.

If those who manage the monopoly desire to make their management appear economical, they need only give poor and cheap service and pay claims without investigation, charging to losses what goes in mismanagement, thereby ultimately increasing premium rates in proportion. The result of such fictitious economy would be to increase the loss ratio in connection with many manufacturing plants inordinately, which in turn would call for a corresponding increase in premium rates; that is, a low expense ratio might increase the premium rates.

As a man-to-man, square-deal, fair-play proposition, if a State insurance fund can not get and hold business on its merits, in competition with private stock and mutual companies, why are the lawmakers justified in giving it a monopoly? Why restrict the number of bidders to one? If "the state" could not get your business away from you in competition, would you think the lawmakers were fair if they should take it away and give it to "the state"?

CAN'T GET COMPETENT MEN

The Government can not get men of sufficient ability to properly conduct monopolistic business, with an income of enough money to make this sort of business pay—it will not pay large enough salaries. And the managers of Government enterprises, even where competent, are handicapped by civil-service rules and political red tape, which do not give them efficient control over their subordinates, even conceding that they did want to do business as it should be transacted.

BUSINESS AIDS TO SOCIALISM

(By Henry Swift Ives)

There are many property owners and business men in America who are ardent capitalists when their own property or their own business is concerned, but who are inclined to be just as ardent socialists when the other fellow's property or business is concerned.

If it were not for the aid and comfort received from those belonging to this classification, socialism would still be in the theory stage of its existence in this country, government ownership would not be a political issue, and excessive and arbitrary government regulation and control would not threaten the national stability and endanger private property rights.

Indeed, in my opinion, some of those who most loudly complain about "too much government in business" usually are to a considerable extent to blame for the situation against which they complain.

PITY AND SCORN

Government-ownership schemes, the orgy of lawmaking which afflicts us, with its natural offspring of boards, commissions, supervisors, inspectors, and snoopers, and the orgy of tax spending which distresses our pocketbooks—all of these things and other similar manifestations of too much government are chiefly due, indeed, either to the neglect, economic ignorance, or selfish espousal of such causes by many of the property owners and business men of the Nation.

There is no need to elaborate on the feature of this indictment having to do with the neglect of political affairs by business men. That situation is too well known and has been sermonized about so much that it doesn't need further discussion. Economic ignorance and the selfish espousal of such causes are counts which go hand in hand.

Those who are unwittingly lured into supporting some socialist proposal, however, are to be pitied, while those who deliberately aid such enterprises in the hope of thereby gaining some fancied advantage are to be scorned. And the members of both of these classes utterly fail to realize that no single industry or business can be lifted out of the mass of privately conducted enterprise, endowed with the attributes of sovereignty, and subsidized by taxation without every other business feeling the baneful effects of such a procedure.

If they did realize the import of this economic and political axiom, they would soon cease a course of conduct which is quite directly threatening their own business enterprises and their property rights if they only knew it.

DIGGING GRAVES

It is about time in this country that business men and property owners be more generally educated to the interdependence within industry and to a realization of the fact that they are digging their own business graves when they support the socialization or governmental repression of the other fellow's business.

The community of interest between all of the jeopardized private enterprises has been too long ignored. Each is fighting its own battles with little or no appreciation of the common menace. Often those most in danger are arrayed against each other, and do not seem to care what becomes of the others in "the same boat," provided they can keep a few feet ahead of the socialist sheriff with his writ of ejectment.

This unfortunate division must speedily be remedied if the individualist state is to be preserved.

And I think that the various commercial and civic organizations of this country who are interested in sound political practices as much as they are in sound business practices can do much toward showing business men generally the inconsistencies involved in supporting socialistic schemes which do not directly affect them.

Socialism can succeed only when those who would suffer most from it are lured into supporting some phase of the general program of confiscation and repression without fully understanding what it is all about.

[Extract from F. & C. Service Bulletin]

A HORSE OF ANOTHER COLOR

The president of a Northwest bank, at a social gathering recently, said:

"The city ought to run the street-car system. It could save taxes now paid by the private company, use equipment of the city now maintained at the expense of the taxpayers, and thus give the public cheaper rides."

A lumberman, who was one of the heaviest taxpayers in the room, finally said:

"I have always thought it would be a great thing for the city or the State to run a bank. It's got so now that private banks make a charge when an account falls below $100. They make a charge to good customers for cashing certain checks and, on top of it all, they charge a high rate of interest to borrowers. The city, the county, or the State could operate a bank in buildings already furnished by the taxpayers, eliminate the taxes now paid by banks, and thus save the public large amounts of interest and special charges now assessed by banks against depositors and borrowers."

This was a horse of another color. The banker in question immediately attempted to show why the city could not operate a bank as well as a street-car system, but his audience had the laugh on him.

This incident illustrates how nine times out of ten the man who wants government ownership for the other fellow's business, holds up his hands in horror if it is proposed to apply the same treatment to his own business. Public ownership does not square with our form of government.

It makes no difference whether public ownership is applied to printing, street railways, electric companies, banking, farming, or any other activity, the principle is the same—it limits the opportunity of the individual, curtails his liberties, and thereby abrogates the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

[Extract from New York Times, April 8, 1928]

"BUREAUCRATIC OPPRESSION"—SOME FEATURES OF OUR OWN GOVERNMENT COMPARED WITH THE SOVIET METHODS

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The Times had an editorial the other day on the recent development of "bureaucratic oppression" by the Soviet Government. Such a development under our central Government has come as suddenly and as insidiously as it is untoward. Why such obliquity of governmental administration has not brought condemnation by the people and the political parties is one of those questions that is unexplainable. The development of this evil, however, has come through the growing administrative departments of the Federal Government, where thousands of agents and bureau chiefs in meeting the citizen exercise arbitrary authority that goes on unchecked, with conduct not condemned, and gives opportunity for excesses, exactions, and abuses that become galvanized into rules of practice.

Congress would not dare enact legislation that would directly and publicly affect the citizen comparable with the devastating assumed authority that the agents and petty bureau chiefs of the Income Tax Bureau exercise to-day over the citizen. The Income Tax Bureau, in the extensive and loose authority granted it by Congress, exercises, if it does not possess, a discretion which amounts to license to ruin any citizen in his property and his reputation, or both, upon the whim of more or less irresponsible agents. This bureau is exercising such authority to-day, and the boldness and the indifference to reproach for activities that are above the law show that the public is asleep and that Congress at least is not interested, as it often is not interested in vital things.

The Income Tax Bureau peculiarly offers every opportunity for the exercise of bureaucratic oppression. Its inquisitorial powers, its almost anonymous character, with its horde of all kinds of representatives and its multitudinous and conflicting regulations and opinions, enable its various agents and petty chiefs and attorneys to feel that they are immune from responsibility, however unwarranted their attack.

Attention is finally being drawn to this subject. There have appeared one or two articles in the Times over the last year showing the operations of this bureau that support these statements. Governor Ritchie rises and says that the true and intelligent citizen is "against the bureaucratic system of the Federal Government, remote from the people, with its burdensome, perplexing, and prying laws, lacking popular sanction." And he denounces in the Federal Government "the general incompetence of subordinates performing duties of responsibility."

Under such administrative practices what were once well recognized as rights of the individual will be subverted or disappear in the long run. It is not realized that this arbitrary authority may soon touch and embrace every citizen as well as those who to-day contribute Federal taxes. That it is a dangerous and growing evil is obvious to any thoughtful American. It raises a governmental question of great importance. It is greater than the political subject of prosperity, for that will follow the maintenance of the civil and individual rights with American initiative and independence. The tariff question is insignificant compared with it. The oil scandals are momentary and fleeting in comparison. Even prohibition, the Volstead Act, and questions of foreign debts are minor questions alongside of it.

Without checking peremptorily and forcefully the Federal Government in its maintenance of departments with such arbitrary power, and without the spirit of independence of people that will resent such abuses in the Federal Government, can it be said that we are worthy successors of the hardy forefathers who established the Federal Government?

Reverting to the mention of the development of "bureaucratic oppression" by the Soviet Government, is Russia becoming Americanized or is the Federal Government becoming Russianized? The American people will soon wish to know. M.

[Extract from article in American Grain Trade, Chicago, Ill.]

RUSSIANIZED LAND-BANK SYSTEM FOR AMERICA

Many supersocialistic dreams have been dreamed and put across in our modern Republic in recent times—put across at the expense of all the taxpayers for the benefit of a particular class—contrary to the American principle of Government. The latest, and probably the most menacing fad of all, was the taking over by the politicians of the farmer-owned, farmer-liability-assuming dozen district Federal land banks, and frustrating the more than 4,000 national farm-loan associations of their power to exercise their rights as stockholding owners of these banks. This action on the part of a Congress which was "doing the farmer" is without parallel in economic history, and established a precedent in political philosophy which is as dangerous as it is rank.

VAST AND MENACING POLITICAL MACHINE

This means not only that a vast and menacing political machine has been created, with thousands of jobs to hold forth as bait to the political plunderers, as a Government-operated yet farmer-owned institution, but also that Uncle Sam, a kind and more often overconsiderate gentleman, if justice be done, should foot the bill of any failure of his political manipulators to make these banks which politicians dominate. This bill should be paid by the farmer, who should enjoy the special benefits of the banking system, because it was established for the farmer, but how can we justly ask the farmer to pay a bill which has been executed by politicians who dominate that which the farmer owns?

DREAMS OF SUPERSOCIALISTIC FACTIONS

The World War gave the world an overallotment of long-haired, supersocialistic dreamers, and the sane, common-sense citizen has a double responsibility combatting the efforts of these people to turn the United States into a playground and clearing house and money market for every Tom, Dick, and Harry that comes along with a new pipe dream, the smoke of which he wishes to enjoy while the Government furnishes the fuel.

The Federal farm-loan system is a parallel to the strong Federal reserve system, in that it has 12 district Federal land banks, the local cooperative national farm loan associations acting in the same capacity as do our national banks, being members of the district banks. As the farmer-borrower subscribes for capital stock in his association, which is in turn expended as stock in the district bank to the extent of 5 per cent, or $50 per $1,000 of his loan, like national-bank stockholders, this same farmer assumes a double liability of 10 per cent, or $100 per $1,000, to safeguard the system. Therefore the farmer-owners of the Federal farm-loan system have two reasons why they—not outside politicians—should fully manage the 12 Federal land banks which they, the farmers, now own. First, that the farmer-stockholders have, like other American bank-stock owners, manage that which they have paid for and which they own; secondly, that the management may be invested in their hands, without red-tape political muddling, that they may safeguard their liability interest. This is a principle so old and so sound, widely recognized, that it is utterly impossible for any sane man to reason out how any Congress happened to so amend the Federal farm loan act of 1916 as to take away from the farmer-owners of these banks these rights and privileges.

THE FARMER "HOLDS THE BAG"

However, when Congress did take these banks away from the rightful owners, the thousands of farmer-stockholders residing in every State, it would have seemed, had they thought that strange Russianized principle superior to the tested-and-found-true policy of bank stockholders bossing their own banks, as contrasted with superpolitical banking, that they would have relieved these farmer-owners of the 10 per cent liability and replaced this guaranty with that of the Federal Government. As they did the job, the politicians completely dominate the entire banking system, while the farmers, as regards the 10 per cent liability, "hold the whole bag." The 12 Federal banks are now being operated by the Farm Loan Board, and their horde of political appointees in exactly the same way, with wider latitudes, as are the some 50 joint-stock, privately owned land banks scattered over the country. In these latter banks the private bank-stock owners manage their banks, assume all the liabilities entailed in making farm-mortgage loans, under the supervision of the Farm Loan Board.

Only in the event of a receiver being named, as in the recent case of the Kansas City, Mo., Joint Stock Land Bank, has the Farm Loan Board really stepped in and taken over the management of the bank. They have, in the operation of these banks, fully recognized the right of the stockholders to manage and operate their own banks. Why, then, have the 12 district Federal, farmer-owned land banks been managed and operated by the Farm Loan Board, to the exclusion of any recognition of the property rights of the farmers who own and who assume the liabilities of these banks? This comparison alone shows up the present type of administration of the Farm Loan Board in a very poor light, and shows how far Congress really went in "making a goat" out of the thousands of farmer-owners of these banks, depriving them of privileges which every other American business institution enjoys as being too common to even call for debate.

MORE RADICAL THAN RUSSIA

Thus, by adopting this method of taking away from the farmer-owners of the 12 district Federal land banks, Congress took a step far more radical than has even been proposed, surely not effected, in radical Russia. They have shown the way for Russia's red radicals that can only lead to destruction, if followed for any length of time. This is the only Government in the world where the Government permits the farmers, a special class in a land where there are supposed to be no class lines, to capitalize a great banking system, and then the Government, when this system gets to going and shows signs of being of service to that class, steps in, takes it over, places politicians instead of the farmers' representatives, and then permits the farmer to continue to assume the liability, that he may pay any losses which the political leaders may run up. Ye gods and little fishes! Is this America?

NOT ACCORDING TO AGREEMENT WITH FARMER

This entire plan is not in accordance with the agreement which the Federal Government entered into with every one of the thousands of farmers who secured loans through the various land banks since, when the Federal farm loan act was enacted in 1916, it was specifically written into that act that the Federal Treasury should advance to the banks sufficient capital to start them going; a temporary board was selected by the supervising board in Washington to officer each of the 12 land banks, and every aid was to be rendered by the Government in helping the farmer to organize and get going with his, not the Government's, land banks.

When the farmer had repaid to the Federal Treasury the sum necessary to temporarily capitalize these 12 land banks, the farm loan act of 1916 specified that the permanent board of directors of the land banks should be selected and elected by a majority vote of the farmer owners of these banks. The banks were to be turned over to the farmers in common with the national banks, the Government's only interest from that date on being to supervise them just as are national banks.

This is widely recognized as the only sane and sensible method of running any kind of a bank anywhere, and the farm loan act, as passed in 1916, passed the acid test of a suit before the United States Supreme Court as to the constitutionality of the act. Therefore, we may assume that the original farm loan act was fundamentally in accordance with the heritage and custom of the United States as formulated in the past 150 years of experience in giving to the individual the widest latitude as to his property rights and the fullest freedom in the management of them.

However, by a piece of political trickery which stands without parallel in our long and varied history, an amendment to the farm loan act was passed by Congress which withdrew from these thousands of farmers their rights and privileges as bank-stock owners, although still leaving them to assume the enormous liabilities, and turned the entire 12 district land-banking system over to politicians. And this trickery was played upon the American farmer by Senators and Representatives who now have the audacity to "go back home" and tell the "dear farmers" that "I am your friend; I vote only for sane and sound farm legislation."

Either their minds are so warped that they do not understand what common decency is, or how, in a legislative way, to carry it out according to the American principle, or they are as dishonest with themselves as they have been with their constituency. It would have taken very slight consideration of the merits and demerits of the proposed amendment to the farm loan act, for any representative of the people, no matter how feeble his mind, to have immediately recognized that the farmer owners of these land banks were to be deprived of their privileges as stockholders by the passage of that proposed amendment. The same alleged representatives, whether Republican or Democratic, would never have passed a similar piece of legislation as regards depriving national-bank stockholders of their rights. Why "take it out" on the helpless farmer? If it is not a plan worthy of consideration as regards national banks, why is it considered so just for the farmers? Answer these questions, Mr. Representative "of the farmer."

GOVERNMENT NOW REPAID ITS ADVANCE

The farmer borrowers have now repaid to the Federal Treasury all the money advanced except less than $1,000,000, according to the report issued by the Federal Farm Loan Board. The financial condition of the 12 district Federal land banks, based upon the amount of business now upon the books, no longer justifies withholding in the Federal Treasury of one red cent of money for the capitalization of any of these land banks. Every cent of this capital should be paid by the farmer borrowers, and the several hundred thousand dollars advanced should be used by the "economical Mr. Mellon" in reducing taxes.

The farmer should himself be given all the privileges of management of these 12 land banks, and the Government should step out of the operation of a class banking system, its board only supervising the banks. No longer should the American farmer be placed in the position of being the only infant in the special-privilege cradle and politicians permitted to become banker in order to carry on the farmer's business for him, acting as wet nurse and job grabber.

Previous proposals have been that the farmer should name six of the nine directors of each land bank, and the Farm Loan Board should name three. This would give the farmer majority control of the banks which he owns, but why not permit the farmer to name all the directors of the land banks, which is the sane and sound plan of other banking institutions, and permit the board to act only as supervising agent, as does the Comptroller of the Treasury in the case of national banks. Why not completely remove anything of a political nature from the operation of these banks? Why let politicians run up and down the land trying to get three of the nine directors named? Experience in the so-called peculiar "election" held to name farmer representatives (?) now on the board of these land banks, gave many a striking illustration of what would happen under any such plan. Remove politics completely from the land-bank operation and place these banks completely in the hands of the farmers who now own them.

SOUND-MINDED FARMERS STAND FIRM

Sound-minded farmers and farm representatives are opposed to the present political domination and manipulation of the Federal farm-loan system. After many months of investigation the American Farm Bureau Federation issued a report which, to say the least, was not to be construed as a compliment to the methods adopted by the political bosses of the banking system. This report is now filed away in Washington, and thousands of farmers who had anticipated some relief by this route are now wondering why the representatives of the organization have been so quiet with respect to presenting and pushing this recommendation of the national committee to a finish.

The National Grange has for years been rated as a sound-minded farm organization; their leaders are strongly opposed to Government operation of any agency. Repeatedly have they appeared before congressional committees and fought any such propositions. Where were they when Congress passed the amendment that deprived the American farmer of his property rights? Where are their representatives now?

James R. Howard, first president of the Farm Bureau, although looking kindly upon many proposals which we could not agree upon, did say: "I deplore a growing tendency on the part, not only of some farmers, but other men in high places, to stress the functioning of Government too much and of the individual too little."

In the present lank bank case, the Government is not only "functioning * * * too much," they are actually operating, through the political appointees, that which belongs to the farmer. The individual (the farmer stockholder) does not, is not permitted, to function even a little; he has been given the gate by Congress; he is on the outside looking in on what Congress has taken away from him.

Put the 12 Federal land banks wholly into the farmer's control. Let the Government get out of wholesale banking. Let the American farmer stand up to the rack and run his own business, and what is even more important—let him pay his own bills—bills that he has contracted for and which no politician is permitted to dip in and help himself to. Do this now.

MENACING TENDENCIES

The very foundations of our most cherished institutions—popular representative government, social and economic justice—are threatened by menacing tendencies. Concentration of wealth, authority, domination, and control into the hands of fewer and fewer favored individuals.

The assumption of sovereign governmental functions and authority by organized minorities. The usurpation of inalienable rights, privileges, and responsibilities of the citizen.

Powerful organizations formed for the advancement and profit of their own members flout the rights of the public, and defy the authority of the Government with seeming impunity.

Any organization which assumes, and is permitted to exercise authority to operate, or to prohibit the operation of anything, is the de facto government of that country.

He who serves notice upon a private citizen that he shall not be permitted to do his own choosing, exercises superior autocratic authority to that ever exercised by any State or Federal court through the injunction, however arbitrary and "sweeping" this court command may have seemed at the time. The court's injunction goes not further than to command the person or persons to whom directed, to refrain from doing some specified act which might interfere with the legal rights of another. This is as far as the courts may go.

POLITICIANS GO FURTHER THAN COURTS

But these officials of the de facto government issue, and in most instances, to our shame, are permitted to enforce their mandates preventing law-abiding citizens from exercising their undisputed legal privileges and duties.

The marauding and preying class understanding this timidity and group cowardice of the people, take advantage of it in the pursuit of their schemes. This is the pitiable condition of the people in Russia to-day. A comparatively small band of well-organized adventurers, having seized the arms, ammunition, the food supply, and the railroads, dominates, coerces, and despoils the millions of people, all that are left of the once great population.

A peaceable, industrious, frugal, and home-loving people are ruthlessly plundered of their savings, their food supplies, their seed grain, and left to all the horrors of starvation in their famine-stricken land. There is no such thing left in Russia as individual and community initiative. The individual and the mass of individuals are cowed by their criminal dictators, supported by their plundering, mercenary enemies.

WE ARE FAST DRIFTING RUSSIAWARD

We are drifting toward the same condition of affairs in this country.

There is no other subject of more immediate and vital importance to the liberty-loving citizen than the question of good government. There is no greater impending calamity than the threatened destruction of our representative free government at the hands of weak and sordid-minded officials, their subservient appointees, and their masters, the professional political bosses, supported by their mercenary tax-consuming hordes and sundry others of their tribe too numerous to specify.

In its organization, intent, and purpose, this Government of ours is supposed to be a representative Republic. Outside of the original "town meeting" in those scattered communities where that "school of practical politics" has survived, it is a mistake to call our form of government a democracy.

According to the fundamental laws of the land, the source of all governmental authority is the expressed will of the majority of the people. But as a matter of fact, the people are governed, or misgoverned, by officials and representatives selected by a very small minority of the legal voters and by an ever-increasing army of officious officials for whose selection and appointment the people have no voice, theoretically nor actually.

These officials, however, by whomsoever chosen and appointed, are clothed with authority to enact and enforce laws, to sit in judgment over the property and civil rights, the personal liberty, and even the lives of the people; to levy and collect taxes, fees, penalties, and fines of all sorts and descriptions; to issue and to sell bonds; and to appropriate and spend public funds!

HONESTY HAS NO PLACE HERE

Men of too strict integrity, civic honesty, moral force, and independence of thought and action are not favorites with political manipulators because they are less likely to submit to the dictation of selfish, interested, political bosses.

It is a serious question whether or not all public officials and Government employees should not be excluded from all participation in political party affairs. Certainly, no officeholder or Government appointee, or employee, should be eligible to sit as a delegate in a political convention.

The organization and management of a political party should be free from the domination and control of officeholders and their appointees. Some students of politics and government go so far as to advocate the disfranchisement of all officeholders and their appointees and employees. But there is no doubt but that some means will have to be found to curb the domination of political parties by officeholders who have been raised to their positions of honor and trust by the favor of their political party.

FREE SYSTEM FROM POLITICAL OFFICEHOLDERS

This separation of all officeholders, their appointees, and political henchmen from participation in the affairs of the political party which elected them would tend to free the political parties from the domination and control of the office-holding class and the officeholders' personal organizations. This would be a long step toward the reinstatement of representative, free, "government of the people, by the people, and for the people!"

Graft, under the cover of its many disguises and devices, is the malignant canker gnawing at the vitals of our political, social, and economic life. Graft and insatiable greed for money are the growing menace to our civilization.

It was graft that destroyed the great Russian Empire. It was graft in Russian official life that made it possible for Japan to defeat and humiliate that once powerful nation.

The Russian people had been heavily taxed for years to build up and equip modern dreadnaughts and other ships of war; to purchase and manufacture field and heavy artillery, rifles and equipment for large armies, and to build armories and army barracks; in short, to make every preparation for war.

The vast sums of appropriated funds were spent and dissipated, and after war was declared the fact came to light that Russia had made very little preparation for war.

The dreadnaughts that had been dearly purchased and paid for, named, equipped, and manned—on paper—had no material existence.

In the great storage yards where the unmounted cannon were supposed to be kept in readiness for immediate mounting for use when needed, there were found acres covered with wooden cannon, turned from logs to look like real cannon. These dummy cannon had all passed inspection and all exacting vouchers were "officially examined and found correct." Similar conditions were found to exist in other military equipment and army supplies. This simply means that the appropriations of the hard-earned tax money of the people were spent, presumably, for warships, arms, and munitions, army supplies of all sorts, in regular routine manner, the vouchers all properly examined, found correct, and officially signed; but only a mere fractional part of the very essential materials were ever delivered.

The potentially great Russian Empire was defeated and doomed to destruction as the direct consequences of graft.

It is generally known that in the late World War the brave soldiers of the Russian armies were defeated, massacred, and practically annihilated by the German armies partly because the Russian soldiers were practically without arms, ammunition, food, and other essential equipment, but mainly for the reason that these millions of men upon whom the destiny of Russia depended were deliberately sent to the slaughter by grafting Government high officials.

GRAFT HONEYCOMBED BUREAUCRACY

Graft had honeycombed the whole Russian bureaucratic official body politic. Graft had infinitely more to do with the downfall of the Russian Empire than czarism, anarchy, communism, and bolshevism combined.

The indescribable wretched conditions in Russia to-day are but the logical outcome of long years of despotic, centralized, bureaucratic rule in which the official life was permeated with insatiable greed for more power and for larger opportunities for graft.

The bolshevik terrorist dictatorship is the illegitimate offspring of that old debauched official life.

In Russia there is no further excuse for the official grafter. The officials simply take private property with Government approval and human life as well whenever there is any slight pretext for doing so.

OWNERS SHOULD BE BOSSES, NOT OUTSIDERS

Ownership would imply that the owners would be allowed a voice in the management and direction of the essential affairs of the property owned. Whoever has the authority to collect, to hold, and to spend the money of a property or business owns and controls that property or business.

One favorite device of the marauding financiers that is used to despoil the minority stockholders of their rightful share of their earnings is the very common practice of the controlling interests paying inordinate salaries to their officials, presidents, vice presidents, treasurers, attorneys, etc. These salaries are often anywhere from five to ten times the salary that the recipient of it ever did earn, or could get in any other similar position.

Even those comparatively few corporations, including banks, that make some pretense of paying dividends to their stockholders, rarely ever pay their minority shareholders more than a fair rate of interest for their money. In the event that the earnings begin to increase to the point that would warrant an increase in the dividend rate, the salaries of the executives are likely to be substantially increased, or one or more high-salaried officials added.

HOW TO REMEDY THIS INJUSTICE

The first step toward a semblance of economic justice in the organization, financing, conducting, and management of these institutions, is to secure the enactment of laws which will give to each shareholder one vote, and no shareholder more than one vote, in the conduct of the affairs of the bank or business.

All members of all boards of directors, and the principal executive officers, should be chosen on account of their honesty, ability, and demonstrated fitness for the respective positions of responsibility and trust, by the direct vote of the individual shareholders, or by delegates chosen by, and representing the predetermined number of shareholders, each and every stockholder whether holding 1 share or 10,000 shares having the same legal right to one vote, and to but one vote.

When the individual citizen asserts his rights, and comes into possession of himself and of his own, there is likely to be a precipitate descension to the private financial ranks of many a fat exploiting financier who has garnered great store of riches from his depredations on the accumulated savings of minority stockholders.

Let us have democratic government in the control and management of all corporate enterprises, wherein each individual shareholder shall be accorded the same rights and privileges as any other individual stockholder! This is for civic, economic, and political rights and privileges as well as the weighty responsibilities of the individual.

There is always a large element of risk involved in intrusting ones money with impersonal organizations to use, manage, and control without a definite assurance of the return of the money when it may be needed.

STOCKHOLDERS HAVE RIGHTS TO ASSERT

A recent decision handed down by the Illinois supreme court deals a severe blow to the control and domination of any organization by intriguing cliques.

The court decided that the State constitution provided that no corporate stock shall be denied the right to vote. (How can the Federal land bank stock, owned by farmers in Illinois, now be controlled exclusively by Washington politicians, counter to this decision?)

The constitutional provision on which the court based its decision reads: "The general assembly shall provide by law that in all elections for directors or managers of incorporated companies every stockholder shall have the right to vote in person or by proxy for the number of shares of stock owned by him for as many persons as there are directors or managers to be elected * * * and such directors or managers shall not be elected in any other manner." (Obviously, the directors of the Federal land bank serving Illinois have been elected contrary to law, or the Federal farm loan system, as presently administered, does not recognize what is commonly termed State rights.)

AGAIN THE FARMER IS RELIEVED

As Will Rogers says, "The farmer has again been relieved," this time by the fruitless endeavor on the part of the Senate in passing the McNary bill to lift the farmer by his own bootstraps. This is not the first time that Congress has "relieved" the farmer. Not so long ago they passed an amendment to the farm loan act, whereby they took from the farmer owners of the 12 district Federal land banks the stock which thousands of farmers owned, and by placing it in the hands of the political manipulators—the appointees of the Harding and Coolidge administrations, under the supreme control of Andrew W. Mellon—they "relieved" the farmer of millions of dollars worth of bank stock which he owned, for which he was legally forced to pay, and which is his property as much as the soil on his farm which he tills.

Politicians seem to believe that they can erect gigantic paternalistic bureaucracies and thus "relieve" the farming industry. We defy them to name a solitary one that has done other than "relieved" the farmer at his expense and the politician's gain, just as has done the gigantic plunder of the Federal farm loan banks. Although this is the most glaring steal, far outdistancing nefarious Teapot Dome, it is typical of the results achieved by most endeavors to push the farmer into prosperity at the expense of American principles.

RANK SOCIALISM—GOVERNMENT SUPERVISION OF PRIVATE FARM BUSINESS

Is the Government to be made responsible for prosperity and for the success of private enterprises? Until that basic question is definitely answered there will be no sure or sensible avenue of approach to the farm-aid proposition.

Deeply underlying the question of governmental aid to any branch of business is the other basic question, Is a protective tariff a direct aid to particular individuals or lines of business? Is it possible to construct a tariff measure that will give equal protection to all and favors to none? Personally I doubt it. If we really are to have a Government for all the people, we must choose between extending aid to all or to none.

No other question of such far-reaching importance has been before us in 100 years. Are we in the future to continue to build America through individual effort and foresight, through keen competition and individual effort, or are we to allow the Federal Government to spread its protecting care and supervision over all enterprises and by so doing rob us of that enterprise that has made our country commercially the greatest of all in history? The rankest socialism that I can conceive is supervision of private business by the Federal Government.

A PANACEA FOR FARM ILLS

Good sound growth in the cooperative movement has been somewhat retarded in recent years by overenthusiastic persons who have held it up as a panacea for all the ills from which the farmers are suffering. The mere organization of a cooperative association is not the end to be attained. It is only the beginning. Success in cooperation depends on finding men capable of running cooperative associations, on the loyal support of the membership, and on getting a sufficient volume of business. Some converts to the cooperative movement urge that the Government should proceed to organize the farmers in cooperative associations. But if the Government should ask farmers to join some particular cooperative association it would put itself in the position of guaranteeing an enterprise without having an authoritative voice in its management. There is confusion in the minds of promoters of cooperative enterprises as to what the Government may properly do.

SETTING UP BUREAUCRATIC BOARDS

Bills have been introduced in Congress in the last two years which would put the Government squarely into the business of promoting cooperative associations. These bills would set up a great Federal overhead agency and secondary boards of control and would have these bodies assume control of a number of highly important activities.

FARM ORGANIZATIONS SHOULD BE TRULY COOPERATIVE—CONTROLLED BY FARMER STOCKHOLDERS FREE FROM POLITICAL DOMINATION

The relationship of the Government to cooperation should be one of service. It should help the farmers market their crops just as it helps them to produce crops not by doing the work but by supplying information which the farmers can not get for themselves. To go further would be to injure rather than aid the cooperative movement. The need for strong cooperative associations can not be over-emphasized. They are absolutely necessary to bring about efficient and economical marketing and standardization of crops, but the movement should be truly cooperative. It should be controlled by its membership and kept free from domination of Government agencies.

[Extract from address by Judge John D. Miller, attorney and dairy farmer, member of Dairymen's League of New York, and executive of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation]

THROTTLING COOPERATION

If we interpret aright the thought and the purpose of the hosts of farmers making up the members of this federation, it is that in self-help lies the remedy for agricultural ills.

They recognize that as far as these ills are the result of Federal statutes they may be remedied by statute. Speaking broadly, however, the ills are not statutory but economic. Being economic so must be the remedy.

CAN NOT SUSPEND LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND

It may well be that the thousands of farmers' cooperative marketing associations of this country are now at the parting of the ways. Standing together as a unit they can defeat all proposed legislation, much of which, no matter how friendly the intent, would be most harmful.

Farmers engaged in cooperative marketing are not seeking to repeal or suspend the law of supply and demand. Such law, however, does not translate itself into terms of prices. Some one must name a price if commodities are to be bought and sold. Farmers insist that they should have a voice in determining what price is dictated by the law of supply and demand.

Each of the 28 member associations of this federation is engaged in the cooperative marketing of milk and milk products. They are self-help organizations. They are the kind of organizations that the farmers desire, for the farmers created them. They are the result of years of effort and sacrifice, and most of them have now reached a stage of development that indicates that they have come to stay.

POWERFUL INTERESTS OPPOSE FARMERS

Powerful interests have opposed them; powerful interests are now opposing them. In the early days, however, the opposition was in the open and the weapons used were those of a warrior.

Now all this is changed. Those that have heretofore been open in their opposition now profess to recognize that the cooperative milk marketing associations have to stay, and profess to approve of the general principles of such cooperative marketing.

This does not mean that they are not as much opposed to your efforts as ever; it means that they are taking other ways to retard and obstruct your work and perhaps destroy your organizations. The methods they employ are adroit and insidious. They loudly profess approval of cooperative marketing but always disapprove of the particular organizations that the farmers have created for that purpose, and they are seeking in various ways to so mold conditions that they may have a voice in the control of cooperative organizations.

"DEBUNKING" FARM RELIEF BILLS

A pamphlet has been published entitled "The McNary-Haugen Bill: A Frank and Friendly Chat."

"Some people," says the author, "think that every farmer is too much of a numbskull to think out things for himself. Some of us are not * * *. What I have set down is a sort of record of questions asked and my answers. And I defy any level-headed farmer to study the bill as I have studied it without reaching the same conclusions."

HOW IT WOULD WORK

Q. Would the plan raise the price of wheat?—A. Yes; to the consumer 50 cents a bushel; to the farmer, 30.

Q. Please explain as simply as possible.—A. Very well. This illustration is about the same as that given by supporters of the bill in Congress.

Let's assume wheat is $1 a bushel, the world price and domestic price. The farm board decides to put the domestic price to $1.50, which is the tariff, 42 cents, plus freight, 8 cents, added to the American price. To put wheat to that price the board, through its agents, would buy all wheat offered at that price. Part of this wheat the board would export at a 50-cent-a-bushel loss. The remainder would be sold at "an advantageous domestic price" for about $1.50. Operation costs estimated 4 cents a bushel.

Q. Could you give figures on this point?—A. Yes. The United States wheat crop now averages 850,000,000 bushels a year—200,000,000 exported, 650,000,000 consumed at home. Loss of 50 cents a bushel on 200,000,000 exported amounts to $100,000,000. This loss prorated back to the 650,000,000 bushels consumed at home is about 16 cents a bushel.

Q. Getting down to brass tacks, how would the board's operations look?—A. About like this:

Farm board buys surplus and ships it abroad, raising domestic price from $1 to $1.50.

Thirty cents added to farm price. American farmer gets $1.50 minus (a) cost of operation, 4 cents, and (b) loss on exports, 16 cents. Balance due American farmer, $1.30. This leaves a net price elevation to farmer of 30 cents a bushel.

Fifty cents added to American consumer's price, he paying $1.50.

Q. How about the equalization fee?—A. The farmer would pay an equalization fee of 20 cents and get back a price elevation of 50 cents, leaving him a net increase of 30 cents.

Q. Thirty cents a bushel on 850,000,000 bushels equals $255,000,000, the total increase to American wheat growers. How about consumers?—A. American consumers take 650,000,000 bushels at $1.50, a net increase of 50 cents a bushel, or a total of $325,000,000 increase to consumers.

Q. That much would be taken out of the consumer's pocket?—A. Yes. The consumer "pays the freight." Farmers would receive, not pay out, money. The "equalization fee" would be "collected" from them, but not paid in the end by farmers; they would pass it on to consumers.

Q. But aren't the farmers consumers?—A. On that point you are dead right. Farmers themselves constitute a very large part of the total numbers of consumers. That fact is certainly worthy of careful thought. For instance, farmers consume 40 per cent of the wheat grown.

Q. Can you cite an example of a fee being "collected" and not paid?—A. Yes. A farmer at Elk Point, S. Dak., shipped a carload of corn to a Chicago commission merchant. The railroad collected $334 freight from the merchant. But he did not pay this; the farmer did. So it is with this bill. The fee is "collected" from the farmer but the consumer pays.

Q. Now, the psychology of it. Won't the farmer feel he's paying?—A. He won't be conscious of making payment. His crop has been quoted at $1, when the farm board lifted it to $1.30 at the elevator or mill. He enjoys the 30 cents net advance. He will feel no tax is being imposed on him as seller of wheat. The fact is the bill aims to have the equalization fee collected from the elevator or mill or railroad and not from the farmer. So the farmer would not even go through the motions of paying. Hence it is wrong to speak of this fee as a burden borne by producer. If he's a wheat grower, he'll be rewarded, not penalized, for enlarging his crop, for increasing the size of the surplus.

Q. Thirty cents increase in price would give the 2,000,000 United States wheat farmers $255,000,000 total increase?—A. That's right.

Q. And the 50 cents increase to consumers would be $325,000,000?—A. Yes.

Q. Who gets this enormous difference in the farmer's increased price and the price the consumer is forced to pay?—A. Part goes to operation costs. Part to losses on exported wheat. You see, the farm board would export 200,000,000 bushels at $1 a bushel, enough to feed 8,000,000 European families a year. These foreigners would buy this wheat at $1. The bill would tax American consumers, while helping our wheat growers temporarily, and would greatly benefit 8,000,000 families of foreign consumers.

Q. But the bill would raise wheat prices. Isn't that good?—A. Here, my friend, is a monumental weakness. This is called a surplus control bill. Yet the farmer producing the surplus is not penalized. He's rewarded for producing the thing we're supposed to control. So he would produce greater and greater surpluses. It's attractive. The consumer pays the fees, plus charges, costs, and losses. Why not? The very first effect of the law would be an amazing increase in production of the six "basic" crops.

Q. And the final effect?—A. Such startling overproduction of the six crops that prices would crumble to their old levels, and below.

The section "How it would work" concludes with the following paragraphs:

Q. Is this bill, as reported, one of the agricultural West against the industrial East?—A. Perfectly ridiculous. The fact is the agricultural West is now industrialized, and the industrial East is still agricultural. New York and Pennsylvania are "industrialized" while Kansas and Nebraska are called "agricultural." All four States are agricultural. If you will turn to the United States census figures, you will find these facts clearly confirmed. Crop values are about the same in the four States. There are actually more farms in these two Eastern States than in the two Middle Western States. New York has 188,754, Kansas 165,879, Pennsylvania 200,443, Nebraska 127,734, says the 1925 census. So farmers of the East rank with their western brethren.

Q. How about the number of people living on farms?—A. The same census gives Kansas 701,768, New York 767,500, Nebraska 566,660, Pennsylvania 910,847.

Q. Kansas is pretty well industrialized?—A. Very much so. It has 700,000 people living on farms and 1,000,000 living in towns and cities. You need only to turn to the census report to learn the long list of industries actively carried on in that State. The 1919 census reports the industrial products of Kansas as having a value of 109 per cent of the value of that State's farm products. Kansas is an industrial State. Talk of agricultural West against industrial East is pure hokum. Every farm State now has its industries and wants more, to make a home market for its agricultural products.

WHY HAVEN'T FARMERS BUILT ELEVATORS?

If, as the politicians claimed during the debate on the McNary-Haugen bill in the Senate, farmers are so anxious to go into the elevator business, why is it that they have neglected to do so until now? Farmers did not need to wait 300 years to grow corn, tobacco, cotton, wheat, or rye while waiting for Senator MCNARY or Congressman HAUGEN to offer a trumped-up piece of nefarious legislation before they started to work. And by the same token had farmers been as anxious to have gone into business along other lines as these political thinkers seem to believe, they surely would have done it long ago. There is no need of erecting special and cumbersome legislation to effect this; any body of farmers may at any time band together, secure necessary credit through existing banking institutions, and get into business.

Consider the facts below given, and then ask yourself this pertinent question: "If farmers wish, as Senator MCNARY and Representative HAUGEN advise, to go into the grain-elevator business, why have so few done so, with the hundreds of strong farmer grain associations scattered over the country"?

There are 3,338 farmers' associations handling grain in the United States. Among them are some of the best managed country elevators in the world. In spite of our Government's insistence on paternalism to the farmers' elevator movement, however, only about 20 per cent of all country elevators are operated by farmer associations. Evidently there are a few farmers left who are wise enough to specialize in production, rather than marketing and pool shooting.

[Extract from Family Herald and Weekly Star, Montreal, Canada, April 18, 1928]

IS THIS FARM RELIEF?

Will President Coolidge repeat his tactics of last year and veto the new farm relief bill on the ground that it adopted the fixed-price idea?

For although this year's legislation does not in so many words help the farmer by assuring him a profitable price for his wheat, that principle really underlies the whole measure.

So much so that many are pretty certain to claim that the bill was prepared for election purposes only, to win the farmer's vote in this year's political struggle, by representing its opponents as the enemies of the men on the soil.

POLITICAL COOPERATIVE COMPULSION

The measure practically makes cooperative marketing compulsory and imposes a fee upon every bushel brought to elevators so as to form a fund to stabilize prices.

Along with that goes the plan to sell grain to United States customers at an unvarying fixed price set a little higher than that quoted for exported grain.

TAXING CONSUMERS TO PAY FARMERS

Since the greater part of the United States wheat is consumed at home, this means that every bread eater in the country will contribute to the welfare of the farmer.

The argument is being advanced in favor of the measure that in Canada the people already contribute to the farmer's income through the reductions of freight rate imposed upon the national railways, under which the incomes of all the railways—privately as well as publicly owned—have fallen off considerably, the loss falling on the general public.

United States farmers are having a hard time of it, no doubt, though that has not always been the case by any means; but whether the spreading of their losses over the whole body of the people in order to lighten it for them is the best way to help them out is rather problematical.

SANE FARM LEADERS

In the past few weeks we have had the national spectacle of so-called sane farm leaders indorsing the most radical of proposed legislation. Leaders, who, when speaking before their farmer-members, boast of their sane and safe standards, went before Congress and urged the adoption of a piece of legislation which from practically every standpoint was more rank than anything that has ever come out of Russia. And the crime of it was that these leaders did not speak for one-half of 1 per cent of the American farm population. The joke was that they all agreed that the proposed bill was unsatisfactory, but that they insisted that Congress pass it.

The average American farmer is a sane individual, but that he is blessed with radical leadership. This is not strange, for the average farm organization to-day elects its officers in the hand-picked, long-distance method. Only the "chosen" are sent to the State sessions, where another select few "insiders" are elected, delegated to a national session, where still other of the select become officers and leaders of the organization. By the time that the final election takes place, the average farm organization leader is about 1,000 miles removed from the average farmer. This explains why alleged farm leaders make proposals which are contrary to the wishes of the average farmer.

It is to be hoped and much desired that the American farmer will demand, at a very early date, the right to elect his own delegates, each county, for example, sending to the State or the national convention the farmer-elected representatives, from among whom shall be elected officials to really represent agriculture instead of misrepresent it.

It has become increasingly evident in recent months in Washington, especially in the Senate and the House, that representatives are aware that these self-styled farmer representatives only represent themselves and their chosen clique.

The McNary-Haugen bill is as unsound as it is unsafe, yet it received almost 100 per cent indorsement from farm organization leaders, and the pressure they could bring to bear upon Senate leaders, while the so-called "sane" farm organizations were mysteriously quiet. Why?

Let us hope the hour may come, and very soon, when all farm organizations will institute a method whereby State and national officers will be elected by delegates elected by each county unit, and who, when elected to their high offices from the ranks of the average American farmer, may go to Washington and represent rather than misrepresent the farmer. Until that sort of an organization is effected, standing before a committee and declaring that "I represent one or two million farmers," will mean nothing, for members of that committee know, just as the speaker knows, that the alleged farm representative does not represent any such number of farmers, but that he is holding a straw bag before the committee in an endeavor to drive it into doing what a very few desire done, usually because their personal interest or financial welfare may be brightened by the passage of the legislation, rather than because the legislation may bring any relief or comfort to farmers in the aggregate.

ECONOMIC FALLACIES AND FARMING

By George E. Roberts

Why do unsound economic theories bloom in farming sections? Why do ghosts which were laid in the Middle Ages return to plague American farmers?

Few men are better prepared to answer these questions than Mr. Roberts—former director of the United States Mint, nationally recognized as "the apostle of common sense."

ECONOMIC FALSEHOODS

All the falsehoods about economic conditions which are current now have been refuted over and over again, but trying to kill them off is just like trying to kill off the boll weevil or grasshopper family.

Fallacies are kept alive because people believe what they like to believe. They seldom learn by precept or reading. They learn by experience, although this is the costliest and most painful brand of education. We have an increasing residue of knowledge from generation to generation, but it is still true that men think pretty much as their fathers thought.

I can not think at the moment of anything which would produce greater confusion and inequality than an attempt to base the value of commodities and services on the amount of time consumed in producing them. Not every working hour is of equal value. Who supposes a "work unit" would be a proper basis of pay for a lawyer, or for a physician? This fallacy is only another form of the belief that there is something inherently wicked in the gold standard.

The idea of wanting plenty of currency arises primarily from a common misuse of words. We employ words to think with and when we get them wrong we have wrong thinking. It is a stock phrase of the street that money is "tight," or "scarce," and it is natural for people who can not borrow at such times, whether they live on farms or in cities, to believe that if there were plenty of money they would be accommodated.

If I buy a railroad ticket to Washington I'm not paying for the ticket; I'm paying for transportation. If the train gets only to Philadelphia it doesn't help me that there are plenty of tickets, because the greater number of tickets doesn't diminish the distance to Washington.

Paper money is a kind of ticket. It is a device good for a certain value, as a railroad ticket is good for a certain mileage; but it has no value in itself and is not to be confused with value.

I remember that once after a carnival had been held in a small town some children got hold of a roll of unused tickets and went around trying to sell them. They had seen their parents pay 10 cents each for the tickets, and thought the money was for the pasteboard, and they were surprised that nobody would buy from them at the cut rate of a nickel. Currency doesn't make business any more than those tickets made a carnival. What a man has to sell in the way of services or commodities is what makes the mare go. This is what gives him purchasing power by which he can command the products and services of others. So long as currency maintains an intimate relation to goods moving into consumption it is sound. It is retired or extinguished as fast as the goods are consumed. The process is as continuous as a movie, and it is like a movie in that it is made up of a succession of myriad separate acts.

We have talked about a "favorable" balance of trade until a number of minds are mussed up about it. I suppose the use of the word arose from the fact that we speak of drawing a check or draft in favor of another person, and naturally, we think that when money is being paid to us it is a favorable situation. But international trade is on a wholly different basis. It is not to be confused with domestic transactions between individuals. When we speak of the balance due a nation because it has exported more than it has imported as "favorable" we are wide of the mark. It is not favorable to anybody. The ideal condition of foreign trade is a state of equilibrium.

International trade always simmers down to an exchange of commodities. We exchange our cotton for Brazil's coffee. We trade our typewriters and automobiles for European fashions and scenery. We swap steel rails for Japanese silk and oil for Chinese soy beans. If the United States sells one of these countries more than it buys, every effort is made to settle through a third country in which that country has a balance; but if that be inadvisable, gold is shipped. In this case gold serves the purpose of a commodity. It is used because it is a commodity everybody wants.

I do not suppose there is any more persistent fallacy among farmers than the notion that the price of wheat is "jacked up" after it leaves their hands so as to give the dealers big profits. The farmer has been told this for years, and he likes to believe it. Maybe it gives him a sense of martyrdom, which is said to be pleasant. But if you look at a chart of the monthly prices of wheat on the Minneapolis market for the last 29 years, you will find that the average for the highest month, May, was only about 6 cents above the average for the lowest month, September. Six cents is a modest sum to cover warehousing, interest, insurance, shrinkage, and the risk of market fluctuation. The figures have been compiled by various authorities, including the Department of Agriculture, in each case with similar results.

So if the farmer held his grain the charges would not leave him any greater net profit, probably, than he gets when he disposes of it just after the harvest. If he admitted this it would be disturbing, because he has preconceived notions about it. He thinks, like as not, that the dealers and the manufacturers and the bankers have got it in for him. The prosperity of the country depends on his prosperity, and a conspiracy against him would be little less than suicidal. He shuts his eyes to that. Farmers constitute our largest single class of consumers. If they can not buy freely, everybody feels it sooner or later. But political spellbinders seldom tell them so.

UNSAFE FARM LEADERSHIP

Farmers have gone wrong more from poor leadership than from poor reasoning powers. They have been led to believe that they could find political remedies for economic distress.

They knew something was wrong, and when they tried to find out what it was the politicians gave them the wrong answer. Farmers were right when they said our commercial bank system was not well adapted to their wants, for it was devised to accommodate the man with a quick turnover, who could give short-time paper for loans; whereas the farmer does business on an annual basis. Our country bankers, however, always have known how to take care of the good risks pretty well by a system of renewals; and recent legislation has provided abundant additional facilities. The farmer is certainly at no disadvantage in this regard. Indeed, everybody familiar with his condition knows that most of his troubles always have come from too much rather than too little credit.

Some debts can never be paid. The important thing is not to try by artificial and dangerous methods to validate all liabilities and sanctify as vested interests ancient price ratios. The sound method is to proceed by the elimination of the causes of distress, in so far as they are subject to control, to extend necessary sound credits to make the readjustment as painless as possible, and finally, to let the readjustment proceed so that an economic balance may be restored.

[Extract from address delivered by Hon. WILLIAM H. KING, United States Senator from Utah]

PATERNALISTIC PALLIATIVES—FLOOD OF UNSOUND ALLEGED REMEDIES TO ALLEVIATE DISTRESS OF FARMERS

All paternalisms and bureaucracies in the end become despotic and corrupt.

Those most fanatical in pushing socialistic and centralizing policies have been loudest in proclaiming their devotion to liberty, and have maintained that it was a manifestation of personal liberty to voluntarily transfer to bureaus power which individuals possess and should exercise.

People struggle for centuries to wrest power from tyrannous governments and oppressive bureaucracies only to reconfer the same power upon these unsceptered agencies.

Projects for governmental aid and control of individuals and of their lives and activities are presented in most alluring form and the people are silenced in their opposition or seduced into ardent support only to discover too late that they have bartered away precious rights for a mess of pottage, and personal and individual liberty for a corrupting paternalism and a most deadly bureaucracy.

Jefferson said: "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we would soon want bread." Also that "A single consolidated government would become the most corrupt on earth."

We know the highway by history. Thousands of years ago paternalism and bureaucracy produced stagnation, devitalized the people, brought destruction and indescribable woes to the people.

There are those who would make Washington a kind of "Hegelian harmonization" of all differences and variations existing among the people.

Even those who evince the liveliest interest in the welfare of agriculture do not arrive at the same conclusion regarding projects to aid the farmers.

There are many things which legislation can not remedy. Financial depress and economic crises in the United States, as elsewhere, bring forth a multitude of so-called remedies to alleviate conditions and "to help the people." Most of them are unsound economically. Many of them are wholly unconstitutional and a few are temporary palliatives, but seldom are any found which, if put into operation, would bring substantial relief to those in distress.

It is a fact that not only the farmers but manufacturers and millions of American people in all activities of life are heavily involved in debt.

The farmers of the United States are heavily involved, the farms of many are mortgaged, and their credit in some sections is exhausted.

Their financial condition is serious, and it is important that every proper step be taken to bring relief to them. But I do not believe that the farmers of the United States want mere palliative measures; nor do they want paternalistic schemes inaugurated which promise much but in the long run will not only prove disappointing but disadvantageous.

The position of some have impressed me with the thought that they regard the General Government as having unlimited power to deal with questions coming before it, particularly if it could be said that an "emergency" existed.

I believe that to exercise the taxing power of the Government for the purpose of obtaining money to loan directly or indirectly to classes of individuals, or to industries, is, generally speaking, economically unsound. Its reactions are unfortunate and, in substantially all cases, disastrous.

Many people believe that the vaults of the Treasury are available to any section of the country, large or small, in which it is believed an "emergency" exists. What an emergency is, is not defined, nor can it be defined. Does it mean that an emergency exists if the crop of an individual or a county or a State is destroyed? If that condition is an emergency which calls for general Federal taxation to repair the losses or to provide loans to the suffering individual or distressed inhabitants of a State, then it is clear that emergencies exist daily and monthly and annually in various parts of the United States. And if an emergency is created when the farmers of a State lose one or more crops, then an emergency exists when an individual loses one or more crops and his credit is impaired or destroyed. It is simply a question of degree.

If Congress can repair the losses of the farmers of a State or open the Treasury vaults to loan money, then it has the right to loan money to each individual whose crop has been destroyed. And if the people may be taxed to loan to one individual for loss of crop, they may be taxed to loan money to all persons in the United States whose crops have been lost. And if it is an emergency for farmers when they have lost their crops, is it not an emergency for the sheepmen and cattlemen who have lost their flocks and herds? In some of the Western States during 1920 and 1921 nearly all mines were closed. In many instances they have not been reopened. Tens of thousands of persons were ruined, and their properties, owing to the fall in the price of metals and the increase in the cost of mining operations, have become and are practically valueless. Many towns and mining camps were practically abandoned, and thousands of families were compelled to seek new homes and new employment.

The fathers of this Republic, with the lessons of history before them, conceived a system of government so perfect in form and so adjusted in all its relationships as to bring material prosperity and a high degree of liberty and felicity to those living within its borders. Having been subjects of what they conceived to be the oppression of a centralized government, they determined that all sovereignty should rest with the people, and that the General Government should be so limited in its authority as to be prohibited from performing acts or inaugurating policies not authorized by the Constitution.

While the people of nearly all the countries of the world are stripping power from central governments and are strengthening regional governments and local political subdivisions and thus developing the capacity of the people for self-government, we set our faces in the opposite direction and persist in the transference of the power belonging to the people and the States to the Federal Government. The States are becoming atrophied. They are ceasing to function as designed by the Constitution and a powerful federalism is developing which if unchecked, will inevitably draw to itself the reserved rights of the people and the States and culminate in a centralized government so colossal, so far-reaching, and so omnipotent that it will become despotic or fall by its own weight.

The Nation is a "republic of republics." It is not the sea from which the authority is drawn to control the States or the people, but the people within the States are the springs of life and power.

There are those who make Washington a kind of "Hegelian harmonization" of all differences and variations existing in the States and among the people of all the States. The struggle now is to prevent the absorption of the States by the Federal Government. The question is not to save the Federal Government, but the problem now is to save the States. The States are the bulwarks against antirepublican movements—against the evil forces which have robbed people of their liberty and destroyed powerful States. When legislation is the result of hysteria or emotionalism, there is grave danger as to its consequences. People of high ideals, of charitable impulses, of that spirit of service so essential in the complexities of our modern life are easily moved when appeals are made for the relief of the oppressed or those who are in want.

WE MUST RECOGNIZE PROPERTY RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE

I repeat that history and political philosophy alike announce that the greatest progress in all fields of human endeavor is made where personal and property rights are respected, where security under stable laws and governments is obtained, and where the hand of bureaucracy and paternalism does not rest upon the people. Against despotism and bureaucracy and communism the people have struggled, seeking to secure personal rights and free opportunity for the development along the lines of their own choosing.

We must not forget, as Tom Paine says, that "government at its best is a necessary evil, but at its worst it is an intolerable one." The best is that in which there is the greatest personal liberty and the worst and most intolerable one is that of an oppressive paternalism or corrupt bureaucracy. And, it may be added as a corollary that all paternalisms and bureaucracies in the end become despotic and corrupt. Those who have been most fanatical in pushing socialistic and centralizing policies have been loudest in proclaiming their devotion to liberty, and they have maintained that it was a manifestation of personal liberty or at least the realization of individual rights and liberty to voluntarily transfer to bureaus and executive agencies authority and power which individuals and the States possess and should exercise.

It is remarkable that people will struggle for centuries to wrest power from tyrannous governments and oppressive bureaucracies only to reconfer the same upon these unsceptered agencies. Mr. John Stuart Blackie has said that the crimes of history may be summed up in the words "abuse of power." The teaching of history is that power is always abused, and yet when people have won liberty they soon forget their struggles and the despotism from which they have been freed and complacently or at least apathetically view insidious efforts by defeated forces to regain authority, and too often they actively participate in movements which inevitably result in the establishment of old and tyrannous conditions from which by their vigor they have been emancipated.

An examination of the centralizing forces in our Government will reveal how far along the path toward paternalism and centralized authority we have gone. The States are losing their importance, and there is a devolution of many of their functions upon the Federal Government. Before Congress now are bills which would increase the authority of the Federal Government and impose tax burdens upon the people of several billions of dollars. Why can we not remember the words of Jefferson when he said that "a single consolidated government would become the most corrupt government on the earth"? And may I again refer to words of this immortal leader:

"Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we would soon want bread."

And yet Washington is infested with lobbyists and representatives of hundreds of organizations, many of whom seek legislation which would weaken the States and devitalize the people and augment the powers of the Federal Government. A nation-wide propaganda is carried on by many of these agencies, and methods are employed of cajolery and often of intimidation, for the purpose of forcing through measures which are violative of the spirit and letter of the Constitution and of the theory which underlies our political system.

DEBT AND PROSPERITY

It may seem paradoxical, yet facts sustain the statement—the richest farmers in America are the heaviest in debt. The farmer carrying a mortgage is usually the most prosperous, while he who has the least debt, or none at all, is also least prosperous. Possibly you have heard men say that they could drive through the country and pick out the farms sustaining a mortgage. They might guess at it, but it is plain "hokum" to hold such belief.

Let us compare two States, each of about equal land area—Wisconsin, in the far north, and Georgia, in the far south. There are 55,256 square miles of land in Wisconsin and 58,725 in Georgia, so that the Southern State has over 3,000 square miles greater potential farming area. The number of acres per inhabitant are quite similar—13.4 in Wisconsin and 13 in Georgia.

Wisconsin farms carry a mortgage debt of about $360,000,000, while Georgia's farmers owe only about $40,000,000, according to the last census report. Wisconsin has a farm population of about 925,000, while there are 1,685,213 people residing in the Georgia countryside, making for economic production.

Let us see how these two States compare as producers. The average value per acre of crops produced in Wisconsin is $43.81, or a value per farm of all farm crops of $2,353; Georgia's average value per acre is $49.20, and per farm, $1,740. Wisconsin farmers produce and sell $177,000,000 and Georgia farmers $5,500,000 worth of dairy products per year. Wisconsin has 159,610 and Georgia 98,628 farm owners; Wisconsin has 27,258 tenants as against Georgia's 207,000—a ratio of 1 to 7.

It is the same all through. The best agricultural States have the most mortgages and the greatest number of proprietor farmers; the poorest States have the fewest mortgages and fewest owners. The farm mortgage is the poor man's stepping stone to ownership. A poor man can not hope to buy a farm unless he can mortgage it. For example, Iowa owes more on farm mortgages than any other State, nearly $500,000,000. It is conceded to be one of the best agricultural sections on the world map, and yet Iowa's farm mortgage debt is twice the combined mortgage debts of 11 Southern States—Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

The explanation is perfectly easy, but it isn't generally understood. It isn't the mortgage that hurts farming; it's the inability to secure working capital. Wisconsin farmers are about $320,000,000 deeper in debt than Georgia farmers, but Wisconsin farmers are making $613 more per farm operated after paying interest on the debt than are Georgia farmers. It is not such a sin to be in debt as once thought.

FAITH IN FARMING

Both commercial and farm-mortgage bankers deal in credit acceptance; in exchange for the farmer's credit, they loan money for short and long terms. Credit, as a word, was handed down to us from the Latin and means "faith." In other words, the farm financier is a man dealing in faith—the substance of things hoped for. The millions and millions of dollars extended to agriculture is a measure of the faith these bankers have in the future of farming.

The last census shows us the total value of all farm property—land, buildings, machinery, and livestock—in 1919 as $78,000,000,000. The subsequent decline in land values has probably reduced this to seventy-two or seventy-three billions. The Department of Agriculture estimate that the farmer has utilized his credit to the extent of $7,000,000,000 in the form of land mortgages, $3,750,000,000 in bank loans on personal security, and $1,250,000,000 as private personal loans, thus making a total of $12,000,000,000 indebtedness on farm property, or about 16 per cent of the total value.

We often hear of the "sinister interests holding the whip over the farmer." Who holds the twelve billions of loans? Who has this measure of faith in farming? It is shared by banks, loan and trust companies, insurance companies, real-estate agents, mortgage associations, livestock-loan associations, packers, canners, fertilizer companies, storekeepers, and other private individuals, including, of course, the farmer himself. In fact, a survey of one county in Wisconsin showed that only 6 per cent of the farm mortgages were owned by banks and 4 per cent by insurance and trust companies, while 90 per cent of the mortgage loans were obtained privately from small local lenders, a large percentage of the money being loans by one farmer to another. In another case it was found that the farmers of southern Wisconsin bought 66 per cent of the mortgages placed in one northern Wisconsin county.

We need to appreciate these facts, for two reasons. First, that we may stop the hysterical cry against the "predatory selfish interests" of whom the farmer secures his loans; secondly, that we may come to understand that it is childish to believe in the omnipotence of any new-fangled political-finance machinery to be created in Washington, at public expense.

More than half the present farm indebtedness of the Nation is to be classified as a loan of one individual to another. How can any sane-minded individual even suppose that a brand new Government board, even of the most expensive type and most luxuriously housed, bearing a grand title, and located at Washington, supervise, regulate, or to any measurable degree affect the millions of private dickerings underlying these innumerable small loans?

A POLITICAL PANACEA

This leads up to the glittering scheme of a vast export corporation to be conducted by the Government under the McNary-Haugen bill. The farmer does not understand this measure, and is more than half inclined to suspect it. Opponents of the measure have told him, with some show of logic, that this scheme would set up what amounts to an agricultural dictatorship, perpetuating itself through its power to declare emergencies as it sees fit. A direct and heavy tax on every initial sale of the "basic agricultural commodities" is proposed, and in exchange for this, the producer gets absolutely nothing but the hypothetical sale of his exportable surplus in foreign markets which may not even exist.

The bill, to be precise, would impose a direct tax on all wheat as it leaves the farm, the resulting fund to be added to the price received for the exportable surplus. This, it is assumed, would increase the price received for the export wheat by something like 30 cents a bushel. Since domestic wheat prices are regulated by those of the exportable surplus, the beautiful but ludicrous conclusion is drawn that the entire level of wheat values would go up 30 cents, the wheat grower thus making a profit of 23 cents on his tax.

The farmer, however, is not entirely certain about that 23-cent profit on a speculation. He understands pretty well, by this time, that he can not force wheat upon the foreign market without meeting foreign competition as to price.

The simplest law of commerce is that if you flood a market you lower both your own and your competitor's prices. It is not difficult for the canny farmer to see, therefore, that there might, indeed, be no profit at all on his 7-cent investment, and that there might be even a loss, at least of the 7 cents.

The McNary-Haugen bill is an adventure into pure experiment, and in this sense it is somewhat typical of most of the panaceas that have been proposed by the farmer's friends. In consequence, he is beginning to take counsel more with himself than with his political and professional advisers. He has pinned his faith, for example, to cooperative marketing. That is an enterprise of his own that has advanced well beyond experiment both in this and other countries.

FARMERS' PRODUCE MARKET IN THE DISTRICT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration House bill 8298, Order of Business 689, reported favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia, relating to the establishment of a farmers' produce market in the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8298) authorizing acquisition of a site for the farmers' produce market, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase or by condemnation, or partly by purchase and partly by condemnation, as they may deem best, the whole of squares Nos. 354 and 355, as shown on the plat books in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, and when same shall have been acquired to close to public occupation and use as a street all of F Street SW. within the adjacent curb lines of Tenth and Eleventh Streets SW., the area of said squares and the portion of F Street SW. when same shall have been acquired and closed, to be used and occupied by the District of Columbia as and for the purposes of a wholesale farmers' produce market.

For the purposes of such acquisition, including all necessary expenses incident thereto and for the clearing and leveling of the ground and the erection thereon of protecting sheds, and suitable stands and stalls, and the installation of sanitary conveniences and necessary heating and telephone service, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of and charged against the general funds not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury of the United States and against the revenues of the District of Columbia in the same proportion and to be paid in the same way and manner as are other appropriations to cover the expenses of operation and government of the District of Columbia.

And the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to make, promulgate, and enforce all appropriate rules and regulations for the control and operation of such market when established, and may establish a reasonable scale of charges to be paid by farmers and others making use of the market or of any of its appurtenant facilities.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this bill deals with a matter which has engaged the attention of the authorities of the District of Columbia and of the Committees on the District of Columbia of both Houses of Congress for a period of two or three years. The bill has passed the House without serious opposition of any kind and has been considered and reported by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia by a vote of 8 to 3 of its members.

The purposes of the bill, and the reasons for its report and its passage, are set out very explicitly in the majority report of the committee, which is upon the desks of Senators; and at this particular time I do not know that it is necessary for me to discuss in any detail the matters set forth in the report. I shall claim the privilege of closing the debate on the bill, if there should be debate, and of answering as completely as I may any objections that may be urged to its passage.

I think we shall have a very ingenious and delightful speech on the subject from the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who before the committee opposed the passage of the bill. Specious and interesting, it may momentarily confuse the judgment and mislead the opinion of the Senate. Therefore I shall ask Senators to await the counter argument on the bill before permitting themselves to think that the address of the Senator from Maryland is anything more than a charming fiction.

Unless the Senator from Maryland desires to repeat here and to elaborate his objections to the bill, I shall ask for an immediate vote.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the first thing I should like to fix in the minds of the Senate in connection with this bill is the unusual phenomenon that the chairman of the Senate committee, the chairman of the House subcommittee, and the Secretary of Agriculture are all opposed to the bill. Moreover, every citizens' association in the entire District of Columbia, as far as I have been able to learn, has considered the matter and gone on record in opposition to it.

I just want to read the names of some of those associations:

First, the Secretary of Agriculture.

Second, the Citizens' Advisory Council of the District of Columbia, consisting of representatives of all the associations in Washington.

The Community Improvement Association.
The General Citizens' Committee of the District of Columbia.
One hundred and thirty-five market dealers in Center Market.
Fifty-eight market dealers on Louisiana Avenue.
The Columbia Heights Business Men's Association.
The Mid-City Citizens' Association.
The Rhode Island Avenue Citizens' Association.
The Stanton Park Citizens' Association.
The Piney Branch Citizens' Association.
The Benning Citizens' Association.
The Manor Park Citizens' Association.
The Mount Pleasant Citizens' Association.
The Lincoln Park Citizens' Association.
The North Capitol and Eckington Citizens' Association.
The Brookland (D. C.) Citizens' Association.
The Takoma Park (D. C.) Citizens' Association.
The Dahlgren Terrace Citizens' Association.
The Cathedral Heights Citizens' Association.
The Michigan Park Citizens' Association.
The Central Citizens' Association.
The Northeast Washington Citizens' Association.
The Columbia Heights Citizens' Association.
The Brightwood Park Citizens' Association.
The Congress Heights Citizens' Association.
The Chillum Heights Citizens' Association.
The Women's City Club.

And I might go on and add to that list many other names that I have here. So that the Senate is now considering a matter of local government for the District of Columbia in which every single, solitary organization in the whole city is in opposition to the bill as reported.

The District has no representative in the Senate. It has no representative in the House. If it had a mayor and a city council, we would not take five minutes in the location of this market; but because the people of the District have no representative in this body they are dependent upon the fair judgment and the honest treatment of the Senate for the consideration that is their due.

Think of it! Think of it! The very people for whom this market is to be built are, with singular unanimity, opposed to the site selected. The Secretary of Agriculture, the man who is supposed to be in close contact with the production end of agriculture as well as the consuming end of it, through the experts in his office has submitted to the committee a report condemning the location of the market on the rim of Washington, the southwest site, away down on the water front.

Inasmuch as this matter affects Washington, inasmuch as the market is to be built out of the revenues of the taxpayers of Washington, inasmuch as the citizens affected by it are the citizens of Washington, I can not see how we can possibly say, "Regardless of what you want, regardless of the fact that we are using your money to build this market, we are not going to build it where you want it, where you think it is advisable to build it, but, on the contrary, we are going to tell you where we think it is better suited for your needs than where you think it should be located."

Where is the market to be located, under the bill now before the Senate? Think of it, Senators! It is to be located south of the Mall, on the river. Washington can never expand to the south, because the Potomac River adjoins the proposed market site. All the people who now live in Washington are northward of the site proposed, and all the growth will be in that direction. So that instead of putting the market in some central location, where it will more conveniently serve all of the people of the city, we are asked to go down on a little strip of land on the Potomac River and force the people in all the northern, western, and eastern districts to cross G Street, F Street, E Street, and Pennsylvania Avenue, through all the traffic on those streets, in order to go down and buy directly from the men who have the produce to sell. We talk about traffic congestion, talk about the traffic in Washington not being well regulated; yet we are going to force the people to go all the way through that congestion, and to come all the way back again, if they want to go to the market to buy produce from the producer.

On the other hand, it has been shown by the Bureau of the Census that the center of population in this city is about Fourth and L Streets NW., and that it is continually moving northward, so that the center of population is moving away from this market site all the time; and as Washington builds up here and there, through the now thinly settled sections of the city, the town will be built away from the site proposed for a market which is supposed to serve the people of this city.

Citizens have been here and protested. They pointed out argument after argument before the committee. They have asked that the market be not placed there, where they can not get to it, where it can not expand. All the farmers of Maryland who sell in the market and over half the farmers of the State of Virginia who bring their supplies to the market have protested against it. Most of the commission merchants who will have their places of business near the market have protested against it. So that we have the spectacle of the men who will sell in the market—practically all of them, certainly over three-fourths of them; I should say over 90 per cent of them—protesting against the location of the market at this place; and all the people who will use the market, without any exception—that is, as far as the city of Washington is concerned—protesting against this site for a market. Yet we say, "You people who sell in the market and you people who buy in the market can not have your wishes respected."

Moreover, the bill will not stand the tests of the courts. I am satisfied, and I shall try to point out, that in a court of law it can not be sustained for this very good reason: The old market was built with funds partly collected from the taxpayers of the District of Columbia on ground designated by Congress for that purpose. The sheds have been taken down and the land turned over to the Federal Government without authority, compensation, or exchange, although the market belonged to the people of the District of Columbia. Yet it is proposed to tax them to buy a new site and build a new market. Furthermore, it is proposed to put it in a place to which these taxpayers, who have spent their money for market purposes with unanimity, are opposed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator alluded to a market having been sold and the proceeds derived from the sale placed in the Treasury. To what market does he refer as having been sold?

Mr. TYDINGS. The farmers' produce market, which was torn down. I do not know whether it was sold or not, but the land was taken over by the Federal Government as a site for the new United States Internal Revenue Building.

Mr. KING. To which market does the Senator refer? Where was it located?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is the one that has just been destroyed to make way for the public-building program. I have forgotten the exact street, but we all know where the market is.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it not a fact that the act of 1870 creating this old market specifically vested the title to the property, both real and personal, in the District of Columbia?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; that is correct; but notwithstanding that, we come along and virtually set aside property rights belonging to taxpayers of this city, and then we say to them, "We are not only going to take your market but we are going to tax you to buy a new one, and not only that but we are going to locate it in a place opposed by the great mass of people of the District of Columbia."

What argument is there for putting it down on the southwest site? What group of people have advocated its location there? I leave that to the Senator from Virginia to point out. I think we will find, if he will deal with the facts, which I know he will, in a fair manner, open and above board, that a certain transportation system for selfish reasons wants the site down in the southwestern part of the city of Washington.

The Senator will not be able to show any people, or certainly any considerable number of people, in the District of Columbia, who will agree that the farmers' produce market should be relocated on the site proposed in this bill.

Senators, this is nothing more nor less than class legislation. We have the striking illustration of an attempt to locate a great public-service institution not where the people want it, not where the people who make their living in the institution want it, but where one corporation—not a Washington corporation either—wants it placed, simply because of their desire for the cold-blooded commerce which they themselves may be able to stimulate to their own selfish interests, without any regard for the people for whom the market really should be built.

From any point of view this legislation is ill advised. Just think of it; here was a bill introduced in the House of Representatives contrary to and in direct conflict with the report of the District Commissioners, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Capital Park and Planning Commission, the United States Bureau of Efficiency, as well as several nationally known city planning and engineering firms. It was introduced for and is sponsored by a small group who would financially benefit by its passage. After it was introduced I wrote to the District Commissioners. I told them I thought they were in duty bound to express their opinion either in approval or in opposition to this location. I received an answer from them, which I have here, but will not read unless some one wants to hear it, which says, in effect, that they had made a report and could add nothing more at this time. That report was made, however, three weeks before the Stalker bill was introduced, and I call particular attention to the fact that they do not put their stamp of approval on it. The commissioners recommended encouraging retail features and warned against ill advised and premature action—the bill calls for "wholesale" only, and immediate action.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, has it been disclosed in any of the hearings, or has it come to the Senator, exactly who the individual or individuals were prompting the introduction of this bill in the House?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I could answer that question accurately, but in truthfulness some of the answer would be a matter of speculation. A short while ago I referred to the influence which I think was responsible for the introduction of the original bill.

Mr. BAYARD. In other words, it was not an influence flowing from citizens of this city?

Mr. TYDINGS. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. Entirely from outside influences?

Mr. TYDINGS. Exactly. Mr. President, I want to read a table showing the prices of food, to show the economic importance of this matter. I have a letter from the superintendent of markets of the District of Columbia, which I think is well worthy of the consideration of everyone who is interested in this subject. Mr. George M. Roberts, superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia, has written me this letter in reply to one which I sent to him:

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
DEPARTMENT OF WEIGHTS, MEASURES, AND MARKETS,
April 10, 1928.

Hon. M. E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: In response to your letter of April 4, I beg to state that I do not have compiled very extensive data in regard to retail prices of produce on the farmers' market as compared with prices in the retail stores, although I have made some comparisons from time to time. It is known, however, that persons who have gone to the farmers' market to buy at retail have been able to obtain commodities at much lower prices than they have been able to obtain in the stores. This is especially true during the heavy trucking season. As a result, the retail business at the farmers' market has reached considerable proportions since shelters and other improvements were built 12 or 14 years ago.

In order to furnish you as definite information as possible in response to your inquiry, I had a woman buyer go to the farmers' market last Saturday and purchase certain commodities at retail. I then had her go to a retail store located in a populous residential section and buy the same quantities of the same commodities, and of as near the same quality as possible as she had previously purchased on the same day at the farmers' market.

The inclosed statement shows the result.

Trusting that this is the information you desire, I am,

Respectfully yours,

GEO. M. ROBERTS,
Superintendent Weights, Measures, and Markets, District of Columbia.

Inclosed in the letter is the following table:

COMPARISON OF RETAIL PRICES

Following is a comparison of prices at farmers' produce market and at a local retail grocery store. Comparison was made by means of actual retail purchases of same quantities of the same commodities of similar quality at both places on Saturday, April 7, 1928:

	Farmers' produce market	Grocery store
2 dozen eggs	$0.56	$0.70
2 pounds sausage	.50	.80
4 pounds dressed chicken	1.20	2.00
5 bunches onions	.05	.20
½ bushel potatoes	.65	.75
3 pounds kale	.25	.35
4 bunches rhubarb	.30	.60
2 pounds butter	1.00	1.20
Total	4.51	6.60

That shows a flat increase of almost 33⅓ per cent at the grocery store over what the same articles cost at the farmers' produce market.

The purpose of this bill, as far as I can see it, is to destroy all consumer buying from the producer without the middleman. It is to do away with that stabilizing influence on the prices of food throughout the District of Columbia and vicinity.

Mr. President, before taking up some of the other factors that enter into the consideration of this question, I would like to take up the size and grade of the southwest site, to show that even if we did acquire this site we could not reasonably build a market on it. Just think of this as a site for a market. Here is a survey which shows that the southwest corner elevation is 9.83 feet above sea level. The southeast corner is 18.34 feet above sea level, or 9 feet higher. The northeast corner is 33.30 feet above sea level, or 22 feet higher in the air than the eastern side of the market. The northwest corner is approximately the same height. So it is apparent that the southwest corner of this site is more than 23 feet lower than the northeast corner and 8½ feet lower than the southeast corner. Bear with me, and listen to this:

This means that approximately 46 steps will be required to climb from the lowest to the highest point of this site, or that this difference in elevation will have to be overcome by means of ramps, either of which would be awkward and might prove dangerous when the market is crowded with buyers.

This information I obtained from the United States Bureau of Efficiency just this morning. They further state:

This combined site is surrounded on all sides by parking and sidewalks. The parking is 23.8 feet wide on Eleventh Street, 24 feet wide on G Street, 15 feet wide on Tenth Street, and 15.5 feet wide on E Street. The sidewalk is 8.5 feet wide on G Street and 12 feet wide on the other three streets.

Assuming that F Street is closed and that the parking and sidewalks on the other streets are preserved, the proposed site will provide only 350 stalls, each 8 feet wide. If F Street is not closed the proposed site will provide only 300 stalls. If F Street is closed and the parking and sidewalks are not preserved, but are absorbed in this site, provision can be made for 450 stalls. If F Street is not closed but the parking and sidewalks are used as a part of this site provision can be made for 400 stalls.

The above figures are based on sheds 40 feet wide from eave to eave, with a paved walk 22 feet wide under each shed, and driveways 55 feet wide between the covered walks—that is to say, the sheds would be 77 feet on centers—all of which figures approximate closely those which existed at the old farmers' market site.

An analysis of the layout of the southwest site as planned by the commissioners shows that it will provide only 300 stalls and not 500 stalls as claimed.

If F Street is closed and made a part of the site, provision can be made for 350 stalls.

If F Street is closed and made a part of this site and if the public parking and sidewalks surrounding this site are absorbed as a part of the site provision can be made for 450 stalls.

Therefore we are not going to have sufficient stalls or as many as there are now. Moreover, we would have a site which could not be expanded for future needs. It is proposed to locate the market where it can not reasonably be expanded, with 46 steps from the top to the bottom, and only 350 stalls to take care of the business.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. The information has come to me that practically all organizations interested in marketing, as well as the people generally, are against the provisions of the bill now before the Senate, locating the market in the southwestern part of the city. Am I correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. GOODING. Then why do we want to undertake to force something down the throats of the people of Washington which they can settle best for themselves?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I am trying to find out. I am trying to find out why it is that with every organization in town, with all the farmers in Maryland who sell at the market and over half of those in Virginia who sell at the market, with all the commission merchants who sell at the market, and with the taxpayers who are to put up the money to build the market, we have no voice in the District crying for the location of the market on the southwest site. The relocation of the farmers' produce market there will be evidence of the fact that the people of the District of Columbia are deprived of the small remnant of local self-government which has been left them.

Mr. GOODING. I am in favor of giving the people of Washington local self-government, even going much further than permitting them to locate their own market. I would give them a government of their own so they could take care of their own affairs. They would be better off and the Congress would be better off if they had local self-government.

Mr. TYDINGS. If they had local self-government on this occasion, with a city council responsive to their wishes, it would not be very long before they would decide that the southwest site should not be selected.

Mr. GOODING. That is true so far as the information that comes to me is concerned.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I would like to ask the Senator from Maryland if the various civic organizations mentioned by him are in favor of the Eckington site, which I understand the Senator favors?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very glad the Senator anticipated me by asking the question. Unlike the bill now before the Senate, which picks out without any study, without any recommendation, without any justice, a single, solitary site away down on the edge of the District of Columbia, the amendment which I propose would provide that—selection of land acquired under the provisions of this act shall be made jointly by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Director of the office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and the Secretary of Agriculture, or some official of the Department of Agriculture designated by the said Secretary for that purpose.

I do not attempt to say where the site shall be. I am willing to leave it to the people of the District.

I am not trying to select a site. I realize that I am incompetent to do it. I am not a representative of the people of the District in the primary sense of the word; neither am I an expert on markets; neither am I an expert on agriculture. I am content to leave the problem with those who do represent the people of the District, with the Secretary of Agriculture and with the other governmental agencies here constituted, who are in the best position to know where the market should be placed.

I ask the Senator from New York why he should pick this one site and deny to those who, I believe, are better qualified than he is on this matter, the discretion to select a site where it will best serve the citizen needs of the District.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has asked me a question and I want to answer it. The Senator from Maryland surely wants to be fair with the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do, indeed.

Mr. COPELAND. We are discussing here in blanket form two different markets. This is not the Center Market which we are discussing, where the citizens go to buy produce. It is the farmers' wholesale market, where the produce is brought in to supply the hotels, boarding houses, and the large establishments of the city. If we were talking about Center Market, and if the matter before us were that market, which is the retail market, I would join with the Senator from Maryland, but I would not go then to Eckington. I would go out to mid city on Georgia Avenue near the ball park.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am satisfied to go there.

Mr. COPELAND. That is where the Center Market should go. I have no doubt that is where the Center Market will go. But we are not talking now about the retail market. We are talking about the wholesale market, the farmers' market, and that is what the Senator should discuss in his speech.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is very odd that all of the commission merchants in the District, all of the farmers to whom the Senator has just referred, who are going to use the market which we are now debating, and all the people who are going to buy at the market, should be opposed to the views he has expressed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. But, of course, the Senator knows that that proposition is very sharply contested. The opposition contended that not one tithe of the produce people are in favor of his proposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. Where is the record?

Mr. GLASS. I will present it at the proper time. The Senator is talking about the comparatively few, the almost insignificant number of truckers in the immediate vicinity of the District in Maryland and Virginia. That is what he is talking about. They do not furnish one tithe of the produce that is sold at this market.

Mr. TYDINGS. For whom is the Senator talking?

Mr. GLASS. I am talking for the sensible thing to do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know that is the Senator's idea, but for what group of people is he speaking?

Mr. GLASS. I am talking for the people who send produce to Washington to be consumed by the people of Washington.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator name one?

Mr. GLASS. The people who send produce here.

Mr. TYDINGS. Name one?

Mr. GLASS. They are from here to California and from here to Florida, and not one tithe of them are located in either Maryland or Virginia.

Mr. TYDINGS. Can they not sell equally well if we locate this market where the people of Washington want it?

Mr. GLASS. I will show what difficulty they would experience in sending their produce there, taking it almost to Baltimore and bringing it back.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to anticipate the Senator by reading a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission showing the movement of perishable produce to the District of Columbia. First, I will read a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 9, 1928.

Mr. S. B. SHAW,
Chief Inspector University of Maryland Extension Service,
Maryland State Department of Markets, College Park, Md.

DEAR SIR: The commission is in receipt of your letter of February 7, requesting information as to whether there is any difference in freight rates on shipments of fruit and vegetables from points in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas, when consigned for shipment to Washington, D. C., for delivery at the Pennsylvania Railroad terminal, Fourteenth and B Streets SW., as compared to shipments for delivery at the Baltimore & Ohio railroad terminal at Eckington.

An examination of the tariffs on file with the commission indicates that rates for Baltimore & Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad deliveries at Washington are the same. As an illustration, we find that the rate on peaches from Fort Valley, Ga., to Washington, D. C., for delivery to the Pennsylvania Railroad at their Fourteenth Street yards and for delivery to the Baltimore & Ohio at their Eckington yards is $1.20 per 100 pounds, plus a refrigeration charge of $77.50 per car. The rates from Sanford, Fla., on cabbage in car lots is $1.09 per 100 pounds for delivery on either one of the above lines plus a refrigeration charge of $70 per car. The rate on apples in car lots from Portland, Oreg., to Washington for delivery either at the Baltimore & Ohio Eckington yards or the Pennsylvania Fourteenth Street yards is $1.50 per 100 pounds, plus a refrigeration charge of $100 per car.

There is a difference in the rate on vegetables from near-by points. For example, from Rockville, Md., on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad to Washington the rate for Baltimore & Ohio delivery on potatoes is 13 cents per 100 pounds, while for Pennsylvania delivery it is 15½ cents. On business from Bowie, a local point on the Pennsylvania Railroad, the rate for Pennsylvania delivery is 13 cents, while the rate for Baltimore & Ohio delivery is 15½ cents per 100 pounds.

The only way where a higher rate would be charged for Baltimore & Ohio delivery than for Pennsylvania delivery would be where the shipment was billed for delivery at the Pennsylvania yards and after reaching that point reconsigned to the Baltimore & Ohio yards. This would bring about an additional charge for reconsigning, switching, etc.; but, as indicated, if the shipment in the first place was routed for Baltimore & Ohio delivery by the shipper they would enjoy the same rate as shipments billed for Pennsylvania delivery; vice versa, a shipment billed for Baltimore & Ohio delivery, and after reaching the Baltimore & Ohio yards reconsigned to the Pennsylvania yards, an additional charge would be made for reconsignment, switching, etc.

Respectfully,

G. B. MCGINTY, Secretary.

It was contended at the hearings before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia that there would be the greatest confusion in the District, that the railroad consignments would be all delayed, and that was one of the arguments in favor of placing the market on the southwest site. I am going to send to the desk and ask the clerk to read a letter which is part of the record on file with the Senate committee, showing that from November 1 to November 30 every day there were cars moved from one railroad to the other, and that the longest time consumed in moving the cars from one railroad to the other was 3 hours and 10 minutes; and in addition to that it was all done after midnight, so that when daylight and the morning came the car was spotted at its proper place before the trucks of the consigners arrived to haul it away. Moreover, this saved long hauls through down-town traffic.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield again to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Right in this connection may I ask the Senator from Maryland how many cars of farmers' products, out of 2,621 cars for a given period, were consigned to the Baltimore & Ohio as contrasted with the Pennsylvania?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know. I have not those figures.

Mr. GLASS. I have them right here, and they are available to the Senator. Out of the total number of 2,621, there were 2,304 consigned to the Pennsylvania Railroad and but 317 consigned to the Baltimore & Ohio.

Mr. TYDINGS. But I have just explained to the Senator that it does not make any difference to which railroad they are consigned. The fact is—and the Interstate Commerce Commission has substantiated it in the letter just read—that if it is designated that the freight shall be shipped by the Baltimore & Ohio, for example, to the Pennsylvania freight station or by the Pennsylvania Railroad consigned to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, first, there is no increase in freight rates, and, secondly, the cars have been spotted by actual count over a period of a month within 3 hours and 10 minutes after they arrived in Washington.

Mr. GLASS. I am not talking about the freight charge. For that matter, the freight charge from Florida, Georgia, or South Carolina to Baltimore, which is 40 miles farther than Washington, might be the identical freight charge to Washington. I am talking about the convenience under existing conditions; I am talking about the source of farmers' produce supplied to the people of Washington, and under existing conditions it will not be altered by the location of the market in the southwest, which is merely five blocks from the existing market. Three hundred and seventeen cars of produce were consigned to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, while the source of the other 2,317 was the Pennsylvania Railroad and the railroads coming from the South.

Mr. TYDINGS. That may be true, but that will not materially affect anything, because I have just attempted, at least, to show, and I think I did show, that regardless of where the produce comes from, regardless of where it is going, if it is consigned to Washington it will be delivered just as quickly; and it does not make any difference to me if it comes on the Pennsylvania or the Baltimore & Ohio or the Southern Railroad or any other railroad.

Mr. GLASS. It can not be delivered just as quickly. It may be delivered at the same rate of charge, but not just as quickly by any manner of means.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am talking about after it reaches the District of Columbia; and I have put into the RECORD the figures for the whole month of November as to the exchange of cars to show that it requires only a few hours at midnight to shift the cars.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the discussion of the Senator from Maryland is centered once more about Eckington in contrast to the southwest site, because if a mid-city site is chosen—and that is what the citizens want for a retail market——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not arguing for any proposed site.

Mr. COPELAND. It can not have any——

Mr. TYDINGS. I am for leaving the question to the people, who are better qualified than is any Member of the Senate, to select the site, and not to have some previously selected site chosen by a small group of people and rammed down the throat of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me——

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I will.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has made reference to the produce brought over the railroads. If the market shall be put in the mid-city site, where the citizens want it, where all the people to whom the Senator has referred want the market, there can be no railroad service at all. So if there is to be railroad service, the market must be located either in the southwest or in Eckington. If it shall be in Eckington, I want to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. TYDINGS. But I ask the Senator from New York to understand that I am not advocating any site.

Mr. COPELAND. No; but I want to discuss the matter with the Senator for one moment, and then I shall sit down. The fact that if the market goes to Eckington, where the Senator wants it——

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want it to go to Eckington. I do not want to be quoted in that way. That is the reason I am interrupting the Senator from New York. I do not care where the site goes so long as the proper authorities select it.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Maryland wants the market located on the Patterson site.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry the Senator from Virginia has said that, if he has said it seriously, because I have an amendment here that will disabuse his mind.

Mr. GLASS. I listened to the Senator very intently when he appeared before the committee, as I did to every other witness, and obtained the very distinct impression that the Senator was in favor of the selection of the Patterson site.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I can find the place, I will read from the hearings before the committee.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact——

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me correct the statement of the Senator from Virginia, because I do not want to be put in that light. I said before the committee that I was appearing in advocacy of no particular site, but I was in opposition to the southwest site. I am going to read my own statement, and I beg the Senator to withdraw his remarks when I show him that he is wrong.

Mr. GLASS. I say I got the impression that the Senator from Maryland was for the Patterson site. As a matter of fact, all of the sites suggested north of Pennsylvania Avenue are in a conspiracy, first, against the southwest site and then to fight among themselves as to which site shall be chosen for the market. That was brought out over and over again.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Maryland has made reference to the fact that if the southwest site shall be chosen, somehow or other it will favor the Pennsylvania Railroad——

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not care if it does, if it is a wise choice.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the statement of Mr. Milton D. Campbell, in which he brought out this point:

> On the other hand, not one pound of fruit or produce which comes from Florida or Georgia or the Carolinas could reach the Baltimore & Ohio terminal except when it was turned over to the Baltimore & Ohio at Potomac yards and then brought through the city, carried out into Maryland, and then brought back into the city yards.

Then I asked him this question:

> I would like to have you repeat, if you will, the fact you brought out about the railroad. I do not think I understood that completely. If brought on the Baltimore & Ohio, where does it have to go?

This is his reply:

> Mr. CAMPBELL. It comes in over the southwest over the Pennsylvania tracks, goes through the city, just this side of Benning, and then is shifted from the Pennsylvania siding over the Baltimore & Ohio track. It is a branch line which goes out 6 miles and goes across the country to Maryland, to Hyattsville, and then comes back to the city over the Baltimore & Ohio main line.

If the Senator wants to have the produce of the country brought to Washington by that indirect method, of course that is his choice.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just to clear up the point, I have shown that there is no increase in charge. As to the element of time I ask that there be read from the desk a communication showing the leaving time of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac from Potomac yards and arrival time at Washington, D. C. I dislike to take the time of the Senate to have it read, but I wish to show that there is no extra cost and no loss of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask that the remainder of the communication be inserted in the RECORD unless some Senator desires it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The entire communication is as follows:

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD CO.,
Baltimore, Md., December 3, 1927.

Mr. W. I. BISHOP,
Industrial Agent, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.,
Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request, I am giving below figures showing the leaving time of R., F. & P. 97 from Potomac yard, and arrival time at Washington, D. C., as taken from our train sheet, which is the official record:

Nov. 1	1.50	3.44	1 54
Nov. 2	1.25	4.35	3 10

[1] Accident on this day—train handled through Washington Terminal.

Very truly yours,

C. S. HOSKINS, Superintendent.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I do not want to interrupt the continuity of the Senator's speech, and I shall not undertake to do it again; I want him to finish his speech, and I merely desire to reply to it at the proper time. Right here, however, it seems pertinent to suggest that the Senator, in the opening of his remarks, for the apparent purpose of prejudicing the case, though that may not have been the motive, undertook to point out that some mysterious railroad influence had interjected itself into the discussion of this problem. I wish to say that I have had no communication from the Pennsylvania Railroad, but the Senator seems to have been in contact with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to answer the Senator's remarks, and then I am going to ask him a question.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, let me clear up the point suggested by the Senator from Virginia, and then I will yield. I have never received any communication from the Baltimore & Ohio directly or indirectly, nor have I talked with anyone representing that railroad directly or indirectly. The superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad, who lives in Maryland and is a very warm and good friend of mine, did come here and asked me not to make the fight that I am making to-day. He is the only railroad official that has spoken to me, and he is one of the best friends I have in the State. I told him that I had gotten into this thing, and, notwithstanding my regard for him and my desire at all times to do all I could for him, it looked to me to be so outrageous and so unfair, there was so much of demerit in the southwest site, that I would not go along with the Pennsylvania Railroad in its fight. Therefore, having shown that the only influence which has been brought to bear on me from a railroad source was one asking me to do just the opposite to what I am now doing, without wishing to be personal and in the best of spirit, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if the other day he was not riding with one of the District Commissioners and a representative of a railroad in Washington looking over some of the various sites around the town?

Mr. GLASS. Not to my knowledge; I was not.

Mr. TYDINGS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I heard that he was. I did not know whether it was so or not.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know any man——

Mr. TYDINGS. It would have been perfectly proper.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know any man connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad; I have not even a personal acquaintance with the gentleman who sells me a ticket occasionally at the Union Station, and no representative of any railroad, so far as I am aware, has ever approached me on the subject of the location of this market, nor furnished me with any information or data of any description.

Mr. TYDINGS. I feel in honor bound to say to the Senator that I had no idea of reflecting upon his integrity. It would have been perfectly proper to have gone around and listened to their arguments. I had no idea of saying there was any undue influence.

Mr. GLASS. It so happens that I am not conscious of having listened to the argument of any railroad representative, and I was simply calling attention to the fact that if there had been any mysterious railroad influence in the matter it had not reached me.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly, the only influence that has been brought to my attention is that which I am now fighting. The position of the Pennsylvania Railroad in this matter, in my opinion, is selfish, cold-blooded, and narrow. It wants to use the Government money to build a freight yard on a site alongside its own tracks, with every citizens' organization in town opposed to it and with all the farmers who sell at the market opposed to it.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the speciousness of that argument will be shown very definitely; but I assume the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is patriotic and that it has no selfish interest whatsoever to subserve.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think so; I do not think any of the railroads are patriotic; but I think it is to the merit of my cause, as I think the Senator will concede is not so in the effort which he is making, that I am not advocating any site, while the Senator is advocating a site which the railroad company wants.

Mr. GLASS. I will not concede that at all. On the contrary, I expect to show that the Senator is advocating a site to the exclusion of every other site which has been suggested.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will show me that now, I will not utter another word on this bill.

Mr. GLASS. That would simply terminate one of the most delightful and interesting recitals, without any foundation in fact, to which I have ever listened. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. I have an immediate method of discounting what the Senator has just said in a way that he can not controvert, and that is that I have an amendment pending before this body which was offered on March 27, 1928, to the bill now before the Senate——

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I have read it very carefully.

Mr. TYDINGS (continuing). Which does not name any site, but which leaves the selection of the site up to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Director of the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator who was the prime mover in selecting the site incorporated in the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. GLASS. The prime mover?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is it not a remarkable situation that we have before us a committee report on a bill not brought in here by a single agency connected with the District of Columbia?

Mr. GLASS. It is brought here upon the recommendation of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have a letter from them right here which I will read, showing that they refused——

Mr. GLASS. Oh, they refused to enter into this later discussion and agitation that the Senator has stirred up; but, as a matter of fact, incorporated in the House report and incorporated in the Senate report is the report of the District Commissioners advocating the location of this market where the report recommends.

Mr. TYDINGS. But here is the history of this bill. Think of it! A bill is introduced in the House of Representatives directly contrary to a report on the market situation submitted to Congress three weeks before by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, with everyone denying knowledge by whom and from where. As the commissioner's report seemed to be used and erroneously understood to approve the Stalker bill, I wrote and asked them whether they were for this site or against it, and in a few minutes I will read their letter, in which they refuse to answer my inquiries and state that they can add nothing more to their report at this time.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator should be fair to the District Commissioners.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not unfair to them.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, the District Commissioners had public hearings over and over again on this bill and based their recommendation upon the ascertained facts in the case, and they recommended this southwest site.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me answer the Senator from Virginia; and then I will yield to the Senator, if he does not mind. I wrote to all three of the commissioners.

Mr. GLASS. I know what the Senator wrote. I have said that the commissioners now decline to be drawn any further into the matter and stand upon the recommendation they originally made.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to draw them in. I simply asked them if they were in favor of or against the bill. Good heavens! If the official representatives of the people of the District can not say they are for or against it——

Mr. GLASS. I have already said that they are for this site, and they decline to change their attitude.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have a written report here to the contrary, and I am just going to read a letter or two. I will ask the clerk to do it. I should first like to have read my letter to the District Commissioners, and then I should like the letter of Mr. Dougherty in answer thereto read.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator, I hope, is aware of the fact that this matter was heard before the District Committee of the Senate in the last session. We had an extended hearing. At that time the commissioners were represented, and the testimony was brought before us, and, as I recall, an out-and-out recommendation was made of the southwest site; and that was the reason, I think, that some of us who served on the committee before regarded it as a settled policy on the part of the commissioners. We were, of course, well aware of the fact that those persons who were interested in the Center Market, which is under the Department of Agriculture, are very insistent that there should be a retail market north of the Avenue, and with that sentiment I am in the fullest accord; but, so far as this wholesale farmers' market is concerned, together with the river produce which has to be brought in, it is perfectly logical and scientific, in my judgment, to locate it where the commissioners have recommended.

Mr. TYDINGS. Now, Mr. President, let me tell you about the hearing over in the House, and then I am coming to the hearing in the Senate to show you how Senators vote by proxy who never hear the matter, and that is the way we get committee reports.

In the first place, over in the House there was not a majority of the committee present when the hearing was had; and the chairman of the committee, who sat through it all, Mr. GIBSON—than whom there is no better friend of the District of Columbia in either branch of Congress—wrote one of the most stinging minority reports in opposition to this bill that anybody has ever read. There was only a handful of Representatives there. The telephone was used, and the proxies of Members were gotten, and that is how the bill got before the House.

I kept tab on the Senate hearings, and here is how the Senate committee considered this matter:

The first day the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the chairman, was present, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. A few Senators, one or two—I can not remember just who—came in after we had finished about two-thirds of our side of the case. It is a striking fact that of those four the chairman of the committee [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] are both opposed to the present bill. The chairman of the House committee is opposed to it. The chairman of the Senate committee is opposed to it.

Mr. GLASS. If we are to decide the matter upon the theory the Senator is now discussing, I will ask the Senator how the Senate itself may arrive at any just conclusion of this matter, when there are three Senators present on the other side of the aisle, and 13 on this side of the aisle?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not criticizing——

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator is objecting to a process of considering legislation, and it is not tenable.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; for the present.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know that some of the Senators who were not present at this hearing were detained on other business. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry if it would be proper for me to insert in the RECORD how the vote on this bill was taken in the Senate committee, who was present at the hearings, who was absent, and how many Senators voted by proxy?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The present occupant of the chair sees no impropriety in offering it for the RECORD, provided it was not in executive session.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I withdraw the request; but I will say now in a general way that three of those voting for the bill attended no meetings whatsoever, and, of the balance, most of them who were there the day the bill was considered were not there the day that our side of the case was considered. Further than that, the Senate has a better opportunity to weigh this matter than had the committee, because the very able Senator from Virginia on the one hand and my poor efforts on the other have both filed elaborate briefs which were mailed to every Member of the Senate over a week ago; and they have had ample time, if they want to, to go into it.

Mr. GLASS. The committee had hearings, which were printed, and every member of the committee had an opportunity to read the hearings and make up his own mind.

Mr. TYDINGS. But we have gotten far afield.

Mr. GLASS. I think so.

Mr. TYDINGS. What a ridiculous proposition this is! Here is the city of Washington, which has no representative in either House of Congress. Every single, solitary citizens' association, some 25 that I have read, representing the taxpayers who will have to contribute to this very project, has gone on record as being opposed to the site now incorporated in the bill. All of the farmers, 485 of them, who sell in the market from Maryland, and over half the farmers who sell in the market from Virginia, and the majority of commission and wholesale merchants now doing business in the city of Washington, are opposed to the bill. The chairman of the Senate committee is opposed to it. The chairman of the House subcommittee is opposed to it. The Secretary of Agriculture is opposed to it. In view of that situation, how in the name of common sense, if we have any vestige of local self-government left in our minds, can we cram down the throats of these people who are going to put up the money, legislation which none of them want, and then call this a democratic government?

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the Senator is well aware of the fact that every proposition that he has laid down in the last three minutes is bitterly disputed and contested.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have asked the Senator first of all to tell me who sponsored the bill when it was first introduced in the House.

Mr. GLASS. Of what pertinence is it to a decision of this question as to who sponsors a bill?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should not want the Senator from Virginia to introduce local legislation for the State of Maryland without the people of Maryland having a hearing before a committee upon it.

Mr. GLASS. But some Senator who is not a resident of the District, or some Member of the House who is not a resident of the District was obliged to introduce the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. But I should think that would be done only upon proper evidence submitted by those interested either on one side or on the other of the matter.

Mr. GLASS. Of course it was done upon both sides upon proper evidence, which the Senator in his address has not touched yet.

Mr. TYDINGS. Whether it was done or whether it was not done upon proper evidence, the undisputed evidence now is that all of the citizens' organizations in the District are opposed to this proposed site.

Mr. GLASS. I bitterly dispute the accuracy of that statement, and shall show that it is specious and not a fact.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to say anything that is not so. Will the Senator contradict me and name one that is in favor of the site?

Mr. GLASS. I shall contradict the Senator with the greatest pleasure and the greatest earnestness when I come to respond.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will not the Senator do it now? Will he name me one citizens' organization in this city that is in favor of the southwest site? Can the Senator name me one?

Mr. GLASS. Just wait until I respond to the Senator's address, and I will name a good many.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am afraid I will forget it then. I should like to have it now.

Mr. GLASS. I will state it to the Senator in a fashion that he will not soon forget.

Mr. TYDINGS. Evidently at least I have stimulated the Senator's desire to answer.

Mr. President, I have just had inserted in the RECORD—I think perhaps there is a Senator or two on the floor who was not here when it was read—a statement of the purchases made in the farmers' market and the purchases made in stores in town, showing a saving of 33⅓ per cent to the buyer who buys everything from the producer rather than from the storekeeper. In addition to that, here is the market that this bill proposes. Look at it! Here is the Government, spending all this money to beautify this section of the city. Here is Hains Point, where the cherry blossoms bloom. Here is the proposed site, right down here in that section, which in my judgment some day will be a part of the parking system of Washington. In order for the buyer who wants to deal at the market to get to it, he must come all the way through all the congested center of the town, H Street, G Street, F Street, E Street, Pennsylvania Avenue, and then take his purchases through that section again.

Any one of these sites north of Pennsylvania Avenue is satisfactory to me. I do not care if the commissioners go here, there, or over here; but I do not think it can be gainsaid that the place to locate a market is where the people can buy from it; and certainly not only will the traffic congestion be greatly multiplied if the market is built down here, but it can not expand. It can not grow. It is penned up right there on the water front.

The center of population is moving away from the proposed site, which is located on the southern rim of the city of Washington to serve the whole city.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded the point he was just making, so that it would not interrupt him if I should ask him a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. KING. When the vote was taken in the committee, I had not had sufficient opportunity to examine into the facts, and I asked to be excused from voting. I have read only a portion of the hearings since then, but I did take the trouble to ride over the city, to visit the locus in quo on the river, and the points north and east where it was proposed that the retail market should be established.

May I say, very frankly, that I am not quite satisfied with the situation presented by the Senator from Virginia or the Senator from Maryland; that is to say, if a retail market is to be established, I should be very much opposed to the establishment of it down on the river front. I think that would not be wise. If a retail market is the chief objective, then it occurred to me from an examination of the terrain, the city, and so on, that it should be at a different point than upon the river.

If a wholesale market is to be established, I see no reason why the District should pay for it. Let the wholesale merchants buy their own ground and build their own wholesale establishment. In my little home city we have wholesale markets, but the wholesalers buy their own ground, and they select the ground that they buy with reference to their accessibility to the railroads.

I shall vote against this bill, because I am opposed to furnishing a wholesale market for anybody, and if the Senator from Maryland offers as a substitute a bill for a wholesale market I shall vote against that.

The question as to whether the District should provide a retail market I hold in reserve. The other day we appropriated $35,000 for a temporary market. There are six or seven markets already in the District. It may be that later on, after the market down there has been taken away, and the Center Market is taken away, it may be deemed wise to establish a retail market for the city. At the present time I am not so sure that that should be done. At any rate, I would not be willing now to vote to locate a retail market anywhere, and I certainly would oppose appropriating money out of the Treasury, chargeable to the Government or chargeable to the District, for the establishment now either of a wholesale or of a retail market.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. KING. Some parts of my statement are tentative, and I shall have an open mind, and be glad to listen to the Senator from Virginia, as well as other Senators.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I call his attention to the statement made to the committee by the superintendent of markets, Mr. Roberts, that this market is both a wholesale and retail market, that at least 20 per cent of the business there at this time is retail, that the retail business of the market should be increased and could be increased and developed, providing we have in mind that that market is for the purpose of serving the consumers of the city, as well as the wholesale people.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may interject, I would not say that the Senator was accurate in his statement that 20 per cent of the business is retail. As a matter of fact, to my mind the more convincing evidence was that not more than 8 per cent of the business was retail, as against 92 per cent wholesale.

Mr. KING. That was my recollection.

Mr. GLASS. One witness before the committee did assert that 20 per cent of the business he thought was retail.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the retail business in 1927 amounted to $627,000.

Mr. GLASS. I am speaking of the evidence upon which we decided the issue in the committee. I have been told a good many things since the hearings were concluded, but I have not listened to a great deal that has been told, because my decision was upon the evidence that was before us.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Utah has raised a very interesting point. If this market is to be only a wholesale market, then we have the spectacle of Congress authorizing the appropriation of Government money to build a business for certain individuals. Furthermore, the market that is now being eliminated is both retail and wholesale, so that when it is relocated it should be the same kind of market, in my judgment, and I think that if there is any legality back of any market, it certainly is in favor of encouraging the retail advantages for the people.

What we are really doing here, if we build an exclusively wholesale market, is taking Government money to build a wholesale freight station for those engaged in the business and the railroads which will adjoin the property.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BRUCE. I just desire to call attention to the fact that the correspondence sent to the desk, to which the District Commissioners were parties, has not been read, and I trust that before the Senator shall have finished with his discussion on this subject it will be read.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD, unless the Senator especially wants it read, for this reason, that I do not think the facts stated there are subject to dispute. However, I have no objection to having the letters read, but I did not want to consume time with it, because there are three pages to one letter and one to the other. However, if the Senator from Virginia thinks there is anything hidden in it, I am willing to have it read.

Mr. GLASS. I am not asking that it be read.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Is the bill as reported designed to have the wholesale market and the cold-storage buildings, and the other necessary buildings, located down in this southwest section, as indicated on this map, in addition to the retail market?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would say, in answer to the Senator's question, that my understanding is that the original bill was intended to embrace both wholesale and retail markets, with whatever went with them.

Mr. BLAINE. Just one other question. What would be the probable extent of the wholesale market and the cold-storage projects that may go in there, what type of buildings would be erected, and how many would there be?

Mr. TYDINGS. It was shown, I think, though I am not certain about this, that the retail end of the marketing business was increasing. In fact, though I am not sure of this, either, in 1927, some one testified, it had reached the point of 20 per cent of the whole. I may be in error about that. It had been 8 per cent, and then 12 per cent, and it finally ran up to 20 per cent. At any rate, the superintendent of markets of the District said the total was $3,000,000, the retail was $600,000—in other words, one-fifth, or 20 per cent. So the retail end had increased to 20 per cent of the total marketing business.

If retail sales are not to be permitted here, we will be authorizing the appropriation of public funds to build a market for wholesale merchants. The retail feature will be eliminated, and, as I see it, we will be building a freight station for one of the railroads, and that is about all.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think the Senator has been quite responsive to the Senator from Wisconsin. The cold-storage plants are already there.

Mr. BLAINE. How many?

Mr. COPELAND. I think probably all they have.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that one or more?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know how many; but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to this fact—and I wonder if he is clear about it—that the plan we are discussing this morning has nothing to do with the Center Market, the large Center Market which the Senator sees when he goes down Pennsylvania Avenue. The retail market is not involved in this. This has to do only with the farmers' market, and that has always been from the beginning largely a wholesale market.

Mr. TYDINGS. In reference to the Center Market, the Government has now taken over the Center Market, and the probabilities are that it is to be razed, so that the town will be without a Center Market.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I also say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the evidence in this matter shows that only 1 per cent of the deposits with the storage company are derived from the farmers' produce market.

Mr. BLAINE. When gentlemen speak of a farmer's market, does that mean the farmers going to the wholesale houses or going direct to the consumers for their market?

Mr. CAPPER. This market goes to both the wholesale and retail.

Mr. BRUCE. Both wholesale and retail.

Mr. COPELAND. Ninety per cent of it is sold by the farmers to the wholesale people.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the wholesale houses and the cold-storage housing will be located on this water front?

Mr. COPELAND. Not necessarily, because the wholesale men have said that they are going out to Eckington, or somewhere else.

Mr. BLAINE. Not if the market is located here.

Mr. COPELAND. They say that makes no difference.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand quite differently.

Mr. COPELAND. That is according to the testimony they gave.

Mr. BLAINE. My understanding is that the wholesalers and the cold-storage people will go wherever this market is located, so that if we locate this market on the water front, they are going to build their permanent warehouses and cold-storage plants on the water front.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, let us consider the farmers who sell in the market. A check was kept on all the farmers who sold in the market, and it was found that 465 of them came from Maryland, 65 from the District of Columbia, and 81 from Virginia, and that all of the Maryland farmers, all of the District farmers, and over half of the Virginia farmers, were opposed to the southwest site.

Senators, there is a bit of strategy in this bill that I think is escaping the Senate, in that in all probability the entire food distributing center will be relocated where the farmers' market is placed by Congress. Wherever that goes, the commission men and the others will follow, so that if we establish a wholesale market down on the water front, we virtually force the farmers to drive down there, where they will have to sell only wholesale, because the bulk of the people live in the northern part of the city.

I am just going to review, in five minutes, two or three things for the benefit of those who were not here when this discussion first opened.

First. The Secretary of Agriculture is opposed to this bill.

Second. The chairmen of both the House and the Senate committees are opposed to it.

Third. As introduced in the House of Representatives and now before this body it is contrary to rights, welfare, and interests of the people of the District and all scientific investigations and reports.

It will congest the traffic situation in the District of Columbia.

It will force those who want to buy to needle their way through all the traffic in the downtown section, and then go back again.

The proposed market will be so small that it will accommodate only 350 stalls, or less than the present market. There will be no room for expansion. The price per square foot is higher than most of the other sites to which the market can go.

All of the population of Washington lives north of the proposed site for the market. There is no ground for expansion on the south bank of the river. The center of population is now at Fourth and L Streets NW., and the center of population is growing away from the market, the consumers are growing away from the market rather than toward it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Can the Senator state what percentage of the produce that is handled in the Washington market originates in territory contiguous to Washington?

Mr. TYDINGS. The last report shows the total business at the farmers' produce market was $3,000,000 per year, of which it was reported $600,000, or 20 per cent, was retail business.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know about that retail business, because men can go to the wholesale market and buy their stuff and retail it through the city. What I would like to get is information as to how much of the total produce brought in for the people of the city comes from local territory and how much is brought in by freight.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12286, the naval appropriation bill.

The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Maryland if he desires the letters which were not read to be inserted in the RECORD in connection with his remarks?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

APRIL 3, 1928.

The COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Of course you are aware that what is known as the Stalker bill (H. R. 8298) has passed the House of Representatives and has been favorably reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. For your ready reference I am inclosing a copy of the bill herewith.

As I intend to take the floor against the measure when it comes up in the Senate in the near future, I would be glad to have your views on the following points:

1. Are you in favor of making the farmers' produce market a "wholesale" market, as provided in line 5, page 2, of the bill?

2. Taking for granted that your recommendation of a temporary site for the farmers' produce market between Sixth and Seventh Streets NW., just south of the foundations for the Victory Memorial Building contemplates that it is intended to continue the farmers' market as a combination wholesale and retail market as at present operated, when moved to the permanent southwest site as provided for in the Stalker bill, will the market automatically revert to exclusive wholesale transactions?

3. What is the present status of the commissioners' study of the known need in the near future of a large new food and produce distribution center, affecting not only the farmers' market but the commission and other merchants and perhaps the Center Market?

It certainly seems to me that delay in a final disposition of this whole mattter can but develop further awkward controversies and dissention such as has divided the community by the Stalker bill, which surely is not a constructive step toward an intelligent solution of the general problem, placing, as it does, a "wholesale" farmers' produce market in cramped quarters in the very extreme southwest corner of the District of Columbia.

Very truly yours,

M. E. TYDINGS.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 7, 1928.

Hon. M. E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are in receipt of your letter of April 3, 1928, with reference to House bill 8298, for the establishment of a market in southwest Washington.

The bill referred to has been the subject of open hearings by the House and Senate committees, has been favorably reported by both, has passed the House, and is now pending in the Senate.

By direction of Congress, the commissioners, after considerable study of the subject, including a public hearing, made a lengthy report to Congress on December 15, 1927, respecting the market situation. Since that time, the commissioners have made no particular study of the situation, and believe that there is nothing which they can properly add at this time to the report made to Congress.

Very truly yours,

PROCTOR L. DOUGHERTY,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 28, 1928.

An act (H. R. 8298) authorizing acquisition of a site for the farmers' produce market, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase or by condemnation, or partly by purchase and partly by condemnation, as they may deem best, the whole of squares Nos. 354 and 355, as shown on the plat books in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, and when same shall have been acquired to close to public occupation and use as a street all of F Street SW., within the adjacent curb lines of Tenth and Eleventh Streets SW., the area of said squares and the portion of F Street SW., when same shall have been acquired and closed, to be used and occupied by the District of Columbia as and for the purposes of a wholesale farmers' produce market.

For the purposes of such acquisition, including all necessary expenses incident thereto and for the clearing and leveling of the ground and the erection thereon of protecting sheds, and suitable stands and stalls, and the installation of sanitary conveniences and necessary heating and telephone service, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of and charged against the general funds not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury of the United States and against the revenues of the District of Columbia in the same proportion and to be paid in the same way and manner as are other appropriations to cover the expenses of operation and government of the District of Columbia.

And the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to make, promulgate, and enforce all appropriate rules and regulations for the control and operation of such market when established, and may establish a reasonable scale of charges to be paid by farmers and others making use of the market or of any of its appurtenant facilities.

Attest:

WM. TYLER PAGE, Clerk.

APRIL 7, 1928.

Hon. PROCTOR L. DOUGHERTY,

President Board of Commissioners, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DOUGHERTY: I regret that the commissioners' reply of the 7th instant to my inquiries of the 3d contains no answer to my first two questions.

It is a general congressional practice for committees to refer bills to the departments concerned for an opinion on the merits of the proposed legislation. In the matter of the Stalker bill (H. R. 8298) this usual procedure seems to have been omitted, and I therefore found it necessary to request your views on a matter so vitally affecting the welfare of the citizens of the District of Columbia.

In this particular case I consider your views of more than ordinary importance, because your report on the market situation, dated December 15, 1927, is used as the foundation of the District Committee's favorable report on a bill introduced several weeks later. In your report you state:

"It is generally agreed that it is desirable to all concerned to encourage the retail feature of the farmers' market."

The bill provided just the opposite (H. R. 8298, p. 2, line 5):

"to be used and occupied by the District of Columbia as and for the purposes of a wholesale farmers' produce market."

With the knowledge that your report was being used to support a measure in direct conflict therewith in this important respect, I felt sure you would welcome an opportunity to comment on the bill rather than by silence leave any question of doubt as to your position. From my personal observation, your report of December 15 is used and understood as a report on the Stalker bill, or, in other words, that the Stalker bill is based upon your recommendations.

Furthermore, your entire report of December 15 is surely predicated upon the reservation:

"Has the time arrived for a permanent relocation of the farmers' market?"

In view of the fact that you have made no further study of the situation and can add nothing at this time to your report, your serious doubt as to the wisdom of permanently locating the farmers' market at this time, as expressed in your report, still exists, although nearly everyone who I have heard express an opinion understands that you have freely and fully recommended the immediate change as provided in the Stalker bill. I can't help but feel that such misunderstandings so seriously affecting District legislation should be taken cognizance of by the commissioners.

I was also in hopes that you might care to comment on the fact that, although the old site of the farmers' market taken over by the Federal Government for the new Internal Revenue Building is District property, no provision has been made to reimburse the District for such property out of the public buildings act appropriation. Instead public funds raised by the taxpayers of the District are authorized to be appropriated by the Stalker bill for the purchase of a new site.

Finally, how is it proposed to proceed to build a suitable farmers' produce market on the southwest site, the land for which is appraised at about $300,000 and improvements estimated at $110,000, with the $300,000 authorized to be appropriated by the bill?

The entire history of this proposed legislation is so confusing that I am confident you will agree that all possible light should be thrown upon it.

Very truly yours,

M. E. TYDINGS.

P. S.—Attached is statement setting forth seven reasons why the bill should not be enacted into law.

Reasons why the Stalker bill (H. R. 8298) should not be enacted into law:

1. The bill proposes an economic injustice, and is therefore contrary to the public interest in that it appropriates the people's money to increase their cost of living.

2. It is illegal in that it appropriates District funds to replace land taken by the Federal Government without compensation or authority.

3. It is class legislation of the most vicious type, in that it takes rights and privileges from the general public for the financial benefit of the few.

4. It is premature and disregards the warning of the District Commissioners in that it is based upon no scientific, thorough, or coordinated study of the known future need of a new food-distributing center composed of the farmers' market, commission and other merchants, and perhaps the Center Market.

5. It is impossible in that it proposes to buy land appraised at about $300,000 and build thereon a market estimated at $110,000 with an appropriation of but $300,000.

6. It is unusual in that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have made no report on this bill, and in fact, although requested, have declined to do so.

7. The site is unsatisfactory, among many other reasons, in that it is proposed to build this market directly across the street from a public school.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to repeat my question to the Senator from Maryland, and that is, how much of the produce consumed in the District of Columbia is local produce and how much is brought in by railroad or by water?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not the figures immediately available, but I think I know in a general way. I would say to the Senator that in the report of the hearings there is given the number of truck loads brought in from adjacent farms and the number of carloads shipped in from elsewhere.

Mr. BRUCE. May I say in this connection that the testimony shows that the farm produce is brought in by trucks an average distance of 18 miles. It is mainly brought in from the near-by counties of Montgomery and Prince Georges, in the State of Maryland. Then, of course, there is a considerable amount coming from the District of Columbia itself and an inconsiderable amount from the State of Virginia.

Mr. SMITH. How much is brought into this market by freight from States that are not immediately contiguous to the market?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not those figures here now. I read some of them a while ago. The whole thing is in the hearings, where are given the number of carloads, what they contain, the railroads which bring them, and from whence they came.

Mr. GLASS. The testimony was that not enough of that produce came in to feed Washington 1 day out of 365.

Mr. SMITH. That is, by trucks?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. The balance of it comes in by freight and by boat?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. It seemed to me, as my attention was called to it recently, that the natural place for a market would be where the railroads and steamboats could the most economically bring in and discharge their cargoes for Washington, whose consumers are dependent upon that source for their produce.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator in favor of building a freight depot for the railroads with Government money?

Mr. SMITH. I am in favor of building at the most convenient place for those who feed Washington to do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. With Government money?

Mr. SMITH. With any money.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to say in conclusion that I have no interest in the bill whatsoever, and I do not care what site is chosen, because it will not affect me in any way that I can see. But I do want to leave the thought that if the Senate wants to put something over on the people of the District of Columbia which every one of its organizations say they do not want, although they have to pay for it, that is the privilege of the Senate. I think that, having no voice in the Government of the country and no representation in this body, at least their wishes should be respected, because they should know better than anyone else what they want, and we should not pass their recommendations by lightly.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the pending amendment to the naval appropriation bill. During the morning hour, however, I was given to understand that there had been some indication, on the part of those both favoring the amendment and those opposed to it, of a desire to reach a vote without further discussion. I simply want to state that if that is correct and if the Senate is ready to vote on the pending amendment at this time, I have no desire whatever to delay the Senate by discussing the question. But if there is to be further discussion of the amendment, then I desire to address the Senate on the subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can not speak for any other Senator, but it is my understanding that there are several Senators who expect to address themselves to the amendment. I am not certain of it, however, but it is my understanding that at least two Senators intend to speak on the question.

Mr. EDGE. I have also had that intimation since learning of the possibility of an agreement. Apparently there will be further discussion, so that I shall take the opportunity, this afternoon, I hope, to discuss the amendment.

However, since asking for recognition I have been informed that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] gave notice yesterday, I believe, that he would desire to discuss another subject at this hour. In view of that fact, I have no desire to be a party to nullifying any understanding. Therefore, I yield the floor.

UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, those who claim a vested political interest in prosperity have permitted themselves a long, easy-going sigh of relief when Secretary Davis submitted his report on unemployment. Only 1,874,050 men in idleness. Mr. Davis professes to be very exact—one million eight hundred and seventy-four thousand and fifty.

The press has been reassured, the pulpits have been calmed, and the general public has been led to believe that a group of scoundrels have for political purposes alarmed the country into believing that there was a serious unemployment situation.

The distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said on this floor:

> It is gratifying to learn from the report of the Secretary of Labor that while unemployment exists in the country the evil is far less serious than certain alarmists have represented it to be.

Mr. President, is there any justification for the calm complacency that has been restored to the press in reference to unemployment? Is there really cause for gratification? Do the figures presented by the Secretary of Labor actually give no cause for alarm? To me they are the most alarming set of figures that have as yet been published. When Commissioner Stewart's figures are properly read they indicate an unemployment situation far worse than I had ever suspected.

What is the explanation of the fact that the Secretary's report has been received with reassurance? Why do editorial writers say that the Secretary's report is comforting? It is because the Secretary of Labor has either deliberately or inadvertently misread the report of the Commissioner of Labor Statistics and published an interpretation of Mr. Stewart's report which has absolutely no basis in fact.

One may scan every line and every paragraph of Mr. Stewart's report and nowhere will one find the assertion that there are now only 1,874,050 men unemployed. That statement is purely the product of Mr. Davis' imagination. Mr. Stewart is too good a statistician and is too well aware of the difficulties of making an unemployment estimate with the available governmental machinery to try to give an exact and precise figure as to the number of unemployed.

The fact that the Secretary of Labor has thus misconstrued the commissioner's report is indicative of a woeful misunderstanding of the difficulties of securing unemployment statistics. He could never have subscribed to an exact figure like 1,874,050 if he were aware of the uncertainties of unemployment estimates made up with the present facilities. Had he understood the problem and been candid in reporting it there would at least have been a confession in the report of inability to secure exact unemployment data and the expression of an estimate in round figures, sufficiently round, sir, to give warning upon its face that it was but an estimate, with the plain and bold declaration that a margin of error of about 500,000 was reasonably to be expected.

Instead, Mr. Davis leads the country to believe that he has machinery for counting the unemployed sufficiently exact to give us a precise figure.

Mr. Stewart, of course, is not to blame for this. He honestly and candidly admits that he is not giving any unemployment information but is recording simply the shrinkage in the pay roll between 1925 and 1928. He does not attempt to tell us how many men are idle. All he professes to do is to record the number on the pay rolls in 1925 and the number on the pay rolls in 1928, and report the difference to us.

This element of shrinkage is but a single item in a study of unemployment. It must be used in the estimate of the number of unemployed, but does not represent the number of unemployed. It is obvious that at least four large groups are omitted. First, the growth of population; second, immigration; third, drift from the farm to the city; and, fourth, the number of unemployed in 1925.

Each of these groups adds thousands to the number of those who are now in idleness. They must be added if we are to secure an adequate picture of how large an army of unemployed we have now mobilized.

It is absurd to omit them from calculation. We can not close our books as of 1925 and make no additions to our working population. The young men and women who grow up into working age, the farm boy who goes to the city in search of industrial employment, the immigrant who comes to this country from a foreign land, they all must find work; and if they do not, they go to swell the ranks of the unemployed.

How many must we add to the number reported by the department in order to turn that report into an estimate of unemployment? According to Mr. Davis's figures immigration in 1927 alone added 252,023 to the population. The farms, according to the Secretary of Agriculture, contributed to the city between 1920 and 1927 over 3,000,000 persons; and, in addition, 2,000,000 boys and girls annually reach the working age. How many of these actually join the lines of those who are seeking employment?

I have had an estimate made up on the basis of the figures reported by the Secretary of Labor and by the same methods. It is as follows:

Shrinkage between 1925 and 1928, as reported by the Secretary of Labor	1,870,050
On the basis of the same formula there was a shrinkage between 1923 and 1925 of	1,230,870
And between 1924 and 1927 farm workers who moved to the city in search of urban employment	500,000
Increase in population by natural growth and immigration	2,196,000
Total	5,796,920

Even if we accept Doctor Klein's assertion that one and one-half millions were absorbed in other industries, there are still over 4,000,000 unemployed.

No account is taken in this calculation of those who are voluntarily idle. Only those have been counted who, in the words of the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, "are usually employed, but at present out of employment and hunting for work." In other words, this number embraces persons who are ready, willing, and able to work, but who have not been able to find employment.

There have been other estimates made upon this floor on the basis of the Secretary's figures. None have indicated an unemployment total of less than 4,000,000. The only reason that I am going into detail in this matter is because once and for all the error ought to be scotched that the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics show the number of unemployed to be less than 2,000,000.

The regular bureau figures do not show any such result. Mr. Stewart's figures for this special report do not show any such result. Mr. Stewart's report does not even profess to be an estimate of unemployment. If an estimate of unemployment in made on the basis of his figures, the conclusion is that there are at the very least 4,000,000 men idle.

Mr. Davis's report, which presumes to be based on Mr. Stewart's figures, is the result of a misapprehension and a misinterpretation. In all candidness and in all sincerity, the error having now been pointed out several times, the Secretary ought to withdraw his figures in order to dispel the confusion that he has created in the mind of the public.

The fundamental danger in a misleading report like the one which is now before the Senate is not that we may be led to believe that there are 2,000,000 unemployed when there are in fact 4,000,000. Such an error can be pointed out and corrected. The real harm is that the public is led to believe that the Government has the machinery and the means whereby it can keep informed of the number of unemployed, when, as a matter of fact, it has no such machinery. I know that the public is misled, because the Senator from Utah has been misled. On one or more occasions he has on this floor informed us that to get unemployment information one had simply to apply to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. He seems to be under the impression, like so many editors whose editorials have come to my attention, that the Bureau of Labor Statistics has the information, when as a matter of fact it has not.

A short time ago the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] even went to the extent of telling us the precise percentage of unemployment. He said the percentage of unemployment was 5.8 per cent and gave the Bureau of Labor Statistics as his authority.

Now it should be plain to all that neither the Bureau of Labor Statistics nor any organization in this country can know or does know the percentage of unemployment. The percentage to which the Senator from Utah referred represented not the percentage of unemployment but the percentage of shrinkage in employment between the first of the year and the last of the year 1927. It is in no way a measure of unemployment.

The difficulty has been that those who are in a measure responsible for this situation have concerned themselves far more with publicity to explain their inaction than with an attempt to mitigate some of the hardships of unemployment.

In his report the Secretary of Labor says that the regular bulletins of the Bureau of Labor Statistics have shown that the volume of employment has tended downward since April, 1927, and then he says:

> In the present instance the Department of Labor has sounded such warning in ample time.

Where was the President when that warning was sounded? According to the Secretary, every month since April, 1927, a warning bell was tolled. How is it that the President failed to hear these warning bells? With the din of these warnings sounding in his ears, how could he tell the Congress, as late as December, 1927, that employment was plentiful? That declaration by the President served as a cue to all the departments and all took up the refrain:

> Employment is plentiful; prosperity is here. Nothing need be done.

If Congress had known the truth, Congress might have acted. But even without legislative authority there was plenty of room for action all through the winter in expediting the Government program and thereby relieving in a measure the rigors of unemployment.

The worst offender in the administration's practice of feeding to the public all manner of poppy-cock on the question of unemployment is the United States Employment Service. Regularly it has been issuing bulletins based upon no information and calculated to reassure the administration in its smugness and to serve as an apology for its failure to act.

On March 22 the director general of that service released a report entitled "Industrial Employment Information Bulletin." I want to read a few lines from that report which, to my mind, is the most concentrated piffle that has ever been printed at the Government's expense:

> The country has been unduly alarmed by exaggerated reports that have been circulated widely stating that a serious unemployment situation exists.

You will note that this was to be released on the 22d of March, two days before the Secretary of Labor in his report to the Senate said:

> The present slump in employment, while not so extensive or grave as the estimates that have been generally circulated is, nevertheless, serious.

The Director General of the Employment Service, who is responsible for the breezy reports regularly emanating from that quarter, gathers no statistics, collects no figures, has no direct contact of a measurable kind whatever, yet he continues monthly to publish under the authority of the United States Government misleading reports that serve no earthly purpose except to misinform those who would guide their business activities thereby. To continue with his bulletin: First, he says that there is no ground for alarm, because there are always a million workers out of work. Then he makes this prophecy:

> The horizon is clearing and the employment outlook is encouraging.

I should like to compare this report with the report issued by a private organization that has no political axes to grind.

The Annalist is a journal well recognized for its ability and accuracy in financial matters, and, in fact, is quoted in the Secretary's report. That journal reports weekly on the business outlook as follows:

> February 24, 1928: While building contracts so far this month are fully up to those of last February, the week has seen a fall of 1 per cent in the Annalist price index, and the latest reported freight loadings show a sharp drop. Steel production seems a little unlikely to continue to a fully normal spring peak.
>
> March 2, 1928: Not much of special encouragement in the way of business indications is visible in the week's records. Building contracts, though at high level, have been proved not a sure guaranty of business prosperity. Indications from steel are not very rosy.
> March 9, 1928: Aside from the high February building figures and some apparent improvement in railroad earnings, really decisive signs of business improvement are lacking. There is evident uncertainty in the automobile industry. Steel prospects are also vague, reflecting business uncertainty. Freight loadings are unfavorable.
> March 16, 1928: Business increased somewhat, supported by large automobile production and building contracts, and evidenced by better freight loading figures. Steel, the general mirror, nevertheless shows cloudiness, suggesting that the present picture may not hold clear. The prospect beyond March is uncertain.
> March 23, 1928: Steel, building, and automobiles show expansion, but the freight loadings records indicate that the general activity of business is not up to that in the productive lines noted.
> March 30, 1928: Pronounced weakness in steel and iron prices indicates the slackening of the seasonal briskness of demand, and points to an early lessening of production suggestive of recession in business activity. Continued deficiency in freight loadings confirms a level of business below that of the past two years.
> April 6, 1928: A somewhat more promising prospect for steel is combined with a March production of pig iron, which shows less than the normal seasonal increase. Freight loadings continue well below those of last year. March building contracts fall somewhat short of March, 1927. Trustworthy forecasting bases are not conspicuous.

Such comparisons as have been made show that we must go back to the dark days of 1921 to find a situation comparable to the present. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.'s study of voluntary quits in 350 manufacturing establishments shows a condition as bad as 1921.

A study of want ads in the New York World shows that 1927 has fallen to a level almost as low as 1921. Freight-car loadings continue to decline. During the week ending March 17, 1928, revenue freight-car loadings showed a decrease of 9,467 cars from preceding week, and 59,846 less than the corresponding week last year.

The latest report for the week ending April 7, 1928, shows a decrease of revenue freight cars of 29,131 from the previous week and 34,611 cars less than the corresponding week last year.

It is not my purpose to paint this picture darker than it is. I have introduced these short, pithy paragraphs to show how business journals report conditions when they expect their clients and readers to act. They serve as a basis of comparison with the reports of the United States Employment Service, which are apparently written only for political purposes.

It is my contention that if these administration officials who always see conditions through pink glasses had not ignored the seriousness of present unemployment we might have done something this winter in some measure to have relieved the situation. I know that the Senator from Utah will tell me that there was nothing we could do; that public building had to wait upon the spring; that public construction could not be done during the winter. I will simply refer him to the report of the committee of the President's conference on unemployment, the report which has the approval of Mr. Herbert Hoover. The opening sentence reads:

> Custom, not climate, is mainly responsible for seasonal idleness in construction industries.

> With due precaution and proper equipment nearly all construction work can be carried on in winter and with no great difference of cost.

Indeed, if these recommendations are the recommendations of a Government committee bearing the approval of its Secretary of Commerce, the Government ought to be most zealous to put them into effect in order to set the pace for private construction industry to follow.

So far all I have heard on the other side of this Chamber has been either the declaration that it was all too dreadful but that nothing could be done about unemployment, or else that everything would work out for the best without any interference by the Government. It has been a policy of inaction justified either by despair or by vain and fatuous hope.

In the winter we cry that spring will bring relief, and in the spring we look to winter. Like benighted heathen we turn our faces toward the clouds from them to secure succor. Suppose that the change of seasons will bring an improvement, will provide few or many jobs, can we chain the spring to our streets and detain it there forever? Will not the winter again follow the summer in relentless continuity, and then what shall we say to the cold, the hungry, the unsheltered? Shall we repeat the mocking refrain, "Spring will bring improvement"?

No, Mr. President, spring will not bring relief. If we rely on it we are leaning on a broken reed. For the past three years the figures of the Department of Labor show that employment conditions were best and the employment index was highest during February and March. These months have come and gone without any visible degree of improvement in the condition of the idle. February, 1928, was worse than February, 1927, and that in turn was worse than February, 1926 and 1925.

The Government construction program, we are told by the Senator from Utah, must wait for the spring, while on the shelves of the Library of Congress the report of the Committee on Construction Industries is green with the golden mold of prosperity.

Indeed, it is amazing that honest and intelligent folk should still have any confidence in the seasons as solvents of human problems. I must repeat, Mr. President, that neither the spring nor the fall, neither the summer nor the winter, are going to solve the unemployment problem. These seasons have been with us for some time and they have not yet solved unemployment. There is no reason to suppose that they ever will.

Neither, Mr. President, will an ordinary business revival cure unemployment. If we look for relief in that quarter, there is certain to be keen disappointment. Business resumption means simply increased production. But the figures are very eloquent that we do not need a much larger force to bring about even a very large increase in production. Production increased between 1919 and 1926 fully 29 per cent, yet at the very same time the number of employees decreased by 7 per cent, and has continued to decline. The same is true of mining, transportation, and even agriculture. What good will a rising production curve do if it is accompanied by a falling employment curve? It has been suggested that new industries will solve the unemployment problems. Perhaps they will. But new industries do not come into being upon request. Usually they are based on fundamental inventions which have a way of coming into the world quite without regard to the unemployment situation. What assurance have we that they will come at all, or at the right time, or that they will take up just the right amount of unemployment slack?

The Secretary of Labor urges the development of new wants to stimulate business activity. Most of the people that I know, Mr. President, claim to be quite well stocked with wants, but what they are complaining of is a shortage of purchasing power to satisfy the old desires. It is true that purchasing power is now concentrated in the hands of a few who are already surfeited with more than they want. But for the vast number of wage earners who have not even achieved the distinction of being among the income taxpayers the great and grievous need is not new wants, Mr. President, but new purchasing power.

We are told not to be alarmed. We are advised that a million idle workers is "normal." The prophets of laissez faire are preaching the creed of self-adjustment. The poor unfortunates who belong to the idle million can derive no comfort from the fact that a million without work is statistically normal. Nor does a statistical norm mean that it is just or proper that it should be so.

And of those who are talking in terms of self-adjustment, I should like to ask: Who is to pay for the terrific loss that is bound up with the readjustment? Must that burden be loaded upon the shoulders of those least able to bear it?

Personally, I am obsessed with a suspicion that self-adjustment is but an apology for continuing the do-nothing policy of the present administration. Let us not forget that every idle man threatens the economic security of his employed brother. No man can feel secure in his job so long as he knows that another is offering to do his work at any price. We owe it to the men and women who work not to expose them to the unfair competition of starved and wretched men. We owe it to ourselves not to permit the army of unemployed to be used as a powerful lever to depress our standard of living.

At any rate, we can not sit by and watch the idle millions tramp the city streets in vain search of work. We can not pray for inventions like the orientals prayed for rain. A little action might be good after all these years of laissez faire, which has not solved the problem. True enough, we do not know any general solution; we have not any panacea for unemployment, but we can begin to experiment along lines that hold the promise of a solution.

We have no choice. A fundamentally vital fact is driving us to action. Every human being exacts a living from the society in which he lives. If permitted, he gives his services in return; if not, he secures his maintenance none the less, perhaps from the superintendent of the poor or the warden of the jail. These men who are now idle must live and will live. Your only alternative is: Will you compel them to be parasites, or will you accept the marvelous wealth that their idle hands are anxious to create for you?

I have this morning introduced two bills, and I have a third in preparation, which, to my mind, are calculated to relieve future unemployment attacks. The three bills together form a plan designed on the basis of information now available. They do not ride any private hobbies. They require no revolutionary changes either in government or industry. Their justification is the plight of the unfortunates who are compelled to go without work and wages and the threat to our national peace and security which is inherent in an army of unemployed.

The present authoritative analysis of the unemployment situation is that we have two classes of idle men; that is, those whose work has been suspended by reason of a cyclical depression in business, and those who have been released from industry because their jobs have disappeared and their work is being done more rapidly and more cheaply by mechanical contrivances.

To solve the problem of the first group we must look to the elimination of the business cycle, to the tempering of the recurrent inflation and deflation. If we could erect some sort of balance wheel which would keep the industrial machine from revolving too rapidly at one time and too slowly at another, the road to a solution of this phase of the unemployment problem would open. The Public Treasury is the largest consumer of goods in the market. Government constitutes the greatest single spending agency in the country. It is reasonable, therefore, to look upon the Government's spending power as the great stabilizer of industrial activity. Since it is not interested in profits, the Government is in a particularly advantageous position to throw its full weight in favor of a level and stabilized business curve.

The second group of workers, whose places at the workbench have been taken by intricate combinations of steel and electricity, must be given new places, rehabilitated, and trained for new work. The whole pattern of their lives must be readjusted. It may involve migration from one part of the country to another. A period of training and apprenticeship may be necessary. The poor workman whose job is gone is hardly in position to make such a major adjustment without assistance. If new industries can use his services, he must be informed. He should not be expected to invest time and savings in preparation for a new life's work only to find at the end that there was no room in the industry he has chosen.

The burden of finding new work is a very heavy one. The workingman should not be made to carry it blindfolded. The very least of services that this Government can render him is to guide his steps, shorten his journey, and assure him that he is going toward an accessible goal. The Government can accomplish it by providing a clearing house of information of available jobs and idle men, and through such an agency to arrange with employers and employees to bring about the necessary adjustment which new mechanized industry requires.

For both classes of involuntarily idle we must have a perfected statistical system which will keep close track of the employment situation, which will serve as the indicator for the operation of the stabilizer of the business cycle, and which will keep us advised of the success or failure of the adjustments that are being made for those whose work has been superseded by machinery.

Paragraph 2 of Senate Resolution 147 called for a study by the Secretary of Labor of the methods of securing employment and unemployment statistics. So far no report has been forthcoming concerning that phase of the resolution, and I have, therefore, had to resort to private agencies. At my request a meeting was held by the subcommittee of the committee on governmental labor statistics of the American Statistical Association. The following participated and agreed upon a plan which is embodied in the bill which I have just introduced. Leonard W. Hatch, member of the industrial board of the New York State Department of Labor; Bryce M. Stewart, of Industrial Relations Counselors (Inc.), formerly director of the Canadian Employment Service; William A. Berridge, economist, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; Ralph G. Hurlin, director of the department of statistics of the Russell Sage Foundation; and Mary Van Kleeck, director of the department of industrial studies of the Russell Sage Foundation.

The bill will extend the present service of the Bureau of Labor Statistics to include in addition to manufacturing, mining and quarrying, building, construction, agriculture, transportation, retail and wholesale trade.

I am informed that the collection of these statistics is both feasible and practicable and that after the initial expense of setting up, the operation of collection and publication can be done very cheaply. Business men are very anxious to have the information and would gladly cooperate in the collection, as is evidenced by their present voluntary contribution of information to a general pool. Employment information is at the present time the most conspicuously absent piece of business information.

It is the unanimous opinion of every student of the unemployment problem that good statistics would not only tell us about employment and unemployment but would in part actually help to reduce the intensity of unemployment. To the extent that business action and business judgments are referable to intelligent information instead of to blind and chaotic guesswork, waste, maladministration, and unemployment are eliminated. Then again accurate employment and unemployment statistics must be maintained if we are to have any record of the success or failure of any experiment we may undertake for the purpose of curbing unemployment. By shutting our eyes to unpleasant facts we shall not advance this Nation's prosperity, nor shall we accomplish anything by shouting politics at everyone who tells the truth about our economic situation.

The second bill provides for the creation of a system of employment offices on a nation-wide scale under the cooperative auspices of the Federal Government and the States. It is as clear to me as it is to you that employment offices will not create jobs where there are none, nor will they provide workers when there is a shortage of men. It will, however, help to tie up the right man with the right job, provide a channel between the available job and the idle worker, reduce waiting time between jobs, and eliminate the waste of job hunting.

Between 1910 and 1916 seven public studies of unemployment were made and each in turn recommended the establishment of a system of public employment offices. The President's conference on unemployment recommended it. The subcommittee on the business cycle of the President's conference heartily approved it, and it has the indorsement of almost every organization interested in solving the unemployment problem.

Employment exchanges are neither novel or untried. They are in full operation and effect in England, Germany, and Canada. Some of our States have been experimenting with them and have found that there is much for the public employment office to do.

After the war the Federal employment service helped considerably in demobilizing the Army into peaceful pursuits. Instead of continuing to pay lip service to a fine principle, it is time that we actually enacted a piece of legislation that would create the machinery that could actually be used in the battle against unemployment.

Passage of such a bill at this session of Congress would be an earnest, at least, of our desire to try to cope with the workingman's problem.

Finally, there is the idea of long-range planning of public works, a principle to which we have long paid vocal homage but so far never put into operation. Long-range planning does not mean that in times of depression the Government should do things or build things that it would not otherwise do. It does not require the laying of a single brick or the spending of a single dollar that is not now spent. It does not require additional spending but simply requires the intelligent control of the spending that we do so that the time and speed of Federal work will vary with conditions of the labor market.

It is just as important that Government construction be retarded in boom times as that it be accelerated in time of depression. A double purpose is thus served. When men and material are scarce the Government is out of the bidding and does not compete with private citizens for the same things. This helps to keep the inflation within bounds by removing from behind it the impetus of Government work.

As soon, however, as the demand of private enterprise weakens and industry begins to slacken down, then is the time to release the pent-up spending power of the Government and catalytically to set private industry also into motion again. What we have done is simply to withdraw one very powerful customer from the market and have set him down to act contrary to the way the market acts. When everybody is buying let the Government stand by. When everyone else stops buying then the Government can step up to the counter. That in general is the stabilizing principle of the long-range plan. It requires that Government projects be planned long in advance and graded with the degree of immediacy which they demand. Thus every project should be marked whether "to be done immediately" or "to be done during the next period of depression."

For the second class of projects plans should be kept in readiness for immediate execution as soon as the emergency arises. In operation this principle should prove fairly simple. We need first of all a geographical division of the country into appropriate zones. The country as a whole is too big and varied adequately to serve as a plane of operations. For instance, an abnormal condition in one section may cancel a subnormal condition in another and leave a national index uninfluenced, though there may be a serious hardship in a large section of the country. On the other hand, if the country is divided into zones a falling index in one particular zone of the country would be sufficient to bring the relief program into play. The zones in use by the Federal reserve system would serve the purpose, because they represent economic divisions.

We need a sensitive and accurate barometer to indicate when work is to be accelerated and when it is to be retarded. In choosing a barometer both the work to be done and the aim to be accomplished must be taken into consideration. Since the work to be done is largely construction, construction must be one of the elements of the barometer, otherwise it might happen that the Government program should be called into play when construction work was booming.

In addition, we are trying to mitigate unemployment. That is the purpose of long-range planning. A perfected employment index must, therefore, play its part. A good indicator would, therefore, be composed of the combined indices of construction and employment.

Great care must me taken to avoid the misuse of the plan for political purposes. The plan must be administered solely for the purpose of mitigating unemployment, and while a measure of discretion will have to be exercised, it is advisable to include some automatic controls which will not be subject to political manipulation.

Now, Mr. President, I have given this subject a great deal of thought. There are some here and more outside who are so callous to human problems that they can not tell the difference between a political measure and one which has within it the heart and soul of its proponent, because it harbors one of his major interests in life—to lighten the burden of those who labor, to free them of the crushing anxiety of unemployment, and give them an opportunity to engage in the pursuit of happiness with some chance of attaining it.

What I have outlined I believe constitutes a conservative beginning at the job of destroying involuntary idleness. It rests on the basic assumption that unemployment is a pathological economic condition, to be treated as a disease, and not to be accepted as a normal phenomenon under any circumstances. It calls for close study of the facts of unemployment and the closest diagnosis of its history.

Secondly, it provides for the establishment of a national employment service to eliminate the friction of job getting and to establish a machine and train a personnel that is continually engaged in the study of the problems of unemployment. Lastly, provision is made for the long-range planning of public works in order to utilize the vast spending power of the Government as the great balance wheel to stabilize the industrial activity of the Nation.

All of these singly or together will not abolish unemployment at a stroke. But all of these will tend to minimize unemployment and to relieve its rigors.

For those of the unemployed who, as the Secretary of Labor says, are temporarily suspended from their jobs, we provide the long-range plan to tide them over the period of business inactivity. Those who suffer from cyclical changes will be helped by the long-range plan which will tend to stabilize the cycle. For those who are released from industrial pursuits because their jobs have been supplanted by machinery we have a major task of adjustment to accomplish; to find them new places in industry, possibly in new industry. For those men we need the machinery of the employment office to bring about that adjustment; to bring the information of the new job to the displaced employee.

And all the time facts and figures of employment and unemployment must be carefully watched and studied.

That, Mr. President, is my present answer to those who have asked, "What are you going to do about unemployment?" This session of Congress can be a really noteworthy one, distinguished by seriously undertaking to do something about unemployment.

GIFT OF COLLECTION OF PRINTERS' MARKS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have just come from the Library of Congress where I witnessed the ceremonies attending the gift to the Library of Congress of a remarkable collection of European printers' and publishers' marks, made up of 10,800 different leaves. The collection is the gift of Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr, a distinguished citizen of Berlin, Germany, and consists of 10,800 different items. It is the largest collection of its kind in the world.

These printer's marks are regarded generally as contributions of literature, of art, of the printer's craft, and of the publishing business. Collections of this kind are new. These marks came coincident with the invention of printing and of woodcutting. All of this collection dates from the fifteenth to the nineteenth century. It is a very remarkable display of the printer's art down to that time.

About 400 out of the 10,800 pieces are on exhibition in the Library. While it is only a matter of impulse with me that I am making this statement, I think it is worth every Senator's time at some time in the future to view the collection while it is on exhibition. It was sent as a loan originally and was on display. A half hour ago I witnessed the donation to the Library by the owner. It is one other evidence of the fact that our Library is coming to be the most distinctive and eminent of libraries housing collections of this sort.

I think it will not be over four or five years before the Congressional Library will be the depositary of the largest collection of books and manuscripts in the world, and this is one of the unusual incidents that demonstrate that fact.

I merely wanted to make this statement at this time, when I have just witnessed the ceremonies in connection with the donation.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. CAPPER, and Mr. SMITH conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAINE to insert, after line 17, page 53, the following proviso:

Provided, That after December 25, 1928, none of the appropriations made in this act shall be used to pay any expenses incurred in connection with acts of hostility against a friendly foreign nation, or any belligerent intervention in the affairs of a foreign nation, or any intervention in the domestic affairs of any foreign nation, unless war has been declared by Congress or unless a state of war actually exists under recognized principles of international law.

The words "acts of hostility" and the words "belligerent intervention" shall include within their meaning the employment of coercion or force in the collection of any pecuniary claim or any claim or right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States against the government of a foreign nation, either upon the initiation of the Government of the United States or upon the invitation of any foreign government existing de jure or de facto.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, as briefly as possible I propose to review the situation that would exist if we should adopt the pending amendment to the naval appropriation bill, offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. After the exhibition yesterday, if I may so refer to it, I ask Senators to permit me to state my views and present the observations I desire to present without interruption.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this subject is one of sufficient importance that a Senator of the United States should be permitted to present his viewpoint and his argument without interruption, because after all is said and done the new policy sought by the so-called Blaine amendment in my judgment is fundamental in defending the traditions and the history of the country. A Senator can not be put on the witness stand and cross-examined and have his viewpoint reversed by implication, and be able to present a clear presentation of his views at the same time. I shall be very glad, so far as I am able, from purely the layman's standpoint, to which it is probably unnecessary for me to refer, to answer any questions after I shall have presented the thoughts which I desire to submit.

Mr. President, I oppose the pending amendment not alone from the viewpoint so ably presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on yesterday—that is, so far as his arguments related to the absolute impossibility of this country repudiating a sacred contract made in the name of the President of the United States with contending factions or what had been contending factions in a foreign country. I agree with him absolutely in his argument so far as it relates to that obligation. But I oppose the pending amendment from another standpoint and that is in my judgment, if adopted that it would propose ineffectively, I believe, a curb upon the clearly defined constitutional power, responsibility, and duty of the Chief Executive of the United States, whatever party he might represent, in his contact and dealings with the other nations of the world.

To attempt to change the fundamental policy of over a century through the medium of a rider or an amendment to an annual appropriation bill, without even the slightest consideration on the part of any committee of the Congress, particularly the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which such a policy would naturally and properly be referred, or perhaps the Committee on the Judiciary, is to attempt through legislation to amend the Constitution, as I view it, and is so absolutely beyond defense that it would seem to be unnecessary to consume time even to discuss the proposition.

But in its presentation various suggestions have been made and criticisms have been entered into touching to some extent the present administration as well as previous administrations. I listened attentively most of the time to the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and, so far as I followed it, criticisms were leveled as well against many past administrations. In considering this amendment I feel that some attention should be paid to that criticism, because it is undoubtedly more or less existent in the country to-day. I am glad to discuss the issue as I view it, because it is not a partisan question and can not fairly be made a partisan question.

From the administration of President Roosevelt right through until the administration of President Coolidge, including, of course, that of President Wilson, as was stated several times by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday, without application to or the permission of Congress, various types of intervention were indulged in by the Executive in connection with disturbances in the countries of the Caribbean and in Central America. I do not propose to take time even to mention those various interventions or occupations in detail. The Senator from Idaho yesterday, I think, placed in the RECORD a statement of the various elections which our Government had supervised in Haiti, San Domingo, Cuba, Panama, and Nicaragua by various Executives from Roosevelt to the present time. None of these were through any action of Congress.

The Senator from Idaho very clearly—and I was impressed, could not be successfully challenged—gave it as his opinion that if the President of the United States is charged with foreign relations, and he is and no lawyer or layman can question that fact, then it is within his province and his decision as to what form of action he shall take when he is called upon to act or believes conditions in a foreign country necessitate action on the part of the Government of the United States. Whether the form of protection of American nationals and their property shall be that of supervising what should be a peaceful civil election is a matter, as I followed the argument of the Senator from Idaho and which is my conviction, entirely for the Chief Executive to decide. So far as that is concerned, from a practical standpoint, is it not far better that intervention or protection of the interests of American nationals and property should take the form of supervising a civil election, the modern method of selecting rulers, rather than that of armed intervention as it is generally construed and as it generally results?

I will not take time to quote references. One, however, would seem to cover this entire question. The Supreme Court said in a case arising from the bombardment of Graytown in 1854:

As respects the interposition of the Executive abroad for the protection of the life or the property of the citizen, the duty must, of necessity, rest on the discretion of the President.

Reviewing the years from 1903 to the present time, when those various types of so-called intervention or cooperation have occurred, I have not any criticism to make of any of them. I think it is impossible for us in the Senate at this time justly to criticize any of them. The results of some of them, of course, were not satisfactory perhaps to any of us. But the decision was made, by whoever was Chief Executive at the time, under his recognized responsibility and duty after being called upon by citizens and nationals of our own country to properly protect their interests in a foreign land. It is difficult for us at this time to analyze the reasons for the various efforts to protect American life and American property, but I am broad-minded enough to feel that every one of them, whatever may have been the result, was undoubtedly carried out absolutely in a spirit of patriotism and proper protection of American interests. I do not believe any critics of any administration will for one moment take the position that a single President of the United States—Roosevelt, Wilson, Taft, Harding, or Coolidge, all of whom were in power at times when these various protective movements became necessary, representing his own viewpoint or his party's viewpoint, or his country's viewpoint—had the slightest idea of any imperialistic design upon the country affected, but, on the other hand, it was for the one, sole, fundamental purpose of protecting the lives and property of our own citizens; to be helpful to the citizens of the country involved, whatever the country might be, and to give the power and strength of this great Nation in the interest of bettering the conditions of the republics to the south of us.

When it is assumed that any of these activities have been or are in the interest of anything but that type of cooperation, then, to my mind, criticism goes a way beyond political division. To my mind, it is a situation in which, while we may differ as to policy, especially in domestic affairs, we should be just a little more generous and a little more liberal with our Chief Executives of the past and present and those to come when they are dealing with foreign nations.

I repeat it is all quite well to differ on domestic policies, and we do differ on farm relief, tariff, merchant marine, prohibition, and many questions that come before us day after day. I hope and I believe, generally speaking, that out of those discussions comes the best constructive thought in the interest of a large majority of the people. But when we deal with a foreign country can not our critics close their ranks for once and let us have one American party away beyond the division of political combat, and thus be that much more effective in our absolutely unselfish and generous desire to be of real help and assistance in cooperation with our less fortunate neighbors on the south?

Mr. President, speaking directly now to the amendment, I recognize through its terms, in view of the fact that withdrawal of the marines is not to take place until December 25, 1928, that at least the proponent of the amendment—and I congratulate him upon the viewpoint—has admitted that it would be absolutely indefensible to repudiate the solemn contract made on behalf of this Government that we would supervise the election which takes place in late October of this year. We have heard much of withdrawing them at once.

But in addition to my fundamental opposition to the terms of the amendment, which I have already discussed in general terms, I am also opposed to any date being determined in advance, for what appeals to me as a practical objection, judging from the past history of Nicaragua particularly. The insertion of a specific date, the date now being considered being a date before the newly elected officials take office, which is on January 1 under their constitution, would be, I am afraid, an invitation for further disturbances in Nicaragua. Unfortunately we can not deal with Nicaragua in that manner.

Much has been said in the debates about our blundering into Nicaragua with our marines; that is, in the present occupation of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, in my judgment, we blundered out of Nicaragua when the marines were recalled in 1925. Within less than two months after the marines were ordered out in that year we all know that a revolution was inaugurated and the government of the country deposed. As I recall, a few marines had been in Nicaragua before that time from 1912—13 years—without any serious disturbance having occurred in Nicaragua. However, I have no intention of repeating that history, which is fairly well known, I am sure, to every Member of the Senate. I want to confine myself to the present situation. Neither shall I discuss the agreement between Colonel Stimson and the representative of the Nicaraguan Government, President Diaz, the representative of the deposed government, Vice President Sacassa, and the commander in chief of the revolutionary army, General Moncada. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] covered that phase of the subject yesterday in complete detail, and, in my opinion—I hope I am correct in the statement—a large majority of the Senate recognize the sacredness of that contract.

However, the question was raised in debate yesterday and has been previously raised as to why we were in Nicaragua anyway; why the marines were sent down a little over a year ago. The question was asked as to whether there was any real justification for the marines being returned to Nicaragua after they had been withdrawn in 1925 by President Coolidge.

I have here, Mr. President—and I shall only refer to it briefly, and I ask that it may be inserted as a part of my remarks—a memorandum furnished me by the Department of State, which goes back to August, 1926, setting forth numerous—and I emphasize the word "numerous"—requests for protection and assistance on the part of the American citizens in Nicaragua from our Government. I might say here that in my judgment, and from my viewpoint, at least, irrespective of any policy or any formula that might be adopted by the United States Senate, when a sovereign government is unable or fails to protect its citizens or their property to a reasonable extent in any country in the world, under the flag of any nation, it ceases to be a sovereign government.

These complaints, Mr. President, have no reference whatever to any financial interest or investment, so far as banker's loans are concerned. Of course, all investments in property, manufactures or mining, are necessarily financial, but as to loans of New York or other American bankers in Nicaragua about which we hear so much, I have been informed only this morning, that, according to the balance sheet of the Nicaraguan treasury, the total sum owed to-day to American bankers for loans advanced in the tremendous sum of $53,000, being the net balance of the loan of a million dollars made about a year ago. Not another penny is owed to American bankers. Bonds are still out, of course, representing previous loans held by individuals all over the world, I presume, just as other bonds are held by individuals everywhere; but, so far as the interest of the United States Government and its activities in Nicaragua are concerned, it can not be justifiably charged to the protection of New York or other American bankers. The protection asked by American citizens is mostly on behalf of mahogany and other lumber and business and mining companies.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement of the public debt of Nicaragua as of January 31, 1928, furnished me by the State Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[2] Various.
[3] Indeterminate (about 1936).

Mr. EDGE. I will cite a few of the instances of demands for protection as contained in the memorandum from the State Department to which I have referred.

On August 20 Senator RANSDELL telephoned to Mr. Stabler on behalf of the Otis Manufacturing Co. He said he understood that all proper steps would be taken by the department to protect American lives and interests, and Mr. Stabler assured him that such was the case; the department was watching the matter closely. On August 30 Senator RANSDELL was informed by letter that warships had been ordered from Balboa, Canal Zone, to Bluefields and Corinto to protect American lives and property.

On August 23 the American consul at Bluefields telegraphed that conditions were growing worse; that an attack on El Bluff and Bluefields was expected every moment; and that a warship was urgently needed to protect the lives and property of American citizens.

Again:

On August 27 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. telegraphed that the revolutionists were attacking its property at Bragmans Bluff, one of the company's officials being seriously wounded—

We have heard that nothing of that kind ever occurred—and asked that a warship be sent immediately. The company was informed in reply that the U. S. S. Galveston had been ordered to the east coast.

Again:

On September 1 the A. W. Tedcastle Co. (makers of boots and shoes)—

That does not sound like a New York banker—wrote inclosing a copy of a report from their representative at Bluefields, saying something should be done by the United States.

At another place in this memorandum it is stated:

On October 25, the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co. wrote to call attention to the recent trouble in its Bragmans Bluff division at Puerto Cabezas. The company stated that its investment there amounted to about $8,000,000 and that approximately 1,000 Americans were employed by it at Puerto Cabezas and along the railroad and tributaries thereto, and asked what protection might be expected from the United States Government.

The headquarters of the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co., I believe, are in New Orleans.

On December 13, 1926, the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. requested that Admiral Latimer be instructed to prevent unwarranted exaction of payments to revolutionary authorities who were demanding payments of taxes on shipments of logs already taxed and released by the Government.

That would seem to require some protection on the part of the Government if it is a government worthy of the name.

Senator Ernst called at the department and left a copy of a telegram of December 29, 1926, from the Mengel Co. requesting his support for their requests for protection by this Government for their mahogany operations.

Again:

On January 3, 1927, Eccleston & Son (Inc.) wrote that the revolutionary authorities were interfering with their business operations through illegal collection of taxes and duties, and the department was requested to invoke the assistance of the naval authorities to extend protection to the company.

Again:

On December 30, 1926, the La Luz & Los Angeles Mining Co.—

A California concern, I understand—wrote that they had $1,000,000 paid-up capital invested in Nicaragua; that revolutionary parties had interfered with their mining operations and shipment of their products; that armed forces had made forced levies of merchandise from their stores; that employees had been conscripted; that outside food supplies for their mine had been stocked for two months; that all floating equipment in the vicinity had been commandeered. They requested that all possible assistance be given the established Government in Nicaragua. They stated that they have meticulously abstained from interference in Nicaraguan politics—

And so forth.

I ask that the memorandum in its entirety be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum in full is as follows:

PROTECTION

JANUARY 11, 1927.

On August 19, 1926, the Otis Manufacturing Co. telegraphed that further revolutionary disturbances in Nicaragua were reported, that an outbreak at Bluefields would be serious, and asked what steps were being taken by this Government to protect property. The department replied on August 21 that it was following developments closely and would take such appropriate action as possible to protect American interests which might appear to be in danger.

On August 20 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed that interests in Nicaragua seemed to be in danger and said that sending a warship to Bluefields would help. This was answered on August 21 in the same words as the telegram from the Otis Manufacturing Co.

The Mengal Co. also telegraphed on August 20 and was answered in the same way.

On August 20 Senator RANSDELL telephoned to Mr. Stabler on behalf of the Otis Manufacturing Co. He said he understood that all proper steps would be taken by the department to protect American lives and interests, and Mr. Stabler assured him that such was the case. The department was watching the matter closely. On August 30 Senator RANSDELL was informed by letter that warships had been ordered from Balboa, Canal Zone, to Bluefields and Corinto to protect American lives and property.

On August 23 the American consul at Bluefields telegraphed that conditions were growing worse, that an attack on El Bluff and Bluefields was expected every moment, and that a warship was urgently needed to protect the lives and property of American citizens.

On August 25 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed asking that a warship be sent at once to Bluefields.

On August 27 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. telegraphed that the revolutionists were attacking its property at Bragmans Bluff, one of the company's officials being seriously wounded, and asked that a warship be sent immediately. The company was informed in reply that the U. S. S. Galveston had been ordered to the east coast.

The American consul at Bluefields telegraphed on August 31 as follows:

"Losses to Americans on the rivers will amount to $2,000,000 unless conflict stopped soon. If the five mahogany companies can not get protection on all the rivers their losses will be one and one-half millions. Contending factions take their boats, recruit their men, rendering them helpless, logs float out to sea. The two banana companies are also handicapped, their boats being taken and their laborers being recruited or frightened away."

On September 1 the A. W. Tedcastle Co., makers of boots and shoes, wrote, inclosing a copy of a report from their representative at Bluefields, saying something should be done by the United States.

On September 2 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. telegraphed that interests would suffer enormously unless warship Rochester remained indefinitely at Bragmans Bluff. This was answered the same day, to the effect that the Rochester would remain on the east coast until further orders.

On September 3 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. telegraphed asking for protection at Prinzapolka and various other loading ports, saying that neutral zone should be proclaimed and military force used if necessary. This was answered on September 4: "Two American warships at present on east coast of Nicaragua to protect American interests."

On September 4 the Mengel Co. telegraphed to ask that arrangements in force at Bluefields be extended to other loading ports. The department replied the same day, asking whether the Mengel Co.'s representative had communicated with the commanding officer of the nearest United States war vessel and informed him as to actual conditions.

On September 8 the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote to ask that loading ports north of Bluefields be declared neutral zone in the same manner as Bluefields itself.

On September 8 the Chicago Bridge & Iron Works wrote, inclosing a copy of a letter of August 29 from its manager at Puerto Cabezas, describing chaotic and dangerous conditions there. A reply was sent on September 15, stating that American war vessels had been sent to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Nicaragua to extend protection to American lives and property.

On September 17 the Mengel Co. telegraphed that fighting at Bluefields and vicinity had paralyzed everything.

On September 22 the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote that too much emphasis could not be laid on the seriousness of the situation on the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua. The hope was expressed that the Government of the United States would use its utmost influence to effect an immediate and lasting truce.

On September 23 the Otis Manufacturing Co. wired to ask protection for loading operations at El Bluff. On September 24 this telegram was sent in reply:

"An armistice was signed yesterday afternoon on board the S. S. Rochester at Bluefields to take effect immediately. Armistice for 15 days subject extension by mutual consent. Neutral zone extended to include Bluff and the bay. Escondido River opened to legitimate trade. Commerce may be promptly resumed with Bluefields and entire east coast of Nicaragua."

The same telegram was sent to the other companies interested.

On September 24 the department gave to the press the text of the 15-days' armistice agreement between the contending factions at Bluefields.

On October 11 Mr. Frank G. Otis, president of the Otis Manufacturing Co., called to discuss the situation. He said he hoped the conference to be held at Corinto would result in more stable conditions.

On October 13, 1926, the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. wrote that in view of the approaching termination of the truce it was desired that protection be arranged for the shipment of mahogany from the various eastern Nicaraguan ports. In a second letter of the same date the strategic position of El Bluff in relation to Bluefields Harbor was explained; unless El Bluff were neutralized no shipment could be made from Bluefields. Protection was requested for tugs and other floating equipment to prevent seizure by belligerents; the revolutionists tend to seizure of any floating equipment. Hope expressed that United States will exert all pressure within its power to avoid hostilities and effect a compromise; the people of Nicaragua, and reasonable men of both parties, are anxious to reach a compromise and are tired of warfare. The department replied that the matter would have careful consideration.

On October 25 the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co. wrote to call attention to the recent trouble in its Bragmans Bluff division at Puerto Cabezas. The company stated that its investment there amounted to about $8,000,000, and that approximately 1,000 Americans were employed by it at Puerto Cabezas and along the railroad and tributaries thereto, and asked what protection might be expected from the United States Government.

On November 2 the Freiberg Mahogany Co. wrote asking advice as to probable developments. The department replied on November 9 that the armistice between the contending factions had expired on October 27, that Bluefields and El Bluff remained a neutral zone, that it was impossible to predict what the course of events might be, and that the policy with regard to future investments was a question upon which the department was unable to give advice.

On November 2 Mr. Salmen, of the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co., telephoned to Mr. Morgan from New Orleans that the situation at Puerto Cabezas was becoming very serious and the company wanted to know what protection could be expected.

On November 10 the American Dyewood Co. wrote to ask for assistance in shipping fustic wood from Potosi, Nicaragua, in December or January. The department replied on November 11 that it was unable to predict what the situation might then be and, therefore, could give no advice.

On December 13, 1926, the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co. requested that Admiral Latimer be instructed to prevent unwarranted exaction of payments to revolutionary authorities who were demanding payments of taxes on shipments of logs already taxed and released by the Government.

On December 22 Mr. J. Gilmore Fletcher, agent for the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co., wrote to protest against unwarranted interference by the forces of Sacasa at Puerto Cabezas and to request adequate and prompt assistance and protection of American lives and property in danger.

On December 24 a joint telegram asking protection was sent to the department by the Otis Manufacturing Co., the Mengel Co., and the Astoria Importing & Manufacturing Co.

On December 29 the Bragmans Bluff Lumber Co. sent a strong telegram, quoting from Mr. Fletcher's letter of December 22, and again requesting that the lives of the employees and the property of the company, now clearly in jeopardy, be given full and prompt protection.

On December 30 Senator SACKETT left a letter from the Mengel Co. dated December 29, 1926, requesting his support to secure protection for their mahogany operation in Nicaragua. (317.11/166.)

Senator Ernst called at the department and left a copy of a telegram of December 29, 1926, from the Mengel Co. requesting his support for their requests for protection by this Government for their mahogany operations.

On January 2, 1927, Mr. Douglas H. Allen, in reporting his arrival at Bluefields, telegraphed that the situation was critical and rapidly growing worse; that warfare had passed into a new phase requiring immediate intervention by the United States, otherwise guerrilla warfare would result for a period of years; that immediate intervention could still control the situation and prevent widespread suffering, loss of life, and destruction of property.

On January 3, 1927, Eccleston & Son (Inc.) wrote that the revolutionary authorities were interfering with their business operations through illegal collection of taxes and duties, and the department was requested to invoke the assistance of the naval authorities to extend protection to the company.

On January 4, 1927, the American Legation telegraphed that President Diaz had set forth his inability to guarantee protection of American and other foreign lives; that the British and Italian diplomatic representatives found their nationals in Nicaragua in imminent peril without outside protection; that postponement of the establishment of a legation guard until a crisis developed would prevent the accomplishment of any valuable purpose by the guard.

On January 4, 1927, Mr. Douglas H. Allen telegraphed from Bluefields that in his opinion revolutionary movements would lose much strength if the United States would immediately issue public statement clearly defining its position.

On January 5, 1927, Representative ASWELL transmitted a letter, dated December 27, 1926, from the Standard Fruit & Steamship Co. indorsing the position of that company and requesting protection; and the Representative indorsed the landing of American marines in Nicaragua.

On December 30, 1926, the La Luz & Los Angeles Mining Co. wrote that they had $1,000,000 paid-up capital invested in Nicaragua; that revolutionary parties had interfered with their mining operations and shipment of their products; that armed forces had made forced levies of merchandise from their stores; that employees had been conscripted; that outside food supplies for their mine had been stocked for two months; that all floating equipment in the vicinity had been commandeered. They requested that all possible assistance be given the established Government in Nicaragua. They stated that they have meticulously abstained from interference in Nicaraguan politics.

Mr. EDGE. That, it seems to me, is fair evidence at least, in view of the thousands of American citizens in business in Nicaragua, with millions of dollars of capital invested in legitimate mercantile manufacturing and agricultural pursuits, that there was some justification for the Government of the United States affording protection.

From that time, of course, events happened rapidly. The revolution continued; hundreds of lives were lost on both sides, including the so-called liberal or revolutionary forces and the so-called conservatives. Finally conditions became so bad that the President of the United States sent a representative to Managua, the capital of Nicaragua. In my judgment, that action was entirely within his powers; it was wholly a matter for him to decide what action he should take in order to protect American citizens and their interests in Nicaragua. The policy pursued by him was no different from the policy adopted by President Wilson when he sent John Lind to Mexico when Mexican troubles were threatened and, in fact, had become acute. President Wilson, in that instance, in my judgment, was absolutely within his right.

Colonel Stimson finally negotiated the agreement or understanding which has been referred to so frequently. The conclusion had been reached that the most effective method to adopt in order to bring about peace in Nicaragua, to stop the wholesale butchery on both sides among the Nicaraguans, would be to have an armistice declared and all arms turned in with the understanding that our Government would supervise the election of a new President and Vice President of the country.

It has been suggested that coercion was used in order to bring about this agreement. To that point very briefly I wish to refer. I will admit, as did the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on yesterday, that the plain reading of the letter sent by Colonel Stimson to General Moncada to the effect—I will not reread it for it has been read two or three times in the RECORD already—that in the event the rebels should refuse to lay down their arms they would be forcibly dispossessed of them, sounds something like coercion, but this is what Colonel Stimson has stated publicly as to sending the letter:

I included the last sentence—

Which was—

and that the forces of the United States will be authorized to accept the custody of the arms of those willing to lay them down, including the Government, and to disarm forcibly those who will not do so—

I included the last sentence not as a threat to Moncada's organized and loyal troops, who, I was confident, would follow their leader's direction, but as a needed warning to the bandit fringe who were watching for any sign that we were not in earnest in order to indulge their taste for pillage once the Government troops had laid down their arms and there remained no force in the country other than the Americans able to restrain them.

When, Mr. President, you read that and consider it in the light of the Sandino operations you can readily determine how farseeing Colonel Stimson was in making such a statement. He anticipated that there would be some such event as finally happened, when Sandino went back on his own pledge, made over his own signature, to disarm and then did not do so, but went out in the fastnesses and started to make war upon almost anyone who crossed his path and to rob and exact tributes from American citizens.

Again, Colonel Stimson makes this statement, which seemed to me very significant, in connection with President Diaz who, it has been suggested time after time, was the stormy petrel there who kept peace from being achieved. His reason for not insisting that President Diaz abdicate the Presidency is well expressed in this statement which he gave out at that time.

Colonel Stimson stated:

Mr. Diaz himself in one of his conferences with me expressed his own readiness to retire voluntarily, if such retirement were essential to a peace settlement. The result of my investigations, however, convinced me that only through his remaining in office was an immediate peace settlement possible. Under the Nicaraguan constitution he was ineligible to be a candidate in the election in 1928 to succeed himself. The situation in his case, therefore, could not be complicated by personal ambitions.

In other words, there must be a government. There must be a president. I recognize that it is a question on which men honestly differ as to whether President Diaz's ascendancy to the office was strictly proper or otherwise. I shall not discuss that matter at this time. But, whether it was or whether it was not, the fact remains, as Colonel Stimson has clearly defined in that statement, that to have deposed President Diaz from office at that time would have simply invited more confusion than to have kept him in office, which he insisted on doing in order that there should be a government maintained, and to prepare for the election, and prepare the legislation necessary, or thought to be necessary, to carry out an election.

Right there, without holding any brief for President Diaz, I think, in fairness to him we must admit so far as the press reports that have reached us advise, that he tried his best to influence the congress or the legislature of Nicaragua to pass what was considered by our representatives a workable and fair election law.

Unfortunately, every move that he made seems to have been more or less successfully thwarted by Chamorro, who undoubtedly has been, as past history records, the one real, outstanding, disturbing element in Nicaragua.

After these various preliminary discussions, General Moncada met Colonel Stimson, with representatives of the former vice president, Sacasa; and I want to read just one or two paragraphs of General Moncada's own statement, because it seems to me that it will assist at least in giving a little clearer idea of just what our country has obligated itself to do, and just how those who accepted that promise are expecting us to carry it out; rather than that they were coerced.

A year or so ago, when we were debating on the floor of the Senate the right or otherwise of President Diaz to be recognized by this country, the entire debate on the opposition side surrounded protection for the Liberals, commanded by General Moncada. Just as soon, however, as General Moncada, as a real patriot, believed that the time had arrived to stop butchering his own countrymen and having his followers likewise butchered in open conflict and battle, and depend upon the United States under its guaranty to give them a fair chance for a fair election, the home critics here, apparently losing Moncada as the opportunity to criticise their own Government, became followers and backers of Sandino, who had been publicly repudiated in letter and statement by his former commander, General Moncada.

Mr. President, leaving Chamorro entirely out of the picture—and I think he should be left out—if General Moncada and President Diaz can not speak for 90 to 95 per cent of their countrymen, I do not believe a few critics in the United States, in the Senate or otherwise, are in any way justified or deputized to speak for them.

General Moncada stated in a letter issued December 14, 1927, following this agreement which was ratified on May 11, 1927:

> We Liberals want the United States marines in Nicaragua. We believe that the marine officers such as now command our constabulary can best supervise the free elections necessary to put a representative government in office. Further, we believe that the United States owes it to Nicaragua to keep her marines there until such elections have taken place. It is her duty and obligation.

That is the man who was the martyr a year ago, but who is now being protected by the United States Government, and I trust the protection will continue until our full duty has been accomplished.

He says, further, with regard to meeting Colonel Stimson in the field, leading up to the signing of the agreement:

> Here we found the personal representative of President Coolidge, General Stimson, bearing peace proposals, asking for a cessation of the war.
>
> His words were simple, but solemn and decisive:
> "In the name of the United States I exhort you that this war may cease and not another drop of blood be spilt in Nicaragua; on its part, the Washington Government accepts President Diaz's proposal for the supervision of the election of the chief authorities in 1928, which shall be free and fair, so that all Nicaraguan citizens may express their will at the polls. My Government considers that the very honor of the United States is involved in this. In recognizing Diaz my Government has acted in good faith, under a sincere interpretation of the laws of Nicaragua, and wishes the present Chief Executive to continue in the discharge of his functions while the electoral law is reformed and a true nonpartisan national guard is created. With that guard and the marines a free and just election will be carried out."

The answer of General Moncada, touching the matter, is as follows. Understand, he had just come in from the field, where he was in command of the revolutionary army:

> I am here as a simple soldier, and it is my duty to consult with the other chiefs of the army and with the delegates of Doctor Sacasa, who are also in Tipitapa. I ask of you a period of eight days to give an answer. During that time I will return to the army to do what I can to convince it, or to return to war if its opinion should be contrary to mine.

In these conversations the delegates of Doctor Sacasa, the man that our home critics were continually backing a year ago, were present and took part.

Then General Moncada further states:

> I am perfectly convinced, however, that Sacasa or any other statesman will always need the help of the United States to establish a good government. When General Stimson told me at Tipitapa that the President of the United States was willing to assist in the supervision of our election in 1928, I felt, and still feel, that this would open to Nicaragua the only way by which such good government and a lasting peace could be established. I told General Stimson frankly that peace had so far only been attained through tyranny in Nicaragua. Tyranny brings with it no good and depraves the public conscience. To gain power over the dead bodies of our fellow citizens is only worthy of men who are superfluous in modern civilization.
> The worth of the election in Nicaragua depends now on the manner in which the arrangements of Tipitapa are carried out. If they are carried out honestly, as I believe they will be, due to President Coolidge's word, the elections will be made with entire equity.

On this question of American capital, even in a letter dealing mainly with the promise and the guarantee of this Government to supervise the election, General Moncada includes this in his statement:

> Capital is a great necessity in Nicaragua for the development of the country's progress. We have neither railroads nor highways. We are out of communication with the civilized world. The construction of the railway to the Atlantic coast is very urgent to bring us nearer to the United States and to Europe. We need more American capital, and it is our first duty to seek it here, for we are obliged to do it by the close relationship that binds together the countries of America for their mutual defense.
> Those that accuse the State Department of supporting President Diaz in obedience to the pressure of bankers and for mean reasons of internal and foreign policies fail in logic when they attack the agreements of Tipitapa and the supervision of the next election by the marines. They know that, upon the premature withdrawal of the marines, power would remain with Diaz or Chamorro, and constitutionalists would lose all hope of liberty and democracy. This would be a tremendous injustice.

Recently there was a convention in Managua of the Liberal political party. General Moncada, the former chief of the revolutionists, was nominated for the Presidency. Demonstrating the view of the general as to the reversed position of our home critics in having deserted his standard, I quote just one paragraph from the general's speech:

> In the Liberal Party only one window was opened, a light in the far distance; the free election of 1928 guaranteed by the Government at Washington signified the establishment of our protest of 18 years. * * * In the appreciation of all this, we have painfully observed how the opinion of those have changed who during the war praised our heroism, who applauded from afar when butcherings took place, but who never helped the heroes with one cent or one cartridge. Those who clamored to the world the justice which accompanied the Nicaraguan Liberals now desire that the American marines, the surety of our liberty, our lives, and property, retire to their own country. This is the humanity and generosity which blazons some representative brothers of America.

This is General Moncada, the leader of the Liberals. He is now deserted by the home critics.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the charge of coercion absolutely fails. A government had to be maintained. The one man who could not run for office at the forthcoming election, who was in office at the time, remained in office, not at his own request. He says here without qualification that he was perfectly ready to abdicate. He remained there because it was considered by the representative of the President of the United States advisable and necessary for him to do so. Under the Constitution the President of the United States certainly has the power to decide what method to pursue in order properly to protect American lives and property. Under that constitutional power this particular decision was made and carried out, entirely with the cooperation and agreement and now with the insistence of the leader of the revolutionary army. Certainly that was not coercion.

Mr. President, there is one other matter to which I want to draw notice which seemed to escape attention in a great part of the debate yesterday and previously.

I do not propose to discuss the Monroe doctrine and its various interpretations. They perhaps have changed with changing conditions more or less in the last 101 years, during which time every President, I believe, has endeavored to carry it out. They have changed because of changed circumstances, probably; but there never has been a change, so far as I know, in the realization and recognition in this country of the fact that where our Chief Executive, in command of the Army, believed it necessary to occupy or intervene in the affairs of another country, we, the people of the United States, proposed to do so; and there never has been a time, so far as I can recall, when we have permitted the troops of a foreign country to do our work for us. There is not any question in the world but that in the present situation—it is all a matter of record—we were asked by the representatives of Great Britain, by the representatives of Italy, and, I believe, by the representatives of Belgium, to protect their nationals who reside in Nicaragua, naturally with the implication that if we would not they would be compelled to do so. If the Monroe doctrine means anything, as I interpret it, it certainly means that we are not knowingly going to permit any European or Asiatic country to occupy a republic in the Western Hemisphere; and I will say from that standpoint that, so far as I know, no country in any part of the globe, in recent years, certainly, has attempted to do so; that the Monroe doctrine has been generally recognized in international treaties and in international affairs.

Do we propose to abandon that policy? If we had not sent our troops to Nicaragua on the request, almost the demand, of American citizens whose lives and property were in jeopardy, certainly one of these other nations would have sent theirs. I wonder if any American citizen would have been proud of that situation.

If the amendment that is now pending before the Senate should be adopted under its very terms, as I understand them—that is, if the amendment could hold water for a moment, and I do not think it could—at least the intent of the amendment would be to prevent the President of the United States from sending a single soldier to Nicaragua, no matter if our own citizens, Great Britain, or any other country requested us to do so in the protection of nationals, if it meant that we were in any way interfering in the domestic affairs of the country. Of course, we are interfering in the domestic affairs of another nation to some extent when we send armed troops to another nation to protect our nationals, our citizens, and, to a reasonable extent, their property.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are entering on dangerous ground when we seek to amend the Constitution of the United States through a rider to an appropriation bill. I am not sure that a calm, careful, patriotic study of these situations, in view of present conditions, would not be entirely appropriate for the Foreign Relations Committee or the Committee on the Judiciary. We seem to indulge in almost every line of activity and research in these days. We passed a resolution in the last Congress, unanimously, as I recall it, in which we advised the President to use arbitration in his dealings with Mexico, recognizing that those dealings, under the Constitution, were in his hands. Certainly that was harmless. As a matter of fact, I do not know just how far it influenced the President. Shortly after that he appointed Dwight W. Morrow as ambassador to Mexico, under his responsibility to make such appointments, and Dwight W. Morrow, as is well known, has already settled some very intricate international matters which affected our interests. I have no doubt he is using the principle of arbitration, as is well evidenced in all his negotiations with the foreign office of Mexico. I saw no particular impropriety, however, in our adopting that resolution at the time, and, as I recall, I voted for it.

If the Foreign Relations Committee or the Judiciary Committee could untangle the involved situations which will face every administration in connection with conditions to the south of us—though I do not see how either committee could—could lay out any plan or rule that would be helpful to the State Department or the President, I would be glad, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, to take part in the consideration of such matters, but I think such action should be taken only with the clear understanding and conviction that it is only in our advisory capacity that we act, with the hope that among 96 men something might be evolved that would be of help. After all is said and done, the responsibility is alone the responsibility of the President of the United States.

We had stopped bloodshed in Nicaragua, so far as opposing armies of Nicaragua were concerned, by the effort of the President to protect the lives and property of our citizens through the method of supervising the elections. True, some of our own brave soldiers have fallen in that effort. Nothing could be more regretted, nothing could more quickly sadden the American people, nor more quickly bring the natural response, "What is it all about?" It is one of the responsibilities of government, one of the ever-unknown possibilities of bearing arms in an army of any country. I recognize that the President has absolutely no right to declare war or to engage in war in any country without the consent of Congress. There is no argument about that. However, it is absolutely impossible—and let us not confront our Chief Executive with absolute impossibilities—when any Chief Executive, in the course of his duty and responsibility, sends troops to a foreign country, and they are there absolutely as neutrals, and are attacked by irregulars, who do not represent any government, and several of them are killed from ambush and pursued into their own quarters, to say for one minute that because, in order to save their lives, they suddenly pursue offensive warfare, the President of the United States is violating the Constitution.

As a matter of fact, when these negotiations were entered into, on May 11, 1927, Congress was not in session. Colonel Stimson, as I recall, went down some time in March, and Congress had adjourned the 4th of March. The troops were there, and more troops were sent there, and these regrettable things have happened.

I repeat, as one who has had some slight experience in the military of the country, that in 10 minutes, under the command of the commandant of the forces, be they large or small, purely defensive tactics necessarily and properly may become an offensive warfare. Whether Congress is in session or is not in session, that much consideration, that much regard, that much appreciation of a Chief Executive should be given by every citizen of the country and not the technical point raised that because of situations beyond human control we are illegally at war with Nicaragua.

Mr. SACKETT obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question or two. He said he would be pleased to be interrogated when he had finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska for that purpose?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, a state of war exists now in Nicaragua.

Mr. EDGE. I presume technically; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I would like to ask the Senator if the Constitution of the United States, which he says is being amended, has not been amended by that war being brought about by the President, without any declaration on the part of Congress.

Mr. EDGE. Technically so.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I want to know.

Mr. EDGE. If I may refer to the last statement I made, there are times, when lives of American citizens are jeopardized, when it does seem to me that some consideration must be given to the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is in favor, then, under some circumstances, of having the President instead of Congress declare war?

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I think I agree with the view expressed by the Senator from Idaho as to that matter, as I followed him yesterday. I would prefer, in a situation of this kind, were it possible, to have the President come to Congress, but I can well conceive of a situation where it would not be possible. In this particular case, when the troops were sent down to Nicaragua, unless he had called a special session of Congress, it would not have been possible for him to consult Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator must realize, from his own answer and his own idea, if war is existing there it was brought on in some way, but Congress did not declare it, and Nicaragua did not declare it. Therefore it has come about by the action of the President. Does the Senator say he is in favor of permitting the President to declare war whenever Congress is not in session?

Mr. EDGE. It has come about by what I consider an absolutely unwarranted banditry attack on the part of a few men in Nicaragua not connected with any government.

Mr. NORRIS. For argument's sake let us admit that, but the Senator admits there is war. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the right to declare war, and does not give that privilege or that right or authority to the President.

Mr. EDGE. I repeat, I recognize that there is a technical situation, and I have explained my view about it.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield, for just a question.

Mr. DILL. I thought the Senator from New Jersey had the floor.

Mr. SACKETT. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky was recognized, and yielded for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Nebraska to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey how many civilians have been killed in Nicaragua as the result of the trouble that took the marines in there.

Mr. EDGE. I can only refer the Senator to the Navy report.

Mr. DILL. Not soldiers; I am talking about civilians.

Mr. EDGE. I understand; noncombatants.

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. The report filed by the Secretary of the Navy within the last 48 hours gave as complete an estimate as he was able to give. I do not recall the figures, but it is a public document.

Mr. DILL. Have American citizens been killed?

Mr. EDGE. No noncombatants. I think the statement as to noncombatants killed referred entirely to Nicaraguans.

Mr. DILL. That is what I want to bring out. My understanding is that no American civilian has been killed, that none was killed either before the marines went in or has been killed since they went in.

Mr. EDGE. I read of one being wounded. I know of none being killed.

Mr. DILL. Then the American lives that have been lost were the lives of American boys taken down there with the marines because of the desire to protect property owned by Americans who wanted to continue to profit.

Mr. EDGE. I would not agree that it was because of the desire to protect property owned by Americans. I would insist that it was mainly and fundamentally for the protection of the lives of American citizens. It speaks mighty well for the marines if no American citizens have been killed, if that report is true. It shows they have done their duty well, if none have been killed.

Mr. DILL. There is no proof that any lives were in danger.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to take just a moment or two in reply to a question asked by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday with regard to whether there was any precedent for this action.

He will find in House Documents, volume 1, No. 1721, Sixty-third Congress, Foreign Relations volume, the plan of President Wilson referred to Commissioners Fort and Smith in August, 1914. With this plan there was handed a note from Secretary Bryan, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 13, 1914.

For Commission Proceeding to Santo Domingo:

You are instructed to observe and follow out with utmost care plan which has been presented you by the Secretary of State. No opportunity for argument should be given to any person or faction. It is desired that you present plan and see that it is complied with.

BRYAN.

Here follows the plan of President Wilson as handed to the commissioners:

(File No. 839.00/1582)

PLAN OF PRESIDENT WILSON HANDED TO COMMISSIONERS FORT AND SMITH, AUGUST, 1914

The Government of the United States desires nothing for itself from the Dominican Republic and no concessions or advantages for its citizens which are not accorded citizens of other countries. It desires only to prove its sincere and disinterested friendship for the Republic and its people and to fulfill its responsibilities as the friend to whom in such crises as the present all the world looks to guide Santo Domingo out of its difficulties.

It, therefore, makes the following earnest representations not only to the existing de facto Government of the Dominican Republic but also to all who are in any way responsible for the present posture of affairs there:

I. It warns everyone concerned that it is absolutely imperative that the present hostilities should cease and that all who are concerned in them should disperse to their several homes, disbanding the existing armed forces, and returning to the peaceful occupations upon which the welfare of the people of the Republic depends. This is necessary, and necessary at once. Nothing can be successfully accomplished until this is done.

II. It is also necessary that there should be an immediate reconstitution of political authority in the Republic. To this end the Government of the United States very solemnly advises all concerned with the public affairs of the Republic to adopt the following plan:

(1) Let all those who have any pretensions to be chosen president of the Republic and who can make any sufficient show of exercising a recognized leadership, and having an acknowledged following, agree upon some responsible and representative man to act as provisional president of the Republic, it being understood that Mr. Bordas will relinquish his present position and authority. If these candidates can agree in this matter, the Government of the United States will recognize and support the man of their choice as provisional president. If they can not agree, the Government of the United States will itself name a provisional president, sustain him in the assumption of office, and support him in the exercise of his temporary authority. The provisional president will not be a candidate for president.

(2) At the earliest feasible date after the establishment and recognition of the provisional government thus established let elections for a regular President and Congress be held under the authority and direction of the provisional president, who will, it must, of course, be understood, exercise during his tenure of office the full powers of President of the Republic; but let it be understood that the Government of the United States will send representatives of its own choosing to observe the election throughout the Republic, and that it will expect those observers not only to be accorded a courteous welcome but also to be accorded the freest opportunities to observe the circumstances and processes of the election.

(3) Let it be understood that if the United States Government is satisfied that these elections have been free and fair and carried out under conditions which enable the people of the Republic to express their real choice, it will recognize the President and Congress thus chosen as the legitimate and constitutional government of the Republic and will support them in the exercise of their functions and authority in every way it can. If it should not be satisfied that elections of the right kind have been held, let it be understood that another election will be held at which the mistakes observed will be corrected.

III. A regular and constitutional government having thus been set up, the Government of the United States would feel at liberty thereafter to insist that revolutionary movements cease and that all subsequent changes in the government of the Republic be effected by the peaceful processes provided in the Dominican constitution. By no other course can the Government of the United States fulfill its treaty obligations with Santo Domingo or its tacitly conceded obligations as the nearest friend of Santo Domingo in her relations with the rest of the world.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SACKETT. I prefer to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, on April 5 there appeared an article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, signed by George N. Peek, which was a collection of misstatements, misrepresentations, and conclusions distinctly libelous directed against Secretary Hoover. The long diatribe is a labored and biased effort to prove that Herbert Hoover is and has been since 1917 "the arch enemy" of the American farmer. I know of no public expression ever made that should cause so much revulsion in the minds of honest men, especially since it comes from one whose public position during the stress of war, when the Nation's life was at stake, gave him full opportunity to know the truth.

As directing head of a Government committee, Mr. Peek was doubly obligated to the American people for an accuracy of statement as distinguished from studied misrepresentation used as political propaganda. I deprecate the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the political purpose of injuring leading men of either party just because they may be under discussion for public office. Mr. Peek directs most of his misleading statements and half truths to recounting and criticizing the work of the Food Administration as directed by Mr. Hoover during the war. Therefore I can not remain silent.

I was a member of the Food Administration representing Mr. Hoover in my State, and it thus happens that I am in a fortunate position to discuss this subject. I find that facts have been garbled and unwarranted conclusions drawn; therefore I insist on letting the country know the real attitude of Mr. Hoover toward American agriculture. I shall also detail certain facts of postarmistice relationships that in large measure account for a growing antagonism on the part of Mr. Peek toward Mr. Hoover. I shall then show the misrepresentation and false statements in Mr. Peek's article which were calculated to poison the minds of the American farmer. The supporting contemporary documents furnish complete refutation of his insidious propaganda. I do not propose a defense of Mr. Hoover; that is not necessary. But I shall show his devotion to the agricultural interests and his remarkable achievements in behalf of the farmers of the country.

Since reading Mr. Peek's statement, I have refreshed my memory through consultation with certain of my colleagues in the Food Administration at the time, and I can emphatically say that the one dominating consideration of the Food Administration throughout the war was the protection of the American farmer. It was a matter of necessity for the world to have increased production of foodstuffs in America as the nearest productive area to the conflict, and means and measures had to be taken that would stimulate the interest of the American farmer. Under the definite plans of Mr. Hoover that stimulation was created. I can say further that no period of greater prosperity has ever come to the farmer in this country than during the life of the Food Administration and the year following its dissolution. There has been no time when the profits of farming were so large, no time when there was such a great advance in land values, and there was no time in all the hundreds of discussions of these problems that Mr. Hoover did not evince his conviction of the necessity of protecting the farmer. There was no time when his own farm upbringing did not come to the surface in the assertion of the farmer's rights.

It would be impossible to go into detail of the hundred negotiations involved in the enormous and complex problem of feeding the world, but there were several outstanding acts which could have been performed only by one whose heart and devotion were in the farmer's interest. One of Mr. Hoover's first acts was to advise the President that the allied governments had pooled the buying of cereals into a single head to become the sole buyer of the export surplus of American food products; that through the control of the export surplus this sole buyer would control the price, and, furthermore, that the attempt was to control that price below levels that would be just to the American farmer. Though the Congress had passed the food control act, setting a minimum price on wheat of $2 per bushel for the 1918 crop, no attempt had been made to establish a price for the 1917 supply. It was therefore at the mercy of the export buyers. As a remedy for the dangerous control of export buying for the earlier crop, Mr. Hoover suggested that the President appoint an independent board on which the farmers would have a dominant interest to determine a fair price to be paid for this export surplus of wheat. That board made the determination. Mr. Hoover was not a member of that board. They determined that a fair price was $2.20 a bushel—20 cents higher than the congressional guaranty on the 1918 crop—and this $2.20 made by the farmer board without the intervention of Mr. Hoover was the price during the war, not because Mr. Hoover held the price of wheat to this as a minimum, as Mr. Peek alleges in his article, but because it was the price declared to be fair to the sole buyer of the export surplus.

Another of his outstanding acts in protecting the farmer was the creation of the Farmers Advisory Board, representative of the agricultural interests all over the United States, and this board sat at Mr. Hoover's elbow throughout the war to represent the farmer, and it was on the recommendation of that board that he acted. They recommended a minimum of $15.50 per hundredweight to be fixed for hogs in the early part of 1918. This guaranty was subsequently shifted by the board to what was considered a more stimulative basis so that the price of hogs would be held at thirteen times the price of corn. Mr. Hoover had no authority or method by which this could be accomplished except his skill and negotiation with the allied buyers on the one hand and the Chicago packers on the other. He negotiated it on behalf of the farmer.

In October, 1918, the approaching armistice caused a rapid fall in the price of corn, and, as a result, the price of hogs to the farmer under the formula adopted threatened to fall below a just amount. The advisory board immediately recommended that the minimum should be raised to $17.50—more than 120 per cent above pre-war prices, and Mr. Hoover again negotiated this protection.

Probably the greatest service ever rendered the American farmer was during the first four months of the armistice period beginning November, 1918. Under the stimulus of the guaranteed price the farmers had prepared a huge surplus of from eighteen to twenty million tons of food to carry on the war for another year. With the sudden arrival of the armistice, with shipping released from war necessities, the Allies were at liberty to go again to the Southern Hemisphere and secure the foodstuffs there accumulated for years because of lack of transport to Europe at far lower prices than those that had been assured the American farmer for his products. The Allies canceled their American contracts. Mr. Hoover was confronted with the tremendous task of redirecting this entire stream of American supplies accumulated for continuing the war into the old enemy country and other markets at a time when credit and ships were lacking. He met with the opposition of the Allies to taking down the blockade on Germany. It required four months of steady fighting to get the blockade down and afford an entrance into the countries lying beyond the western front. During this period the only thing that saved the American farmer from complete collapse was the resolute courage with which Mr. Hoover purchased every month's surplus as it arrived at seaboard. For four months he held the market by main strength until, his fight won with the Allies, he had secured an opening for this great volume of accumulated American products. The war was over at this time, and Mr. Hoover might quite well have retired as a voluntary officer of the Government. It had no right to call upon his services. Yet, without pay and without even traveling expenses, he had sailed for Europe to carry on the battle to maintain the moral guaranties under which the American farmer had produced this surplus and at the same time to feed hundreds of millions of starving people.

The Food Administration ended on June 30, 1919, but so firm were the foundations that Mr. Hoover had laid that the prices of American products held their high levels for a year subsequent to that time. These great outstanding acts have been misrepresented and lied about until the American farmer has been given the impression that these very actions which saved him were militantly against his interests.

No need to speak here in showing Mr. Hoover's continued service to the American farmer. It is going on right down to the present day. Nothing has contributed more to bringing back American agriculture than the establishment of stability in our economic situation, and Mr. Hoover has been a larger factor in that work than any one man in the United States. Nothing is of more service to the farmer than, by perfection in the processes of production and distribution, to reduce the cost of the things that he must buy. The record of the Department of Commerce in this direction has made it an outstanding organization of the Government. The benefits that the farmer has had in these reductions in the cost of things he buys and in full employment of American labor over the last five years are actually greater than would be a rise of 20 per cent in the price of his farm products.

Mr. Hoover has been Secretary of Commerce, not Secretary of Agriculture. His job has been to assist the farmer from a commercial side. He has accomplished his job. This forms a record of deeds which are open to public examination at any time.

By contrast, the record of Mr. Peek, self-appointed critic of the man who compelled the world to recognize its obligations to the American farmer, is a record of talk, misrepresentation, and slogans except during one short period, and I propose to enter into some discussion of that period. That was the time when Mr. Hoover was fighting to uphold prices of farm products during the armistice and to find a market to save the American farmer from destruction. Peek, as the head of a committee of the Commerce Department which he was instrumental in devising, was at that very time trying to reduce these prices. While Hoover was fighting in Europe, Peek was attacking him from the rear. Luckily for the American farmer, he did not succeed.

George N. Peek's record shows a service during the war with the War Industries Board, but he does not come into direct conflict with the efforts that were made by Mr. Hoover in behalf of the farmer until after the armistice. Then a board was created, known as the Department of Commerce Industrial Board, and Mr. Peek was made its chairman. The struggle of that industrial board under his chairmanship during its short life of 2 months and 19 days, deliberately trying to bring about a reduction in prices to be paid the American farmer, at the very time when Mr. Hoover was fighting his postarmistice battle in Europe to maintain the moral guaranties to the producer, is not a happy history to be read by the agricultural interests of this country. It will bear a careful telling, as it tends to show with a definiteness that can not be gainsaid which of these two men was the farmer's friend. I shall point to the contemporary records and documents as proof of the positions taken.

I am not alone in condemning Mr. Peek's misrepresentations and half truths, which so insidiously seek to prejudice American agriculture against its real benefactor, and I can not better demonstrate that fact than to reproduce here a statement from my colleague, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. As Secretary of the Treasury in 1919, Senator GLASS evidently had extensive experience with the industrial board and its methods and with Mr. Peek's ability to misrepresent facts, if we may judge from the Senator's statement in the Washington Post of May 12, 1919. That board was born in the Treasury, and after coming rapidly into conflict with several Government departments was ignominiously dissolved. Secretary GLASS, in pronouncing eulogy at that time, said in part:

> There is scarcely one accurate assertion or sane deduction in all of Mr. Peek's intemperate screed, and to me it is now perfectly clear why there has been a sad ending of the movement which had its initial meeting in the Treasury and which had for its purpose the revival of industrial activity through agents and by methods that were not contrary to the statutes nor obnoxious to the elementary principles of economics. Mr. Peek knows perfectly well that I have never in any way or at any time suggested such action as that taken by the industry board; hence his reference to me on this point perverts the actual truth. Indeed, it is not inexact to say that Mr. Peek has persistently and consistently practiced deception in nearly every public statement he has made.

No better summarization could be made to-day with reference to the mass of misinformation with which Mr. Peek stains the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in respect to Mr. Hoover.

THE FIGHT FOR THE AMERICAN FARM

Bear with me while I sketch Mr. Hoover's battle in Europe for the American farm and tell the details of the other battle which he was forced to wage with enemies behind his own lines at home.

With the arrival of the armistice, in November, 1918, the American farmer was confronted with the greatest crisis in 150 years' history of American agriculture. Under the appeals for war service in producing food to support the Allies, under the stimulus of the guaranty given by the Government of $2 a bushel on wheat, under the further stimulus of the informal arrangements set up by agreement between the allied buyers and our various commercial agencies jointly, with the farmers covering assurances as to prices for hogs, for cottonseed oil, for rice, and other commodities, the American farmer had prepared the greatest surplus of products ever known in our history. We had prepared an amount of foodstuffs equal to three times our average exports of six and one-half million tons before the war and over double our present annual exports. Due to the shortage in shipping the long-distance markets in the Argentine, Cape Colony, India, and Australia were isolated and there had been dammed back in these countries in November, 1918, vast quantities of foodstuffs that could not be shipped during the war. They were held at much less than the price of American food.

With the armistice, shipping was available to the Allies to reach these sources of supplies. Mr. Hoover recognized the impending disaster that might come to American agriculture, the moral obligation that lay to the American farmer. He went straight to Europe to fight against the situation which was impending. The Allies wanted cheaper food. They saw no reason why they should pay the high guaranteed prices to the American farmer now that the war was over. They canceled contracts they had already made for American supplies. They refused to make further contracts. On the other hand, there were 200,000,000 people starving east of the old western front and a sudden shift in strategy and tactics had to be made in every direction. This shift was vitally necessary for American agriculture if it was to be saved from bankruptcy and if at the same time the vast population in central Europe were to be saved from inevitable anarchy and starvation. But they had little money or ships for transportation. As part of this plan to get cheaper food for their own people, the allied governments refused to take down the blockade on the enemy territory. Our great stream of surplus had to be moved every day. The Government could store wheat; its price was guaranteed by Congress, but these other agricultural products were many of them perishable. There was not sufficient storage in any event. They had to be moved by ships from our ports steadily into foreign countries for consumption.

Mr. Hoover's battle for the American farmer during the four months of December, 1918, and January, February, and March, of 1919, appears between the lines of dry Government reports and war studies. It will some day be a part of the histories of the United States, and it surely demonstrates the most loyal friend that the farmer ever had. During these months Mr. Hoover fought with the allied governments not only that they should take down the German blockade, in order that the starving Germans might have food and that there might be an outlet for the enormous American surplus, but he fought to secure the finance and the ships with which these starving people might be fed. While the allied governments were refusing either to fulfill their orders or take down the blockade it was Mr. Hoover's courage in purchasing every month the export surplus in the American market for four solid months mainly through the Government agencies or himself placing direct orders with other nations that frustrated the attempt to break the American farmer.

He finally succeeded on March 24, 1919, in the final negotiations by which the blockade with Germany was broken down. And in that country and adjacent countries he secured a market for the surplus. He maintained the moral guaranties to our farmers; he protected Congress in its guaranties of $2 a bushel for wheat without loss; he held the price of hogs above $17.50 a hundred; he held the price of cottonseed, rice, and other products where moral obligations had been extended to the farmer. I need not read you the correspondence between Mr. Hoover and the foreign governments, the records of minutes of meetings, the public statements, the debates of this period. They are available, but they are buried in the economic discussions of the war. But if you will go through them you will find there is scarcely a document that does not plead the case of the American farmer and there is scarcely a document that does not demand in the name of humanity that the starving of central Europe should be stopped.

I quote from some of these documents—the full text I place in the RECORD. On January 9, 1919, Mr. Hoover addressed President Wilson in Paris as to cancellation of American food orders and as to obligations to the American farmer, after pointing out that the Allies were a part of the undertaking of these obligations, he stated (Exhibit D):

> The allied food necessities have been outlined from time to time in a series of programs. The latest of these programs which they furnished called for our January surplus. Our manufacturers have provided the particular types of manufacture required by those governments and have enormous stocks of these materials on hand ready for delivery in accordance with their indicated programs. While we can protect the assurances given our producers in some commodities, the most acute situation is in pork products, which are perishable and must be exported. The British position is that they have sufficient to last for weeks, and they wish to reduce their stocks. If we shall find no remedy to this situation we shall have a debacle in the American markets with an advance of several hundred million dollars now outstanding from the banks to the industry. We shall not only precipitate a financial crisis but we shall betray the American farmer. * * * The surplus is so large there can be no absorption of it in the United States. * * * We have endeavored for the last six weeks to arrive at some cooperative action with the British agencies to forefend this situation. The final result has been a refusal on their part to cooperate. * * * I wish to assure you again that we are maintaining prices at the very minimum on which our American farmers can come out whole for the effort they have made in the allied cause.

On January 15 he addressed the British Ministry of Food direct, stating (Exhibit D):

> The time has urgently arrived when the British Food Ministry in justice to the American farmer, who has, at so great an effort and out of patriotic desire to comply with the urgent request from the United Kingdom for the provision of adequate supply of fats, produced these fats far beyond any commercial justification of his normal market, should now have a definite position of one of two alternatives. The first of these alternatives is that the British Ministry should accept financial responsibility for the moral obligation which has been acknowledged by them and make purchases according to agreement at such prices as would protect the American farmer. On the other hand, the whole market of Europe should be opened to the American farmer through the removal of restrictions and blockade. * * *

Again on February 1, 1919, he addressed the President with regard to continued insistence of the Allies as keeping up the blockade in Germany. He said (Exhibit D):

> Our farmers and merchants are in extreme jeopardy from the surplus of food which the British now repudiate as to purchase and in which they obstruct in the wider freedom of market. The French obstruct the notion of neutrals trading with Germany, although that would alleviate both the financial problem and the distress.

On February 4 he again addressed the President, as follows (Exhibit D):

> There is no right in the law of God or man that we should longer continue to starve Europe now that we have a surplus of food * * * by obstruction of every financial measure we can propose to the feeding of Germany. * * * They have already defeated every step so far for getting them food which we have been promising for three months. * * *

He finally won out. If he had failed, hogs would have gone to $5 per hundredweight. Every merchant and every bank in the mid-west would have come down in the crash. Every farmer would have been ruined. In order to indicate the reality of this I ask leave to print at the end of my remarks two documents, being but a selection from the many that passed on these occasions. After he had won the foodstuffs began to move into Germany. Mr. Hoover came under a fire of criticism for feeding the former enemy by many who still felt the wrongs of the war most strongly. It is worth while reading here for constant repetition to our children a public statement made by Mr. Hoover on the 21st of March, 1919, for it shows the inspiration of a great American to our countrymen that they should rise above hate.

WHY WE ARE FEEDING GERMANY

From the point of view of my western upbringing, I would say at once because we do not kick a man in the stomach after we have licked him.

From the point of view of an economist, I would say that it is because there are 70,000,000 of people who must either produce or die, that their production is essential to the world's future, and that they can not produce unless they are fed.

From the point of view of a governor, I would say it is because famine breeds anarchy, anarchy is infectious, the infection of such a cesspool will jeopardize France and Great Britain, which will yet spread to the United States.

From the point of view of a reconstructionist, I would say that unless the German people can have food, can maintain order and stable government, and get back to production, there is no hope of their paying the damage they owe to the world.

From the point of view of a humanitarian, I would say that we have not been fighting with women and children and we are not beginning now.

From the point of view of our Secretary of War, I would say that I wish to return the American soldiers home, and that it is a good bargain to give food for passenger steamers on which our boys may arrive home four months earlier than will otherwise be the case.

From the point of view of the American Treasurer, I would say that this is a good bargain, because it saves the United States enormous expenditures in Europe in the support of idle men and allows these men to return to productivity in the United States.

From the point of view of a negotiation of the armistice, I would say that we are in honor bound to fulfill the implied terms of the armistice that Germany shall have food.

Let us not befog our minds with the idea that we are feeding Germany out of charity. She is paying for her food. All that we have done for Germany is to lift the blockade to a degree that allows her to import food from any markets that she wishes and in the initial state; in order to effect the above we are allowing her to purchase emergency supplies from stocks in Europe at full prices.

Taking it by and large, our face is forward, not backward on history. We and our children must live with these 70,000,000 of Germans. No matter how deeply we may feel at the present moment, our vision must stretch over the next hundred years, and we must write now into history such acts as will stand creditably in the minds of our grandchildren.

MR. PEEK INTERVENES TO REDUCE PRICES TO THE FARMERS

When Mr. Hoover had almost succeeded in securing an outlet for the American farmer in Europe by overcoming opposition to opening the blockade, there arose a new enemy of the American farmer. That was a flank attack from home under the leadership of no less a person than George N. Peek. These incidents of his action are also in the public records, and they amply prove who was the "arch enemy" of the farmer in 1919. It certainly was not Mr. Hoover, as Mr. Peek alleges, for Mr. Hoover was fighting to uphold the prices to the American farmer and Mr. Peek was deliberately trying to bring about a reduction.

On February 3, 1919, a meeting was held at the United States Treasury, at which were present Mr. George Peek, Secretary Redfield, and other officials. It was determined at this meeting to set up a board, the purpose of which was to bring about a reduction in the cost of living by reducing the price of food and therefore of farm products as well as other commodities. Authority was secured from President Wilson to appoint such a board called the Department of Commerce Industrial Board. Mr. George N. Peek was made its chairman.

I call attention to the fact that this was exactly at the time Mr. Hoover was in the midst of his great fight in Europe. He had not yet secured the opening of the blockade. A public statement by the board to which Mr. Peek's name is attached was issued on February 13, stating that it was the avowed policy of the board to reduce prices of food and thus necessarily of agricultural products, as well as steel and other commodities.

The opening of the program of this board as to the farmers is shown in a letter from Secretary Redfield, dated February 17, 1919, addressed to Mr. Hoover's representative in Washington—Exhibit E—in which he called attention to the published plan adopted by Mr. Peek's board, and directly protested the Food Administration holding up prices of agricultural commodities and even went so far as to denounce it as unpatriotic.

Under instruction from Mr. Hoover, his representative on February 21 replied, calling attention to the moral obligations of the Food Administration to the farmers and refused to follow any such line—Exhibit E. Hoover was willing enough to see the cost of living decreased, but not at the expense of the farmer.

Does this action of Mr. Hoover breathe enmity to the American farmer? However, Mr. Peek, representing Secretary Redfield's board, promptly entered into negotiations with representatives of the Food Administration with a view to securing reduction in the price of wheat and flour.

One of the proposals was that the Food Administration should manipulate wheat control so as to reduce the current premium over the congressional minimum, buy the wheat crop at the congresional minimum, and then resell the wheat or flour to the public at a loss, this loss to fall upon the Government. He conceived that not only would this reduce the price of bread, but the influence of the reduced price of flour would bring down other food prices as well. An extract from his published statement as to the policies of the board on the subject is as follows:

Basic commodities such as steel, building materials, textiles, and food will be considered first and brought to a stable basis. The governmental policy, as expressed by the bill to authorize purchase by the Government of wheat at the guaranteed price and resale of it at the world price, is to assist in bringing prices of basic commodities to normality by bringing down the cost of living.

At the very time he was negotiating these projects, No. 1 northern wheat at Chicago was at a strong premium over the minimum and rose steadily to $3.23 a bushel a year later. In other words, for the period that Mr. Peek proposed that the prices should be reduced to the Government guarantee, the Food Administration actually realized for the farmer from 35 cents to $1.15 above that guarantee. Mr. Peek's proposal would have caused a gigantic loss to the United States Treasury. It would have reduced the price of wheat to the American farmer.

At the time of this suggestion by Mr. Peek, Mr. Hoover was protesting vigorously from Paris against interference with his work in marketing American farm products and getting the most he could for the farmer.

Mr. Hoover, in an interview with the Associated Press, appearing in the New York Times of March 9, 1919, gave reasons why he opposed the plans for reducing prices and subsidizing bread, and stated:

The needs of Europe are larger than our previous estimates—for wheat. In the balance of supply and demand from our present wheat it now looks as though we might see wheat at $3.50 a bushel.

In this interview he went on to state that the resale of wheat by the Government at a loss of even 50 per cent could not possibly affect the price of bread more than 1 or 2 cents, because the larger part of the cost of bread during the war was due to high wages and cost of other supplies.

Mr. Peek disagreed with Mr. Hoover, and attempted to explain away this statement in the press. I quote from his statement in the New York Times of March 24, 1919:

WASHINGTON, March 24, 1919.—Cheaper food in the near future was predicted to-day by Chairman Peek, of the Department of Commerce Industrial Board, as a result of a conference with Food Administration officials in New York. Mr. Peek said there had been a general misunderstanding of a recent statement by Mr. Hoover that wheat might go to $3.50 a bushel, and added that the billion-dollar grain appropriation made by Congress would enable the public to get wheat products at reasonable prices, as well as to make good the guaranty to the producer. With wheat prices reasonable, Mr. Peek said, reasonable prices of other products could be expected because wheat was the barometer of the food trade.

Mr. Peek made no progress with his negotiations, so after unavailing meetings with Food Administration officials he appealed over their heads to the President, and Secretary Redfield, on behalf of the board drafted the following cable, dated March 25, to be dispatched to President Wilson in Paris. This telegram submitted to Secretary Houston did not meet his approval. Whether it was sent or not I do not know; in any event it shows the spirit of Mr. Peek.

Subject: Administration of wheat bill.

Julius Barnes's policy, as indicated in his statement to the congressional House committee for handling the 1919 wheat crop will be directly opposed to the policy and purposes of my industrial board—the ultimate success of which is dependent on bringing down the cost of living but not the standard of living. His position is, if possible, to liquidate the 1919 wheat crop without using any part of the billion-dollar appropriation, assuming wheat should be sold at home at no higher than world prices, but admits that under conditions likely to prevail world prices will be very difficult to determine. My opinion, shared by the industrial board, is that considering the world situation, if necessary to use part or even all of the appropriation to insure reasonable food prices at home we should do so. The bill provides that the appropriation is made to fulfill guaranty to farmers and assure reasonable living costs. May I suggest that no one man should be permitted to define the policies, but that you should place the administration of the matter in the hands of a small nonpolitical commission which would select a general manager from its number, but policies to be determined by the commission. Barnes said he does not believe in subsidizing the American table. My contention is that this is preferable to general unrest or worse resulting from excessive living costs and any considerable unemployment. This message is sent after Messrs. Peek and Ritter have had full discussion of the subject with Barnes. I regard the whole subject of vital importance. Within last two weeks grain corporation have sold 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to millers at approximately $2.40.

REDFIELD.

You will note the implied protest of Mr. Peek, the friend of the farmer, at holding the price of wheat up to $2.40, the market price of the day.

Mr. Peek went further; he proposed directly that the price of hogs should be reduced. I read here a report written at that time by Edgar Rickard, representing the Food Administration, of a conference on April 15 with the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston:

Secretary Houston is convinced that the activities of the Industrial Board of the Department of Commerce are serving to destroy rather than pacify the general trade conditions in the United States. Messrs. Peek and Ritter have personally requested him to call a meeting of the packers and insist upon their establishing lower prices for meat and meat products, irrespective of the effect upon the producers. This Secretary Houston has refused to do.

He was asked by Secretary Redfield to join him in a letter to the President requesting that the Grain Corporation be instructed to subsidize wheat prices. Secretary Houston refused to join in any such letter and prevailed upon the Secretary of Commerce to write a letter under his own name if he had to write it at all, reciting the exact status of affairs. This letter was read to me in confidence, and in its final form would carry very little weight as it simply recited three conditions to be considered; the first, whether it is a good policy to artificially maintain the subsidized price for wheat in order to save the Treasury from loss; second, whether the Government pay the difference, irrespective of the so-called "world price"; third, whether it should be left to the future results of supply and demand to determine the entire policy of the handling of the grain crop in 1919. In this letter Secretary Redfield apparently desires to impress the President with his own ideas with regard to subsidizing.

You will note from the above Mr. Peek's friendship to the farmer. Not only did Food Administration officials protest but farmer representatives in the United States protested at the character of Peek's public statements and his proposals.

Among those who protested was Milo D. Campbell, who then headed the National Milk Producers Association. Finally some sort of conference was called at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury in May, 1919, to consider Mr. Peek's work chiefly with regard to steel, after which Mr. Peek stated his views generally, which brought a reply from Mr. CARTER GLASS, then Secretary of the Treasury, which I have quoted.

After the scathing denunciation of the Secretary of the Treasury, the efforts of the Industrial Board of the Department of Commerce, under Mr. Peek's chairmanship came to an inglorious end. It had been thwarted in its effort to depress American farm prices by the successful termination of Mr. Hoover's struggle to open the markets of western Europe to the accumulated American surplus. It was this after-the-armistice struggle wherein Mr. Hoover through his strong opposition had defeated Mr. Peek's attempts to reduce the farmer's prices that won the enmity of the latter and lays the foundation for the campaign of criticism, misrepresentation, and perversion of facts which find their last exposition in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

MAINTAINING THE PRICE OF HOGS

Examine that record and you will find that one of the lines of Mr. Peek's representation of Mr. Hoover's activities during the war period is in relation to livestock. Mr. Peek bases his statements on wild assertions of a Mr. Hirth, a Democrat from Missouri, together with so well known a livestock authority as Gifford Pinchot. The Food Administration under Mr. Hoover dealt mainly with the problem of hogs; that was the only class of animals where stimulation was given by assurance of prices. The supplies of fats in the world had to be rapidly increased if the Allies and our Army were to be supported. The American hog was the only direction through which it could be quickly accomplished.

In order to deal with the problem justly to the farmer, Mr. Hoover insisted that the Secretary of Agriculture should appoint an advisory board of 32 representative farmers, who in turn appointed a livestock subcommittee who sat constantly at Mr. Hoover's side throughout the war, and no policy of the Food Administration was undertaken without their cooperation. Thus the farmer was given a voice in the determination of his own interest. I place in the RECORD as Appendix A the names of this board, many of whom to-day are the most important agricultural leaders.

The success of this effort to stimulate fat production with its enormous difficulties is one of the greatest services ever performed for the American farmer, and no real friend of the farmer ever served him better. Early in 1918 the advisory board recommended that a minimum of $15.50 should be set as the price of hogs in Chicago in order to stimulate production and protect the farmer. The average pre-war price was $7.50. This was an increase of 112 per cent against a general price level increase at that time of only 88 per cent. This price was negotiated by Mr. Hoover on behalf of the farmers with the Allied Buying Commission on the one side and the Chicago packers on the other, the packers' price being limited to 2½ per cent on sales. This price was maintained over the winter of 1918. In order to further stimulate production and the breeding of hogs in the spring of 1918, an assurance was given that the price of hogs should be made as nearly as could be thirteen times the price of corn. In any event, it would be a minimum of $16 for all the hogs sent to market that were born in the spring of 1918. These hogs began to come to market in October, 1918. The price was above $16 and in October it became evident that the war was about to collapse and vast quantities of corn which had been dammed back in the Argentine threatened the market. The price of American corn began to fall rapidly. It fell 30 to 40 cents a bushel. The farmers, realizing that this would mean a fall in the price of hogs, flooded the market with hogs, and a complete breakdown in all price arrangements was threatened. On October 24 Mr. Hoover addressed a letter to the Farmers' Advisory Board subcommittee which I placed here in the RECORD as Exhibit B. In this letter Mr. Hoover asked for an immediate meeting of the advisory board to consider the situation. He pointed out the precipitate fall in the price of corn, the rush of hogs to market, panic in prices then and pending. In this letter he said:

I am extremely troubled at the situation, for, as the board is well aware, the one desire of the Food Administration is to do justice to the producer in the United States and to secure him a proper return for his large exertions in providing the world with larger food supplies. The whole plan put into action a month ago with the approval of this board was designed purely for this purpose. There can be no doubt that from the overmarketing the plan may become at any moment unmanageable.

The board of farm representatives made a recommendation that the Food Administration adopt a minimum price of $17.50 per hundred pounds for hogs instead of the variable arrangement previously adopted with its minimum of $16. This gave an increase to almost 150 per cent over pre-war. Mr. Hoover negotiated this on behalf of the farmers with the allied buyer on one side and the packers on the other, and thus he overcame the threatened loss due to the fall in corn price and the impending debacle was prevented.

A statement was issued to the press on October 25 setting out in detail the conclusions of this agricultural advisory board and the arrangements which had been entered into. That statement is so enlightening that I have reproduced it here as Exhibit C. There is no man who will read these documents who will not see that their foundation lay in a solicitude for the welfare of the American farmer. They are not the statements of his enemy but the statements of his friend.

WHAT THE FARMERS THOUGHT OF MR. HOOVER'S SERVICES ON THEIR BEHALF DURING THE WAR

As a tribute to this work of Mr. Hoover, the advisory board livestock subcommittee passed the following resolution:

JANUARY 28, 1919.

Whereas there has come to the attention of the livestock committee of the National Agricultural Advisory Committee, through press reports and certain public statements, certain criticisms of the United States Food Administration; and

Whereas these outgivings have made it clear that there is, in some quarters, a lamentable lack of knowledge respecting basic facts connected with the stimulation of production, increase of conservation, and control of distribution of foods; * * *

Whereas the space limitations of these resolutions give no adequate opportunity to direct attention to the broad foundation laid by Mr. Herbert Hoover, the United States food administrator, for the purpose of insuring essential food supplies for war needs, but we feel that we can not do otherwise than record our judgment of the purpose, the spirit, and the accomplishments of his administration: Therefore be it

Resolved by the livestock committee of the National Agricultural Advisory Committee, now in session in Washington, That we here record our high sense of appreciation of the extraordinary ability and uniform fairness with which Herbert Hoover has met and discharged the weighty responsibilities which have devolved upon him in stimulating home production without which we would now be facing a world shortage of food and consequent higher cost of living, in eliminating speculative control of wheat and other essential products, which has ever been harmful alike to producer and consumer, in conserving food and foodstuffs, and in supplying the wants of millions who were and still are dependent upon American resources for the necessaries of life. * * *

We are of opinion that no agency or department of the Government has done a greater work, and that no man of the many chosen for important national and international service has earned a higher place in public esteem and admiration than has the man who played so notable part in guiding and bringing together the producers and consumers of the country, and who, by his rightful possession of the confidence of all classes at home and abroad, has brought a united citizenship into voluntary contributions of service and sacrifice.

I read you a letter sent to the press by a leading farmer of Missouri who sat as a member of this board, under date of February 28, 1928:

I have been a farmer in Saline County, Mo., all my life. During the war I went to Washington as representative of agriculture to confer with the Food Administration with regard to prices of farm products and especially meat prices. I have seen the agricultural price fixing charges which have been made against Secretary Hoover. I believe in a square deal, and having served as an agricultural representative upon the Advisory Committee in the Food Administration, and having had constant opportunity for observation of the attitude of Mr. Hoover for a period of over six months, I feel that it is only fair to say that I have never encountered a man who was more sympathetic and just with agriculture than Mr. Hoover. From the opportunity I had to personally observe his conduct and attitude I don't believe that the farmer has a better friend in America to-day than Mr. Hoover.

S. P. HOUSTON.

I shall also add to my remarks statements issued by two former national presidents of the Farm Bureau Federation as Exhibit H.

Contrast these acts and the results obtained from them with the statement which Mr. Peek puts into his article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where he says:

Yet his [Mr. Hoover's] attitude for seven years may be summed up as this—

"That if the farmers were fools enough to believe what he told them in war times, so that their total production can be sold only at ruinous prices, let them take the consequences. The only remedy is to let prices get so low that part of the farmers will be starved out in sufficient number to let the rest of them produce at a living wage."

This epitomizes the Hoover viewpoint as Food Administrator, and since, and the farmers know it.

Documents, Mr. Peek, speak louder than words, and the results that flowed from the Hoover policies here presented destroy the venom of this dishonest conclusion.

DETERMINING THE WAR PRICE OF WHEAT

The review of the wheat stabilization contained in Mr. Peek's article varies the usual story which has been circulated by interested critics even when it was known to be without the slightest foundation. But in Mr. Peek's article appears the insinuation that Hoover and Hoover alone fixed a maximum price above which wheat was not allowed to be sold. He varies the oft-repeated story by saying that the farmers do not so much protest against the minimum price as against the fact that under Mr. Hoover's manipulations this guaranteed minimum price was made in effect a fixed maximum price. That statement is as contrary to the truth as was its predecessor that Mr. Hoover controlled the price of wheat against the farmer. The bare lie that has been told that Mr. Hoover controlled the price of wheat has been nailed repeatedly but I will nail it once again. There is nothing like a public record made at the time when all these problems were before the country to demonstrate the truth or falsity of such statements. I therefore append to my remarks as Exhibit F a full statement made to the President of the United States by Mr. Hoover under date of July 10, 1917. It sets out the reasons for the necessity of giving protection to the American farmer in the price of wheat against the $1.50 wheat then prevailing. No enemy of the American farmer could have written this letter. He said:

The experience this year in the rampant speculation, extortionate profits and the prospect of even narrower supplies than 1916 harvest and carry-over, must cause the deepest anxiety. No better proof of the hardship worked upon our people during the past year needs be deduced than the recitation of the fact that the producer received an average of $1.51 per bushel for the 1916 wheat harvest, yet wheat has been as high as $3.25 at Chicago and the price of flour has been from time to time based upon this speculative price of wheat, so that through one evil cause or another, the consumer has suffered from 50 to 100 per cent, and the producer gained nothing. * * *

During recent months the allied governments have consolidated their buying into one hand in order that they might relieve the burden of speculation from their own consumers and the export price, if not controlled, is subject to the will of the allied buyer and in great measure the American producer is left to his judgment and without voice. * * *

In order to do justice to the producers who have shown great patriotism in a special effort to increase production in 1927 and to further stimulate the efforts of 1918, it is absolutely vital that we shall protect the farmer from slump in price this year due to glut as above or from the uncontrolled decisions of any one buyer. I am informed that most of the allied countries have fixed the price of wheat to the farmer at $1.80 per bushel, and many of them believe that as Allies it is our duty to furnish wheat at a price which delivered to them will not exceed their domestic price—in other words, about $1.50 per bushel Chicago. Neither the responsible officials nor I hold this view, because I consider the stimulation to production, if no other reason, is in the long run in the interest of the Allies.

In consequence of this presentation Mr. Hoover recommended that the President appoint a commission on which farmers should be fully represented to determine what would be a fair price for the Allies to pay for wheat. Mr. Hoover took no part in its determination. The constant repetition of the falsehood that Mr. Hoover fixed the price of wheat resulted recently in a prominent western newspaper making inquiry of this commission as to exactly what did happen. That newspaper published its findings in a pamphlet, and I append hereto in this record the statement of the Kansas City Star of October 28, 1927, as Exhibit G.

The four surviving farmers on this board joined in a denunciation of this lie. They are men who lead in farm organizations to-day and are Mr. Hoover's friends.

While that lie is dead, the position has shifted slightly to this new invention which appeared in Mr. Peek's article in the RECORD.

The truth is that after Congress had passed legislation in 1917 guaranteeing the farmers a minimum price of wheat to stimulate production, Mr. Hoover, as Food Administrator, without a shadow of authority from Congress, so manipulated the wheat market that he held down the price of wheat at all times to the minimum figure fixed by the President's proclamation.

A law had been passed by Congress guaranteeing $2 a bushel for wheat for the 1918 crop, but the congressional guaranty did not extend to the 1917 crop. The farmer was protected from $1.50 wheat for the 1917 crop solely by Mr. Hoover's origination of the fair-price commission. This commission stated that the fair price should be $2.20, or 20 cents above the congressional guaranty. The allied buying commission, being the sole buyer of the export surplus, was able at all times to make the price. The fair price determined by the commission in which the farmers participated was the price which the Allies were to pay. No question of minimum price entered into the problem. The charge that Mr. Hoover restrained the price of wheat to the congressional minimum is at once disproved by the fact that this fair-price commission recommended 20 cents above the minimum, which was subsequently raised to 26 cents, and that was practically the price until the armistice, because the sole buyer of the allied buying commission made the price.

When the armistice occurred the world began to realize that the German blockade would be raised, and they brought in their competitive buyers for the surplus and the price rose steadily for a year until it reached $3.25 a bushel.

Within the past 10 days, in protest against the repeated new form of misrepresentation, Mr. E. M. Flesh, president of the United States Grain Corporation, made the following statement, copied in the press, which discloses that the average price received by the farmer over the whole period of Government intervention was not $2, the congressional minimum, not limited to $2.20, the fair price determined upon, but actually was $2.45 a bushel.

Mr. Flesh, in his telegram to Senator REED, said:

As vice president or president of the United States Grain Corporation during its entire existence, I have naturally regretted your Milwaukee attack on Mr. Hoover, where you were misled into stating that he held down the price of wheat during the war. This is not true.

You were originally misled into stating that he fixed the price of wheat. You have rightly abandoned this misrepresentation, as it has been abundantly disproved by the joint statement of the farmer representatives on President Wilson's commission, which was appointed at Mr. Hoover's request, to protect the farmers' interest.

You have, however, again been misled into distortion of a few months' temporary action in a crisis of exhausted supplies, which action prevented profiteering in flour and feed against both farmers as well as other consumers.

The proof that you are misinformed is easily shown by the fact that the price of wheat averaged $2.45 during the whole period of Grain Corporation operations compared with the $2 minimum fixed by Congress, and would have been much lower except for these operations. It may also be noted that this average price was 170 per cent above pre-war, while for the same period all other commodities averaged 115 per cent over pre-war.

It is perhaps unnecessary to protest at these misrepresentations in view of the fact that they have gone on for 10 years, and Mr. Hoover has gained steadily in the affection of the American people during that time.

E. M. FLESH.

A statement recently issued by Professor Warren, of Cornell, shows that the price of wheat was relatively higher than the average of all commodities during the war. I defy any fair-minded farmer in the United States to read and study these evidences and many others and not conclude that Mr. Hoover was actuated by a desire to do justice by the American farmer.

I may call attention to the fact that this was the first time that the American farmer had a full voice in the determination of the price at which he could dispose of his product, and without these stimulations by Mr. Hoover he would have received a far lower price for his crop.

PRICE OF WHEAT IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES DURING THE WAR

Still another misrepresentation of Mr. Peek is shown on page 5927 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where he says, "the truth is the foreign governments paid more than $2.20 to their own producers." He states France paid $3.94, Italy $4.33, United Kingdom $2.28. I do not know where Mr. Peek gets those figures nor to what period they refer, but if to the period during which we were in the war—1917 and 1918—they are absolutely wrong. The price he quotes for the United Kingdom of $2.28 per bushel is the correct average price for imported wheat in the Liverpool market for the year 1917. It was not the price which the British paid for home-grown wheat, which was not far from $1.80 per bushel. For prices in other countries we may refer to figures quoted by the International Institute of Agriculture, which may be accepted as unbiased.

This authority shows that for the year 1917 the average price of wheat in France was 37.9 francs per 100 kilos. One hundred kilos is equivalent to 220 pounds, and our bushel of wheat weighs 60 pounds. The average exchange rate of francs in 1917 was 17.5 per cent per franc. Making the conversion, the average French price of wheat in 1917 was equivalent to $1.81 per bushel, or quite different from $3.95 quoted by Mr. Peek. From the same source and by the same method it is found that the Italian price in 1917 was equivalent to $1.60 instead of Mr. Peek's $4.33. It is unnecessary to go further, but the other figures show similar discrepancies. It might be added that the price of Argentine and Australian wheat was $1.50, but was inaccessible to the Allies only because we needed all the ships available to carry our troops and supplies to France.

Still another example of Mr. Peek's misrepresentation is when he says that the Grain Corporation negotiated the purchase of 4,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat for American mills, and that the aim and effect was to hold American wheat prices down, and it worked. If Mr. Peek knew his figures better he might have said that the Grain Corporation in 1917 and 1918 purchased 17,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat to be ground in American mills. If he knew that he would also know that the purpose was not to hold American wheat prices down. The sole purpose was to secure and employ American flour mills and give the much-needed mill feeds for animals to American dairies and all the resulting flour was shipped to the Allies. Had this wheat not gone through American mills it would have gone direct to the Allies. The wheat was brought here to benefit American farmers with mill feed, to give employment to American labor, and to save shipping space by shipping flour instead of the bulkier wheat.

THE HIGH PRICES OF WHEAT

It has been repeatedly shown by authoritative charts that the price of wheat was relatively higher than that of any agricultural commodity in which there was a free market during the period of control. Mr. Peek seeks to discredit that achievement of the Food Administration operating under Mr. Hoover's direction and tells a half truth only when he calls attention to the fact that the price of rye, which was uncontrolled, rose in Chicago in March, 1918, to $2.84, while No. 2 winter red wheat was selling at $2.17 a bushel. This fact, he concludes, disproves the assertion of the relative higher price for wheat. I charge that a half truth is here stated. There were two or three months in the 1917 and 1918 crop years when rye sold at this higher price than wheat, but, as is well known, it was due to certain neutral Governments who entered the market and bid up the price of rye, hoping to be able to divert their purchases from the war zone and thus get hold of some of the foodstuffs that were being prepared for use either by the Allies or in this country. They were caught up with and were prevented by the War Trade Board from exporting their purchases except as it might go definitely to the Allies. Defeated in their attempt of seeking their own advantage or in the purpose of ultimately delivering their product behind the western front, their speculation went for naught and they resold the rye they purchased at a loss. This very obvious speculation can not in anywise deny the statement honestly made of the relatively higher price that ruled for wheat over that of any agricultural commodity in which there was a free market.

THE CONDITION OF THE FARMER AT THE END OF MR. HOOVER'S DIRECTION OF THE FOOD ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Peek charges in effect that Mr. Hoover brought about the fall of agricultural prices after the war; that it was he who deflated the farmer. It needs but an examination of the actual record to see how far this charge is from the truth. The Food Administration came to an end on the 30th of June, 1919. Mr. Hoover retired from public service at that time. The Government guaranty on wheat was carried on by other persons for another year, but the test of what happened after the war is an examination of prices of farm products themselves, using not only the date of Mr. Hoover's retirement but the prices six months later and prices a year later than that date.

Corn, Chicago, June, 1919	bushel	$1.75
6 months later	do	1.45
1 year later	do	1.84
Oats, June, 1919	do	.69
6 months later	do	.81
1 year later	do	1.11
No. 1 northern wheat, Chicago, June, 1919	do	2.43
6 months later	do	3.18
1 year later	do	3.01
Price of choice steers in Chicago, June, 1919	hundredweight	20.66
6 months later	do	13.70
1 year later	do	14.72
Price of hogs in June, 1919	do	20.00
In December, 1919	do	15.00
In June, 1920	do	16.00

A glance at these prices will convince any skeptic that the great debacle in farm prices did not arrive for a year after Mr. Hoover had retired to private life. As a private citizen he could not have produced the general slump which followed the war. Prices which he was instrumental in securing for the farmer during the whole period of his occupancy of his office gave to the farm the greatest period of prosperity America has ever seen and a period replete with rising values in land. Mr. Hoover came back into public life as a member of the Cabinet in March, 1921, and at that date the prices of these same commodities had fallen to the bottom. From that day to this he has given unceasing support to every legitimate proposal for restoration of farm prosperity.

Again, I am not alone in calling attention to the falsity of the conclusions drawn in the article that Mr. Peek prepared printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. On April 10, a few days ago, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] called attention in a speech in this body to the prices at which Mr. Hoover turned over agricultural products when he quit managing prices in the United States, and took issue with the very article of which I am now speaking.

THE PRESIDENT'S AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE OF 1924

One particular statement made by Mr. Peek interested me to the extent of making further inquiry. He asserts that four years ago, when the President appointed an agricultural commission to inquire into the best method of agricultural relief the membership was announced immediately after election by the President, Mr. Coolidge, and the personnel of the conference were all of the Hoover persuasion. The inference is that this board was dominated by Mr. Hoover; that its conclusions being in opposition to the views of Mr. Peek, were not the conclusions of agriculture but the conclusions of Mr. Hoover. I have inquired into the personnel of this commission and find it was composed of the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the president of the Farmers Union, the master of the National Grange, the president of the American National Livestock Association, the Secretary of Agriculture, a former Governor of Wyoming who had been president of the National Livestock Association, and two presidents of agricultural colleges, and one important farmers' cooperative.

It is obvious from that list that President Coolidge called into consultation men who had been selected by farmers themselves to head their great organizations. He included all of the greatest of these organizations. Mr. Peek's lack of accuracy would seem to suggest that Mr. Hoover had designated to the hundreds of thousands of farmers in the United States that they should choose Mr. Taber to be master of the National Grange, Mr. Bradfute to be president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Mr. Barrett as president of the Farmers Union, Mr. Bixby as president of the Livestock Growers' Association, and Mr. Merritt to represent the cooperative associations of the West in order that he might subsequently direct them to make a report which is a clear refutation of the proposals of Mr. Peek. These gentlemen did not support those proposals which gives an insight into the animus which pervades the article that I have been discussing.

I have thus detailed Mr. Hoover's great services to his country and to the agricultural interests whose welfare he felt so important to the winning of the war which Mr. Peek so sincerely deprecates. I have given you an insight into the contest which was waged against Mr. Hoover behind his own lines. I have pointed out the misrepresentation and falsity of the charges which that animus has spread upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have disclosed without fear or favor the public documents of the time which make the record complete, and there is but one word more that I wish to say. Mr. Hoover undertook our Food Administration at the specific request of our Council of National Defense because he alone of all Americans had an experience in the problem of food administration. He had fed 10,000,000 Belgians and French over a period of three years, in which work all problems of production upon the farm and distribution through the market had to be undertaken, and solved them in advance of similar activities in any other of the war countries. The Belgian Relief Commission was the food administration of Belgium, and as such became the progenitor of every other food administration which the war imposed upon the world. As other nations adopted the plan, Mr. Hoover advised them of the experiences that had been acquired in Belgium. The Food Administration under his leadership was one of the great contributing factors in the winning of the war. From an annual export of 6½ million tons of food before the war, that export rate was raised to 20,000,000 tons during the war. In so doing the margin of food supply was provided, which was necessary to enable our own soldiers and those of our Allies to win the war that we had to win. It meant a sacrifice to every one—the farmers, the workers, and above all, the lives of the soldiers of this Republic.

Would Mr. Peek seek to claim that our farmers wanted $5 to $10 a bushel on wheat at 500 to 1000 per cent increase, as the price of their support in the great national effort? If that had happened, the war would have ended right there. If such prices had prevailed, the war would have been lost. No patriotic farmer in the United States ever wanted such a price as the measure of his loyal service.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the end of my remarks the various exhibits to which I have referred.

EXHIBIT B

OCTOBER 24, 1918.

DEAR GOVERNOR STUART: I have asked that we should have a meeting to consider the present situation in the hog market, and for the board to join in the negotiations for placing the controlled orders for export pork products for the month of November.

You will recollect that at our meeting a month ago methods were outlined by your board that were then felt would apply in a practical way the formula for a price of 100-pound hogs, based on the average farm value of 13 bushels of corn, and that by the application of this arrangement from month to month stability and assurance could be given to the market and a stimulative return could be given to the swine growers of the country during the heavy marketing season. The October contracts for export shipments were let to the 50 different participating packing firms by the Food Administration for 130,000,000 pounds of pork products on a basis reflecting the recommendation of the board, and these packers undertook in writing to support the price of hogs on this general basis during the month of October.

We all believed that these arrangements would work out to stabilize the price up to a fair level to give a just return to the farmer, and would give effect to the announced policies of the Food Administration in his protection.

Since our meeting very serious difficulties have arisen from causes that could not be foreseen, and these difficulties give me the most extreme anxiety. They arise from the following causes:

The current peace negotiations have alarmed the holders of corn and there has been a fall of from 30 cents to 40 cents per bushel in the price. The large accumulations of very low-priced corn in the Argentine and South Africa would upon peace and liberated shipping become available to the European and even the American market, and in consequence there has been a good deal of natural alarm. This fall in corn has created the fear with many hog growers that a similar fall was impending in hogs as well as corn, with the advent of peace. Moreover, this lower range of corn prices, when incorporated in an average of the previous five months settled upon as a basis for calculating hogs, prophesies a continuously falling price of hogs. As a result producers are apparently in a panic at this possible indication of lower ranges and have been overshipping to the market. The receipts of hogs is running apparently somewhere near 30 per cent more than the receipts last year, while the increased production in the country appears to average but about 15 per cent. In addition there has been an undue marketing of heavy sows, which are not adapted for export. The result has been a great embarrassment to the packing houses to take care of the receipts. Many of the packers have actually paid over the price at which hogs were offered in an endeavor to maintain their obligations. The action taken by the board and the Food Administration at the last meeting has fortunately prevented a slump in hogs comparable to corn.

While I do not advance the notion that we may have immediate peace, my own view of its effect if it should be realized is that no matter what the result might be in corn there will be an even larger demand for pork products with peace than during the war, because of the enormous fat shortage in the Central Empires, which would be an additional demand upon the top of the present heavy demands for the Allies. So far as is humanly possible to interpret these facts, I believe we should have an even stronger demand for pork products after peace than before, and that therefore the alarm of hog producers is unwarranted.

I am extremely troubled at the situation, for, as the board is well aware, the one desire of the Food Administration is to do justice to the producer in the United States and to secure him a proper return for his large exertions in providing the world with larger food supplies. The whole plan as put into action a month ago was designed purely for this purpose. There can be no doubt that from overmarketing the plan may become any moment unmanageable. I am therefore anxious that you should consider the problem anew and all its aspects.

To indicate our intention to proceed in this matter in absolute good faith, I may say that we have in hand orders for 170,000,000 pounds of pork products for the month of November, which may be slightly increased during the month. The Food Administration is prepared to place these orders on the basis of the 13-to-1 ratio applied to the month of November. I do not, however, feel that if the producers continue to flood the market this will assure any stability to price. This undertaking on our part should indicate our desire to carry out the plan absolutely as laid down.

As stated above, the hogs in the country indicate a 15 per cent increase and the increased export orders for the last five months of this year compared with last year as follows:

	1917	1918
July	43,400,000	268,600,000
August	67,800,000	178,900,000
September	77,600,000	114,900,000
October	52,200,000	130,000,000
November	98,100,000	170,000,000
December	90,000,000	[1] 200,000,000
Total	429,100,000	1,062,400,000

[1] Estimated.

It will be seen by the above that the demand has greatly increased and I believe we could handle the situation were it not for the panic among producers, and if the hogs were being shipped normally to the market in proportion to their natural increase over last year.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

EXHIBIT C

OCTOBER 25, 1918.

The conference between the livestock subcommittee of the Agricultural Advisory Board, including special members representing the swine industry and of the Food Administration, held on October 23 to 25, has, after consideration of the present situation of the pork and hog market, reached the following conclusions:

The entire marketing situation has so changed since the September joint conference as to necessitate an alteration in the plans of price stabilization. The current peace talk has alarmed the holders of corn, and there has been a price decline of from 25 cents to 40 cents per bushel. The fact that the accumulation of low-priced corn in the Argentine and South Africa would, upon the advent of peace and liberated shipping, become available to the European market, has created a great deal of apprehension on the part of corn holders. This decline has spread far among swine growers that a similar reduction in the prices of hogs would naturally follow. Moreover, the lower range of corn prices would, if incorporated in a 13 to 1 ratio, obviously result in a continuously falling price for live hogs. In view of these changed conditions many swine producers anticipated lower prices, and as a result rushed their hogs to market in large numbers, and this overshipment has added to and aggravated the decline.

The information of the Department of Agriculture indicates that the supply of hogs has increased about 8 per cent, while the highest unofficial estimate does not exceed 15 per cent increased production over last year. On the other hand, the arrival of hogs during the last three weeks in the seven great markets has been 27 per cent more than last year during the corresponding period, demonstrating the unusually heavy marketing of the available supply. In the face of the excessive receipts some packers have not maintained the price agreed last month. On the other hand, many of the packers have paid over the price offered to them in an endeavor to maintain the agreed price. The result in any event has been a failure to maintain the October price basis determined upon the September conference and undertaken by the packers. Another factor contributing to the break in prices during the month has been the influenza epidemic; it has sharply curtailed consumption of pork products and temporarily decreased the labor staff of the packers about 25 per cent.

On the other hand, the exports of 150,000,000 pounds of pork products for October compared with about 52,000,000 pounds in October a year ago, and the export orders placeable by the Food Administration for November amount to 170,000,000 contrasted with the lesser exports of 98,000,000 for November, 1917. The increased demands of the Allies are continuing and are in themselves proof of the necessity for the large production for which the Food Administration asked. The increase in export demands appears to be amply sufficient to take up the increase in hog production, but unfavorable market conditions existing in October afford no fair index of the aggregate supply and demand.

It must be evident that the enormous shortage in fats in the Central Empires and neutral countries would immediately upon peace result in additional demands for pork products which, on top of the heavy shipments to the Allies, would tend materially to increase the American exports, inasmuch as no considerable reservoir of supplies exists outside of the United States. It seems probable that the present prospective supplies would be inadequate to meet this world demand with the return to peace. So far as it is possible to interpret this fact, it appears that there should be even a stronger demand for pork products after the war, and therefore any alarm of hog producers as to the effect is unwarranted by the outlook.

In the light of these circumstances, it is the conclusion of the conference that attempts to hold the price of hogs to the price of corn may work out to the disadvantage of pork producers. It is the conclusion that any interpretation of the formula should be a broad-gauged policy applied over a long period. It is the opinion of the conference that in substitution of the previous plans of stablization, the livestock subcommittee of the Agricultural Advisory Board, together with the specially invited swine representatives, should accept the invitation of the Food Administration to join with the administration and the packers in determining the prices at which controlled export orders are to be placed. This will be regularly done. The influence of these orders will be directed to the maintenance of the common object, namely, the stabilization of the price of live hogs so as to secure as far as it is possible fair returns to the producer and the insurance of an adequate future supply.

These foreign orders are placed upon the basis of cost of hogs to the packers.

As the result of conferences between this body and the packers committee, representing the 45 to 50 packers participating in foreign orders, together with the allied buyers, all under the chairmanship of the Food Administration, the following undertaking has been given the packers:

"In view of the undertakings on the part of the Food Administration with regard to the coordinated purchases of pork products, covered in the attached, it is agreed that the packers participating in these orders will undertake not to purchase hogs for less than the following agreed minimums for the month of November; that is, a daily minimum of $17.50 per hundred pounds on average of packers' droves, excluding throw outs. 'Throw outs' to be defined as pigs under 130 pounds, stags, boars, thin sows, and skips. Further, that no hogs of any kind shall be bought, except throw outs, at less than $16.50 per hundred pounds, the average of packers' droves to be construed as the average of the total sales in the market of all hogs for a given day. All the above to be based on Chicago."

We agree that a committee shall be appointed by the Food Administration to check the daily operations in the various markets with a view to supervision and demonstration of the carrying out of the above.

The ability of the packers to carry out this arrangement will depend on there being a normal marketing of hogs based upon the proportionate increase over the receipts of last year. The increase in production appears to be a maximum of about 15 per cent, and we can handle such an increase.

If the producers of hogs should, as they have in the past few weeks, prematurely market hogs at such increasing numbers over the above it is entirely beyond the ability of the packers to maintain these minimums, and therefore we must have the cooperation of the producer himself to maintain these results. It is a physical impossibility for the capacity of the packing houses to handle a similar overflood of hogs and to find a market for the output. The packers are anxious to cooperate with the producers in maintaining a stabilization of price and to see that producers receive a fair price for their products.

THOS. E. WILSON,
Chairman Packers' Committee.

Mr. Hoover wrote on January 9, 1919, to President Wilson, who was then in Paris at the peace conference, regarding allied cancellations, the blockade, and the extreme jeopardy of the American farmer. He said:

"The allied food necessities have been outlined from time to time by a series of programs made up by the Inter-Allied Food Council; the latest of these programs is as recent as the 15th of December, and calls for our entire January surplus. Our manufacturers have provided the particular types of manufacture required by each of these governments and have enormous stocks of these materials in hand ready for delivery in accordance with the indicated programs above mentioned.

"While we can protect our assurances given producers in many commodities, the most acute situation is in pork products, which are perishable and must be exported. We have in January a surplus of about 400,000,000 pounds; and the French, Italian, and Belgian relief and other customary orders, when restored, will cover 60 per cent of such. The British orders, at the rate indicated in their official programs, would have been 140,000,000 pounds and covered our deficiency plus some help I am giving from the relief. The British position is that they have sufficient supplies to last them for some weeks and that they wish to reduce their stocks.

"If there should be no remedy to this situation, we shall have a debacle in the American markets, and with the advances of several hundred million dollars now outstanding from the banks to the pork-products industry we shall not only be precipitated into a financial crisis but shall betray the American farmer who has engaged himself to these ends. The surplus is so large that there can be no absorption of it in the United States, and it, being a perishable, will go to waste.

"Mr. Davis and I have endeavored for the last six weeks to arrive at some cooperative action with the British agencies to forfend this situation, and, as indicated above, the final result has been the refusal on their part to cooperate. We have suggested that the British Government should join with ourselves in the purchase of the necessary amounts of fats at our assured price to be resold to the liberated and enemy territories in order to prevent the above debacle, and this they have finally refused. I wish to assure you again that the prices we are maintaining are the very minimum on which our American producers can come out whole on the effort they have made in the allied cause, and I can not impress upon you too strongly the reaction that will arise in the United States if this situation falls to the ground."

Mr. Hoover's efforts to open the allied blockade are shown by the following:

PARIS, February 1, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Mr. McCormick will be sending to you the three resolutions which we are most anxious should be gotten through the supreme war council at the meeting on Monday or Tuesday. As you know, I have been advocating these points now for nearly two months, and, from selfish or bureaucratic obstruction, we have as yet no results, and I see no hope of attaining any such results except through strong intervention on your part.

Our farmers and merchants are in extreme jeopardy from their surplus supplies of food, which the British now repudiate as to purchase, but which they obstruct to a wider freedom of market. The French obstruct the notion of neutrals trading with Germany, although it would alleviate both the financial problem and distress. We have no justification in humanity or politics in debarring neutrals from buying all the food they wish for their own consumption, now that we have ample supplies. The blockade on Mediterranean countries has no purpose whatever except to serve detailed selfish interests. All these measures impose a much larger burden on relief than would be necessary if all these people could produce and trade where they may in food.

There is so much obstruction that I despair even getting it past the supreme war council unless some great world opinion is brought to bear, and I would like to have you advise me whether you do not think it is desirable for me to disclose the nature of these resolutions that you will propose to the press at once, and I am sure there will be a reaction from the whole neutral world and a reaction from the United States in your support, and the very nature of this reaction will expedite acceptance of the principles.

Faithfully yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT,
Hotel Murat, Paris.

PARIS, February 4, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: An error in the inclosure sent to you in my letter of yesterday with respect to the relaxation of blockades has, I am sorry to say, confused your mind on the matter. I inclose herewith the resolution drafted by Mr. McCormick and myself, which we are anxious to get through the supreme war council. It has three main purposes:

First. There is no right in the law of God or man that we should longer continue to starve Europe now that we have a surplus of food. That is the object of the first part of the first resolution.

Second. The French, by obstruction of every financial measure that we can propose to the feeding of Germany in the attempt to compel us to loan money to Germany for this purpose, have defeated every step so far for getting them the food which we have been promising for three months. The object of the second part of the first resolution and of the second resolution is to at least find some channel by which the Germans can help themselves by trade with neutrals and South America.

Third. The object of the third resolution is to allow the people bordering on the Mediterranean to get into production and trade with all their might, and by so doing not only revive their commercial life but also to a large degree supply themselves with food and other commodities and thus take a large part of the burden of relief from the back of our governments.

* * * * * * *

I have worked consistently since arriving in Europe on the 25th day of November to secure these objects and I have to confess that, although they have been accepted in principle in first one department and one government after another, they are constantly defeated by one bureaucratic and special self-interest after another of various governments, and I can assure you that the blockade against neutrals and the southwest is being used to-day for purely economic ends, when its sole justification was for the protection and furtherance of military operations, which justification is now gone.

JANUARY 25, 1919.

BRITISH FOOD MINISTRY,
London, England.

DEAR SIRS: In review of the situation in my letters to Mr. Clynes and the British Ministry of Food of January 2, it appears to me that the time has urgently arrived when the British Food Ministry, in justice to the American farmer, who has at so great an effort and out of patriotic desire to comply with the urgent requests of the United Kingdom for the provision of an adequate supply of fats, produced these fats far beyond any commercial justification of his normal market, should now have a definite position of one or two alternatives. First, either the British Food Ministry should accept the financial responsibility for the moral obligation, which has been acknowledged by many of its members, and make such purchases for the month of February as will protect the American farmers' prices under the arrangements by which the American packer is compelled to prepare these products at a profit to himself of not more than one-quarter of a cent a pound; or, on the other hand, that the whole of the market of Europe (except, of course, the enemy other than agreed ration) should be thrown open to him without any restrictions and that the governmental buying agencies in the United States should be immediately withdrawn and the trade allowed to return to its normal basis of supply and demand. The continuation of these agencies, unless they carry out the moral obligations and make their purchases on the basis of a fair return to the farmer, will surely be interpreted as a menace to fair trade.

The American farmer will entirely realize that conditions have no doubt changed with the armistice and will not wish to insist on his product being purchased where it can not be used, but he will rightfully resent it if, as a result of this situation, advantage were taken to make artificial prices against him. I can not imagine any situation that will cause more criticism than for the British Government at a later stage, through consolidated buying agencies like APEC, to enter the American market and acquire large quantities of produce at a depreciated price, this price being the result of maintained artificial commercial conditions.

A periodic conference has been held with the representatives of the American farmer, the representatives of APEC, in which the policies were determined from time to time to the satisfaction of all parties. Such a conference is to be again held on next Tuesday, the 28th instant, to determine the policies to govern the month of February. If the representatives of APEC are not prepared to attend and take such an allotment of products under the condition to be actually agreed there, then this conference must be notified in all justice to British interest and to the American farmer that APEC has entirely withdrawn from the field and that the world markets, including the United Kingdom—but, of course, with enemy restrictions—are coincidentally thrown open to the normal course of trade. The matter is therefore one of urgent care, in which I have but one interest, and that is to see that there is a fair arrangement all around.

Yours truly,

HERBERT HOOVER.

FEBRUARY 17, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. WHITMARSH: I note in Commerce Reports for February 14, page 724, copy herein, that certain suggestions and recommendations therein fully described have been made to the Food Administration, looking to the stabilizing of what are presumably existing or past prices and it appears to be the fact that there was a unanimous agreement with the Food Administration to continue the stabilized prices. I gather from it that the intent is to maintain an existing price. If I am correct in this supposition and if the price thus to be maintained is one that has hitherto prevailed under war conditions, I venture, respectfully, to doubt the wisdom of any effort to maintain it or indeed to maintain any other price now or in the immediate future.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the inclosed statement of an official plan approved by the President and now being undertaken by this department looking toward a general reduction of all commodity prices. This plan having been submitted to many of the industries concerned and discussed by them has been universally approved. It is my judgment that it is not only unpatriotic but dangerous now to attempt to maintain any prices at their former level, and that the Government is in the highest way obligated not only to cease from maintaining them but to see that so far as practicable they are definitely reduced.

There is a specific reason for this viewpoint that I feel you will appreciate. Bolshevism is here not as a theory or as a passing phase but as a serious fact. That which broke out in Seattle and recently showed itself also in Butte, Lawrence, Paterson, and elsewhere was not a mere strike but a definite attempt at a social revolution. The advocates of this revolution do not hesitate so to describe it. They come with official authority from the Russian Bolshevik Government provided with funds and literature. This Bolshevik movement has been applauded in Carnegie Hall in New York within the last three weeks where I was present as a speaker.

This revolutionary movement—for it is no less—has for its background the intense pressure of the cost of living accentuated by the present unemployment and, as our attaché at Petrograd has truly said, Bolshevism is anarchy of mind based upon an empty stomach. Whoever to-day in the presence of our existing growing unemployment attempts to maintain a price on any necessity of life above the lowest figure to which it can be brought by Government aid is playing directly into the hands of a real revolutionary party.

I trust that these suggestions will be taken very seriously, and that nothing will be done looking to maintaining current or past prices or that any action to that effect will be disavowed, if possible.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Mr. T. F. WHITMARSH,
Acting Food Administrator,
United States Food Administration,
Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1919.

Mr. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We are in the position of having certain clearly moral obligations which we have to carry out to producers of food and upon which the production was greatly stimulated and these agreements were made for the purpose of winning the war. The producers have responded in good faith to the program of production which they assumed and the Food Administration can not abandon the moral obligation to which it properly and with due authority committed the Government unless the Government itself by clear and direct Executive order, as assuming the responsibility, requires the Food Administration to withdraw from the regulation and stabilization to which I have referred.

Permit me to say that I do not agree with your suggestion that the effort to maintain the prices as to the commodities above mentioned is either "unpatriotic" or "dangerous" for while we will not undertake any new plan of stabilization of any commodity, we think it would be exceedingly dangerous from the Government's point of view to put itself in the position of not carrying out obligations which it had assumed during the war and for the short period which it may be necessary to continue the same under the agreements.

I inclose you copy of letter I have written Secretary Glass on this subject and am taking the liberty of inclosing him a copy of this letter.

Yours very truly,

T. F. WHITMARSH.

EXHIBIT F

JULY 10, 1917.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In response to your request I send you herewith the following notes compiled by myself and my associates upon the present situation with regard to wheat.

1. The 1917 harvest promises to yield 678,000,000 bushels. The normal internal consumption and seed requirement (assuming a carry-over of same volume in 1918 as in 1917), amounts to about 600,000,000 bushels; thus leaving a theoretical export balance of 78,000,000 bushels. The conservation measures are already having a marked effect and it is not too much to hope that the national saving may be 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels, and therefore the export balance increased to, say 158,000,000 to 180,000,000 bushels.

2. The experience this year in the rampant speculation, extortionate profits, and the prospect of even narrower supplies than 1917 harvest and carry-over, must cause the deepest anxiety. No better proof of the hardship worked upon our people during the past year needs be deduced than the recitation of the fact that the producer received an average of $1.51 per bushel for the 1916 wheat harvest, yet wheat has been as high as $3.25 at Chicago and the price of flour has been from time to time based upon this speculative price of wheat, so that through one evil cause or another, the consumer has suffered from 50 to 100 per cent, and the producer gained nothing. After much study and investigation, it is evident that this unbearable increase in margin between producer and consumer is due not only to rank speculation, but more largely than this to the wide margin of profit naturally demanded by every link in the chain to insure them from the great hazards of trade in the widely fluctuating and dangerous price situation during the year when all normal stabilization has been lost through the interruption of world trade and war. All these factors render it vitally necessary to initiate systematic measures which will absolutely eliminate all possibility of speculation, cure extortionate profits, effect proper distribution and restriction on exports to a point within our own protection. These measures can not be accomplished by punitive prosecution of evil-doers, but only by proper and anticipatory organization and regulation all along the distribution chain.

3. During recent months the allied governments have consolidated their buying into one hand in order that they might relieve the burden of speculation from their own consumers, and the export price, if not controlled, is subject to the will of the allied buyer, and in a great measure the American producer is left to his judgment and without voice. Furthermore, in normal circumstances United States and Canadian wheat is moved to Europe largely in the fall months, such shipments averaging about 40,000,000 bushels per month and relieving a corresponding flow from the farms into the interior terminals. This year, owing to the shortage of shipping, the allied supplies must proceed over a large period of the year and will not during the fall months apparently average over 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 bushels per month. We must, therefore, expect a glut in our interior terminals during a considerable period. The financial resources of the grain trade are probably insufficient to carry this extra load without the help of speculators, and, moreover, the consolidation of practically all foreign buying in the hands of the allied buyer has further tended to diminish the capital resources available by placing a number of firms out of business and limits the financial capital available in export trade. The net result of this situation is that unless some strong and efficient Government action is immediately settled and brought into play the American producer will face a slump in wheat. In any event, the price of export wheat will be dictated by a single agency. The American consumer will be faced with a large part of the essential breadstuff having passed into the hands of speculators, for some one must buy and hold not only the normal flow from the farmer but this probable glut.

4. With great reduction in the consumption of wheat bread now fortunately in progress, the employment of our mills must be greatly diminished, and with the reduction of domestic-flour production and our daily feed from wheat residues will be greatly curtailed. Therefore we must induce foreign buyers to accept flour instead of wheat.

5. In order to do justice to the producers, who have shown great patriotism in a special effort to increase production in 1917 and to further stimulate the efforts of 1918, it is absolutely vital that we shall protect the farmer from slump in price this year due to glut as above or from the uncontrolled decisions of any one buyer. I am informed that most of the allied countries have fixed the price of wheat to the farmer at $1.80 per bushel, and many of them believe that as Allies it is our duty to furnish wheat at a price which delivered to them will not exceed their domestic price—in other word, about $1.50 per bushel Chicago. Neither the responsible officials nor I hold this view, because I consider the stimulation to production, if no other reason, is in the long run in the interest of the Allies. There is, however, a limit to price which so trespasses upon the rights of the consumer as to defeat its own object through strikes, raises in wages, and social disturbances in the country. It is with the view to finding a solution to those problems, filled with the greatest dangers to both our producers and consumers, that legislation has been proposed and pressed for speedy enactment.

6. The proposed Food Administration has conferred with many hundred patriotic men engaged in production and distribution and has investigated the condition of the consumers in many centers as well. Many plans have been tentatively put forward and abandoned and others have been developed, but in any case none has nor can be settled until legislation has been completed. Three facts stand out plainly enough from our investigations: First, that in this situation the farmer will need protection as to the price of wheat; second, that large masses of people in the consuming centers are being actually undernourished to-day due to the exorbitant cost of living, and these conditions, unless some remedy be found, are likely to repeat themselves in even more vicious forms at this time next year; and, third, the speculator, legitimate or vicious, has taken a large part of the money now being paid by the consumer.

7. It seems to be overlooked in some quarters that the marketing of this year's wheat is surrounded with circumstances new to history and that the old distributing safeguards are torn away by isolation from the reciprocal markets abroad and the extinction of a free export market and free export transportation. The harvest has begun to move, and from these very causes the price of wheat has begun to drop, and if the farmer is to sell his wheat, either the speculator must return to the market to buy and carry not only the normal flow from the farmer in excess of domestic and foreign requirements but also the glut due to the restriction upon the outlet to the latter, and he must charge his toll to the producer and the consumer, and this latter upon a more extensive scale than last year, as his risks will be greater and the practical export buyer must fix his own price for export wheat from the sole outlook of his own clients and in execution of his duty he will in all normal circumstance follow the market down by buying only his time-to-time requirements, as he can not be expected to carry the load of our domestic accumulation. Or the governments must buy the surplus wheat at some reasonable minimum price, allowing the normal domestic trade of the country to proceed with proper safeguards against speculation. Nor would the services of the speculator be necessary, for the Government should be able to stabilize the price of wheat without his assistance and can control the price of export wheat.

I remain,

Your obedient servant,

HERBERT HOOVER.

HOOVER NOT PRICE FIXER—A COMMITTEE OF TWELVE MADE WAR WHEAT $2.20—PRESIDENT GARFIELD, CHAIRMAN OF THE FAIR PRICE COMMITTEE, WRITES THE STAR—HOOVER HAD NO PART IN IT

For the first time the full and authoritative facts with respect to fixing the war price of wheat are now revealed.

The basic price of wheat during the war was fixed at $2.20 a bushel by the fair price committee of twelve, appointed by President Wilson. Herbert Hoover had nothing to do with determining the price.

The only reason action was taken at all was to protect the American farmer from $1.80 wheat.

These statements are flatly made by Dr. Harry A. Garfield, president of Williams College and chairman of the fair price committee, in a letter to the Star. They are concurred in by all the surviving farmer members of the committee.

In the discussion of the farm situation since the agitation for the McNary-Haugen bill, there have been many assertions as to the responsibility for the war price of wheat. Some of the farm leaders have said in public addresses that Herbert Hoover, United States food administrator in the war, fixed the price which was carried through the war period.

So many inquiries on the subject came to the Star that it determined to go to headquarters for authoritative information. Accordingly it wrote to Doctor Garfield, as chairman of the committee in direct charge of the price determination, for a statement. Doctor Garfield delayed his reply until he could communicate with the surviving farmer members of the committee and obtain their approval of his presentation of the facts.

THE FAIR-PRICE COMMITTEE

The fair-price committee, which was appointed by President Wilson in the summer of 1917, was composed of the following members:

Harry A. Garfield, president of Williams College, chairman; Charles J. Barrett, president of the Farmers' Union; William M. Doak, vice president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; Eugene E. Funk, president of the National Corn Association; Edmund E. Ladd, president of North Dakota Agricultural College; R. Goodwin Rhett, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; J. W. Shorthill, secretary of the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations; James W. Sullivan, of the American Federation of Labor; L. J. Taber, master of the Ohio State Grange; Prof. F. W. Taussig, of Harvard University, chairman of the United States Tariff Commission; Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.; and Henry J. Waters, president of the Kansas State Agricultural College.

THE STAR'S INQUIRY

The Star's letter to Doctor Garfield:

SEPTEMBER 29, 1927.

MY DEAR DOCTOR GARFIELD: With the presidential campaign approaching, the statement is being made in political speeches in the Wheat Belt that Herbert Hoover was responsible for fixing the war price of wheat. The statement often takes the form of a charge that Mr. Hoover arbitrarily and unfairly held down the farmers' profits for the benefit of England. Our understanding in the Star office is that a committee, of which you were chairman, determined the price. But with the lapse of years recollections grow hazy.

We believe you would be doing a public service if you would send us the facts in the case for publication in the Star, so the public may be correctly informed on this moot point.

Thanking you for any information you can supply us, we are,

Very truly yours,

THE KANSAS CITY STAR.

DOCTOR GARFIELD'S REPLY

Doctor Garfield's letter to the Star follows in full:

WILLIAMS COLLEGE,
Williamstown, Mass., October 18.

To the STAR: I am in receipt of your letter of September 29, and am pleased to lay before you the facts with regard to the determination of the price of the 1917 wheat crop.

As chairman of the commission appointed by President Wilson to determine this price of wheat for the 1917 crop, I have carefully preserved the data upon which the findings of the commission were based. I am the more willing to reply to your letter in view of the persistent misstatement that Secretary Hoover determined the price. Mr. Hoover had absolutely no part in this matter other than to urge upon President Wilson that some action must be taken to protect the American farmer.

In order that this controversy should be settled with finality, I have laid the matter before the surviving farmer members of the fair-price commission—Mr. Charles Barrett, president of the Farmers' Union; Mr. L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange; Mr. E. D. Funk, at that time president of the Corn Growers' Association; and Mr. W. J. Shorthill, secretary of the Farmers' Cooperative Elevators Association. Those gentlemen welcomed the opportunity to sign the attached statement in which I, together with Doctor Taussig, the economist member, and Mr. Doak, who represented the railway brotherhoods, also concur.

The occasion for the determination of a fair price arose from the fact that the allied governments had consolidated their buying agencies into one hand and, through this buying power over the surplus, controlled the price of American wheat the moment the exports of the new crop should begin. The allied buying agencies considered that they should not pay more than $1.50 to $1.80 for American wheat. They advanced the argument that abundant wheat existed in the Argentine and in Australia at prices ranging from $1.25 to $1.50 per bushel, and the further fact that they had fixed the price to their own farmers at about $1.80 a bushel; that the only reason for purchasing American wheat was to free allied ships from the long voyages to the Southern Hemisphere in order that they might carry American troops, and they therefore did not consider that they should pay in excess of these prices.

It was solely to protect the American farmers from this situation that Mr. Hoover presented to President Wilson the necessity for some action. President Wilson appointed the commission, directly under himself, to determine the matter, and the commission unanimously determined $2.20 at Chicago as a fair price. The Congress had fixed the Government price for the 1918 crop at 20 cents less; that is, $2 per bushel.

As will appear from the inclosed statement, Mr. Hoover was not a member of the commission and took no part in its deliberations or conclusions.

I attach hereto the signed statement, which I am authorized to forward you on behalf of the above-mentioned gentlemen.

Very truly yours,

H. A. GARFIELD.

THE SIGNED STATEMENT

The signed statement follows:

STATEMENT OF FARM REPRESENTATIVES WHO WERE MEMBERS OF THE PRESIDENT'S FAIR-PRICE COMMISSION FOR WHEAT, 1917 CROP

(a) The allied committee which purchased wheat for all the Allies was practically the only export buyer of wheat, and through this buying power over the surplus exercised an important influence on the price of American wheat.

(b) The minutes of the committee's deliberations, August 17–30, 1917, a certified copy of which was delivered to each member before the final adjournment, evidence the care taken by the committee to prevent outside interference. After many formal and informal ballots it was voted unanimously to recommend to the President that the price for No. 1 northern spring wheat be fixed at $2.20. Only members of the committee were admitted after balloting began; all were present except Mr. Rhett, and none left the room until a statement addressed to the President had been prepared and approved by the committee. The conclusions of the committee were not made known to Mr. Hoover until after this statement had been approved.

(c) In reaching its conclusions the committee kept constantly in mind the three following factors, as stated in its report to the President: The fact that the United States was at war, the need of encouraging the producer, and the necessity of preventing speculation and profiteering.

(d) In accepting the recommendations of the fair-price committee the President issued a statement August 30, 1917, in the course of which he said: "The price now recommended by that committee, $2.20 per bushel at Chicago for the basic grade, will be rigidly adhered to by the Food Administration. Mr. Hoover, at his express wish, has taken no part in the deliberations of the committee on whose recommendation I determined the Government's fair price, nor has he in any way intimated an opinion regarding that price."

EXHIBIT H

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE FARMERS OF AMERICA

By Oscar E. Bradfute, former president American Farm Bureau Federation, Xenia, Ohio

I am an American farmer and believe the time has come when the farmers, who constitute one-third of the population of this great country, and have by far the greatest amount invested in their business of any of the great industrial group in America, should take a very deep interest in the proposed candidates for President of the two great political parties before their nominating conventions, rather than waken up afterwards to find that they have no satisfactory candidate placed before them.

As president of the greatest farm organization in America for three terms, I came in contact with most of the political, social, economic, and industrial leaders of America, and there seemed to me to be one outstanding man among them most eminently fitted to be President of the United States, and that man is Herbert Hoover.

I have recognized in Herbert Hoover a man most fitted for the Presidency, not simply because of his remarkable record in the administration of many complex problems, although I can bear witness to his efficiency in these lines; nor because of his personality, although I have found him always frank, open, and obliging; but I recognize in Herbert Hoover one who is keenly alive to every best interest of the American farmer; because he has stood behind every principle enunciated by our farm organizations than any other man I know of in public life.

I am a farmer and have lived upon, operated, or supervised my own farms for almost half a century. I have no other important interest, private or public, than that of the farm. With this in view, I want to analyze, from the farmer's point of view, the record of Herbert Hoover.

Very few farmers had ever heard of him until he was made Food Administrator during the war. No one will deny that this office, created as a war measure, brought with it duties, responsibilities, and regulations which were new to the farmer. Many of them seemed to interfere with the personal initiative and prerogatives of the individual farmer. Such, of course, invited opposition but were accepted as a necessity born of war.

As Food Administrator, Mr. Hoover could not be the exclusive servant of agriculture. His duties and responsibilities demanded fairness and equality to every class of people. In the perplexing duties which he assumed there was no precedent to guide him, since America had never before needed a Food Administrator. Not only was the welfare of our entire Nation dependent, in a large measure, upon the wisdom of his policies; indeed the welfare of the whole allied cause and the future course of world issues rested more heavily upon his shoulders than any of us realized at the time.

He doubtless made some mistakes. The wonder is that he did not make many. All of our marketing systems were disorganized and on an artificial bases. There are particularly two criticisms sometimes heard regarding his attitude toward the farmer in his Food Administration work. The first of these has to do with the fixing of the price of wheat. I am quite sure that since the publication of the Garfield correspondence only the ignorant or prejudiced can believe he had a part in the conference which did set the price of wheat at $2.20 per bushel. It should be generally known that he asked for the appointment of this commission because the European nations which had been buying our food products (each nation with its own public purchasing department and with private firms of each country also in the market, making a competition which had run prices of wheat and other farm products to high levels with every indication that prices would go still higher) had consolidated their buying in order to stop competition.

Thus the American farmer was about to be left with but a single purchaser for his large exportable surplus. That single purchaser would have the power to determine the price of the farmers' entire crop, because the world price would determine the domestic price. It was the avowed intention, and Mr. Hoover knew it, to force the price of wheat to approximately $1.50 on the farms. He requested a price-fixing commission, because he knew an injustice was about to be done to the American farmer and he was determined to avoid this injustice if possible. It is also known that the price which the commission set was not as high as Mr. Hoover personally thought it might be.

The criticism is made that the established price was to be a minimum price and that at no time during the war did prices go beyond the minimum level. Of course not. They could not have done so with but a single purchaser. It is absurd to have expected that they would. Anyone familiar with the many attempts at price fixing throughout many countries of the world's history knows that an established price, whether maximum or minimum, always becomes the actual price.

The second criticism has to do with pork and pork products, which next to wheat were the most important in the food classification. After a period of uncertainty in the hog market it was agreed in a conference between the Food Administration and representatives of the pork industry that without an official fixing of prices Mr. Hoover would attempt to secure for the farmer a price per hundredweight for live hogs equal to thirteen times that of a bushel of corn on the Chicago market. It was, of course, difficult to absolutely carry out this plan, since the price of corn was a fluctuating price. It was, however, very satisfactorily done until after the armistice, for hogs brought from $6 to $9 per hundredweight over the pre-war average, a higher price than they had seen in the past six years.

At that time Mr. Hoover, as Food Administrator, held enormous contracts from the allied governments for future deliveries of pork. The 1918 pig crop was still largely unmarketed. It had been produced at high cost of food and labor, beginning with the breeding season of a year before.

Shortly after the signing of the armistice the European nations abruptly served notice of the cancellation of their immense orders. They could go to the Southern Hemisphere and get cheaper fats. The high cost of living at home was becoming a serious problem. Enormous pressure was being exerted upon the Federal Government to do something to lessen these costs. The Cabinet of that time believed that the only way to immediately and effectively lower the high cost of living was to lower the price of the basic industry, which in this case was the farmer. Mr. Hoover urged that the agreement with the farmer should be carried out as nearly as it was possible to do so. To cancel the orders or to accede to the request of the administration would have been not only an injustice, but a faithless act to the farmer. Mr. Hoover further maintained that all the 1918 pork production would be needed before another crop could be produced. He believed that if the price agreement with the farmers could be maintained until March that by that time the European powers would be in position to enter the market, and supply and demand would raise price levels even above the agreed price ratios, whereas abrogation of the agreement earlier than March would reduce the prices to the farmer almost half.

I do not know of any more heroic acts in history than that of Mr. Hoover, who almost lone-handed withstood the attacks of the European nations on one hand and the administration of his own Government on the other in his determination to prevent the forcing of lower prices.

His sole motive in making the fight was to secure justice for the farmer. Usually where justice is at stake and determination enters a conflict, justice wins. And Hoover won. It was after the closing of the Food Administration that the disasters or deflation hit the farmer. His fight prevented the whole collapse of American agriculture.

The aftermath of war is always want and suffering. Mr. Hoover took up immediately following his work as Food Administrator the humanitarian work of the American Relief Association. In the saving of the lives of 8,000,000 babies the whole world became his debtor. I do not recall how many millions of number, it would mean little because the figures would be so large that the human mind could not comprehend them. But I do know that in the carrying out of this work Mr. Hoover did not slacken in his allegiance to the American farmer. He insisted that American donations of money, either public or private, must be expended only for American produced food. In this way he very materially enlarged our foreign outlets at a time when it meant much to the farmer.

Those who follow closely the exports of American corn will note that the exportations for the year 1921 were the largest ever known, more than double that of any other year in a quarter of a century. The crop of the preceding year had been a large one and the price disastrously low. Mr. Hoover organized the buying for the Russian famine with the deliberate purpose of raising the price of corn on the Chicago market. His large purchases succeeded in doing this. A raise of at least 10 cents per bushel is directly attributed to him, and this price advance was carried far into the crop of the next year.

Since Mr. Hoover has been a member of the President's Cabinet he he has been most helpful to agriculture. I personally know that one of the first things he did in the Department of Commerce was to establish a foodstuff division, the principal function of which has been to find increased outlets for American farm products. In the selection of men who are carrying on this work in the Department of Commerce, Mr. Hoover was guided largely by the advices of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Shortly after he became Secretary there was a large unemployment of labor and the demand for farm products dropped greatly. To consider means to create employment Mr. Hoover called a notable conference in Washington. It was my privilege and honor to have been invited to serve as one of the representatives of agriculture in this conference. I personally know that one of the objectives of Mr. Hoover in this conference was to assist the farmer as well as the laborer, for by getting the workers back on their jobs it would increase the farm market. It did so. Everyone knows that that conference and subsequent actions of Secretary Hoover have had much to do with the industrial prosperity of the intervening years, and while agriculture has not enjoyed the prosperity which it has deserved, it has, nevertheless, profited largely by the increased domestic market for good products. Had it not been for this, farm prices would have been lower than they have been.

Those who have served the American Farm Bureau Association and other farm organizations will all bear witness that Secretary Hoover has been called upon to consider every helpful farm measure that has been passed by Congress since the war, and that never has he been found wanting. It is not certain that the grain control bill, the emergency tariff, the agricultural schedule of the Fordney-McCumber bill, the intermediate credits act, the packer and stockyards act, as well as various others could have been enacted had it not been for the broad shoulder of Mr. Hoover helping push forward the farmer's wagon.

He has been criticized because he has not approved the McNary-Haugen bill, and it has been freely stated that President Coolidge's position has been due to Mr. Hoover's influence. The latter statement is certainly an injustice to President Coolidge. Everyone who knows the President knows he has an open mind on all subjects, but no one who knows him well will agree for a minute that he is dictated to or unduly influenced by Cabinet officer or any other man. He is the President of the United States in fact as well as right.

Those who will take the time to look into the history of recent farm legislation will find that Mr. Hoover was the first man in America to advocate a Federal Farm Board. He also early advocated the creation of groups or committees to advise and supervise commodity marketing. He has stood always four-square for the encouragement of orderly cooperative marketing and the proper financing of the same, even through Government aid. These also have been essential features of every McNary-Haugen bill.

It is true that he has not supported the principle of Government price fixing, which has been a part of some of the various McNary-Haugen measures; but even the strongest supporters of these measures have not abandoned what they interpret as price-fixing features and are hence now in agreement with Secretary Hoover. Thus it can be said that in every essential detail, except the equalization fee, Mr. Hoover has been a supporter of the objectives and principles of farm relief. If it is true that he does not believe in the theory of the equalization fee, it can be likewise said that large numbers of our best informed and thinking farmers also disagree with this provision.

Have we come to that place in our American life that either private citizen or public servant must be condemned if he expresses an honest conviction at variance with the conviction of other individuals or groups of people? Does not the genius of our American institutions guarantee to every man freedom of thought and utterance? To what end are we going to permit misrepresentation and vituperation to expend themselves for mere political ends? In whose eye is the mote and in whose the beam?

Both recognition of justice and a well-deserved appreciation of service rendered impels me to repeat that Herbert Hoover has been one of the very best friends the American farmer has had since the opening days of the World War.

O. E. BRADFUTE.

XENIA, OHIO, March —, 1928.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator some questions, if he does not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield the floor. I am through.

Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator has concluded, I should like to ask if he maintains that the farmers got a square deal in this matter, with the farmers' prices being held down and the prices of manufactured goods going sky high?

Mr. SACKETT. I maintain that they had the most profitable time in the history of the American farmer, and I think I have proven it.

Mr. NORBECK. Does the Senator still maintain that is the situation to-day?

Mr. SACKETT. No; I do not say anything about to-day.

Mr. NORBECK. But the Senator feels that when the manufacturers of shoes, cotton goods, and war supplies generally were given a free and open market the farmer should have been held down and his prices and his prosperity limited?

Mr. SACKETT. If the Senator please, I was not discussing the policy of Congress. I was discussing the act of Mr. Hoover during the war.

Mr. NORBECK. If it was an unfair deal and Hoover did not perpetrate it on the farmers, who did?

Mr. SACKETT. I did not say it was an unfair deal.

Mr. NORBECK. I noticed that.

Mr. SACKETT. I did not say that Mr. Hoover perpetrated it on the farmers. I told the story of the fixing of the fair price of wheat by the board appointed by the President of the United States at Mr. Hoover's suggestion.

Mr. NORBECK. And in which Mr. Hoover had a part.

Mr. SACKETT. I said distinctly he was not a member of that board and did not sit on it. If the Senator will read my speech he will understand that better.

Mr. NORBECK. I beg the Senator's pardon. I listened all the way through his speech trying to find something that Hoover had done for the farmers of this land, and I did not find it. I have been here for seven years while Mr. Hoover has been Secretary of Commerce and he is the one man who has never raised his voice against the agricultural inequality. This may be because he came from that country that has a different kind of national prosperity. England depends on low wages and cheap food. Their manufactured goods can compete in all the markets of the world. This means big dividends in business. I hope it is not the thing that is to be foisted on us.

Mr. SACKETT. He came from Iowa.

Mr. NORBECK. But he was 43 years old before he took any part in this country. He should not be elected President. He was not sufficiently interested in American political affairs to vote in a national election until after he was 43 years of age. His great fortune was amassed in British enterprises and in British territory. He was a member of the Democratic administration of President Wilson and as such in 1918 urged the election of a Democratic Congress to support President Wilson and his policies, and two years later became a candidate of the Democratic Party for President and carried the State of Michigan. He was unconvinced that there was anything in the Republican Party until the big landslide of 1920, and then he became a good Republican. He has given offense to great bodies of the voting population, and has no elements of personal popularity to win them back.

As Food Administrator, he was largely instrumental in holding down the price of wheat. It gave the Allies cheap food.

His attitude toward the Irish and Irish freedom has always been British.

After the armistice he told Germans asking aid for the starving children of Germany that, with his compliments, they could "go to hell."

He would be the most vulnerable candidate the Republican Party could nominate, and his nomination would mean the election of Al Smith for President.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] if he will, at his leisure, let us know how much Mr. Hoover was worth when he left this country to go to England, how much he was worth when he returned to this country from England, how much he was worth when the World War began, how much he was worth when the World War closed, and how much he is worth to-day.

Then I would like to ask the Senator personally, and he may answer this question, too, at his leisure, if he agrees with the order which Mr. Hoover recently issued in his department and, through his influence, has had carried out in other departments, by which he has forced equality between the white and colored races.

EQUITABLE USE OF THE WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which is on the President's desk. I have submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. CURTIS. I understand the Senator is striking out the preamble?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. And he has taken it up with the chairman of the committee and it is satisfactory to him?

Mr. KING. That is correct.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in his original resolution (S. Res. 181) submitted by him March 24, 1928, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Interior be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all instructions given by said departments to the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States (to meet with commissioners from Mexico to consider the questions and matters involved) under the act of May 13, 1924, requiring them to study the equitable use of the waters of the Rio Grande River below Fort Quitman, Tex., and also under joint resolution approved March 3, 1927, requiring said commission to study the equitable use of the waters of the lower Colorado River; and said Secretaries are likewise directed to transmit copies of all communications made by the Reclamation Service to said commissioners or persons interested in the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and Mexico regarding the waters of said rivers, and the disposition, allocation, or control of the same; and also copies of all communications between the United States and Mexico concerning the duties and work of said commissioners relating to the distribution, allocation, or control of the waters of said rivers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was stricken out.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have an address delivered by the Hon. E. C. Plummer, vice chairman of the United States Shipping Board, before the School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University, Washington, D. C., on April 17, 1928, containing important information with reference to shipping and the Shipping Board. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

SHIPPING SENSE

At this time, when the manifest intention of Congress to do something practical toward the reestablishment of an American merchant marine has, as always, brought forward critics who seek to confuse the issue, and so delay or defeat legislation, it is well to recall the declarations of real Americans who knew what American merchant ships meant to this Nation and who recorded their views in unmistakable words. Said Washington:

"We should not overlook the tendency of war to abridge the means, and thereby at least enhance the price, of transporting productions to their proper markets. I recommend it to your (Congress's) serious reflections how far and in what mode it may be expedient to guard against embarrassments from these contingencies by such encouragement to our own navigation as will render our commerce and agriculture less dependent on foreign bottoms which may fail us in the very moments most interesting to both these great objects. * * * There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure."

The Constitution under which we live grew out of the necessity of centralizing in the hands of our Federal Government the regulation of our commerce, to accomplish the development of which ships of our own were regarded as essential by the great founders of the Republic. Marvin, in his American Merchant Marine, pointedly quotes history when he says:

"It is a memorable fact that the very first real act of the first Congress of the United States—under the then new Constitution—contained vigorous provisions for the protection of the American merchant marine."

That same first Congress specifically and drastically, by law, created a preference for American tonnage engaged in foreign trade. It was under those laws, in greater or less effect until 1850, that American ships averaged during the intervening 61 years the carriage of 80 per cent of our imports and exports.

Representative Williamson, of North Carolina, in 1790 made this statement:

"By permitting foreigners to carry our produce for us in order to pay for the fine goods they furnish us, we have to raise money more from the soil by one-third than if we carried it ourselves."

Representative Smith, of Maryland (afterward Senator from that State), in 1794, discussing the effects of our early-day protective navigation laws, declared:

"Thus have our existing laws done nearly as much for us in two years as the navigation laws of Britain did for them in 40 years."

In 1794, when the United States was truly ship minded, Representative Nichols, of Virginia, declared:

"The interest of the whole community, not only those who are carriers but those who also furnish the object of carriage, positively demands a domestic marine, equal to its whole business. Even if it is to exist under rates higher than those of foreign navigation, it is to be preferred."

It was the illustrious author of the Declaration of Independence who said:

"The marketing of our productions will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and our policy may be influenced by those who command our commerce."

Not only did Jefferson believe, and say over and over again, that we should do our own foreign carrying in our own ships, but he also believed that we should build our ships, and this is one of the ways he said that:

"For a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation, as the marine would always be dependent upon the merchants furnishing them. Placing as a reserve with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, caulkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular commercial combination. We must therefore build them for ourselves. * * *

"To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards; is to form magazines; to multiply useful hands; to produce artists and workmen of every kind who may be found at once for peaceful speculations of commerce and for the terrible wants of war."

Regarding a merchant marine, Jefferson further said:

"As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense essential."

Senator Rufus King, of New York, afterwards minister to Great Britain, over a hundred years ago sagely and eloquently said:

"Without shipping and seamen the surpluses of agriculture and manufactures would depreciate on our hands; the cotton, tobacco, breadstuffs, provisions, and manufactures would turn out to be of little worth unless we have ships and mariners to carry them abroad and to distribute them in foreign markets."

In 1845 Representative Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, said:

"The time has arrived when we must decide whether we will yield this essential branch of navigation (steamships), and this indirect means of extending our naval armaments to our great commercial rival, or whether we shall promptly extend to our enterprising merchants the necessary means to make them; to bring American energy, enterprise, and skill into successful competition with British sagacity and capital. It would seem that no statesman ought to hesitate for a moment to give his support to a measure which is demanded alike by prudence and the necessities of our position."

The report of the American Institute, of New York, in 1828 said:

"Between 1789 and 1828 Congress passed no fewer than 50 tariff or other laws intended directly or indirectly to protect American shipbuilding and shipowning."

Congress was active during those years.

In his annual message to Congress, in 1847, President James K. Polk, of North Carolina, said:

"The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication with the various distant parts of the world is established by means of American-built steamers will find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad."

And what Americans will do when given a chance was shown by Senator Gwin, of California, in 1852, when he said:

"Without regard to the calls of their contract, they (the Collins Line) have built larger vessels than those of the Cunard Line, with improved machinery; and it is officially before the country, in the last annual report of the Postmaster General that these vessels exhibit 'unrivaled qualities,' and establish the 'superiority' of American skill and enterprise in the construction of ocean steamers. Indeed, it is admitted on all sides that they are the finest models afloat—the swiftest, strongest, and most beautiful steamers in the world. They are thus, in fact, a school for the steam marine of the country. This school necessarily educates good machinists, engineers, firemen, mechanics and officers of every grade, alike useful to the commercial and naval marine of the country." We led the world on the ocean then; and then we fell asleep.

In 1852 Representative Howard, of Texas, declared:

"As soon as the Collins Line is withdrawn the Cunarders will raise freights to the price they bore previous to the competition created by American steamers."

And they did.

In 1853 Senator Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas, voiced a recognized truth when he declared:

"Americans are the best shipbuilders in the world and have distanced their rivals."

This was during the period when Senator Rusk was the outstanding national advocate of American lines of mail steamships, at the moment seeking increased compensation from the Government for the American Collins Line of New York. He added:

"More than that, it [the Collins Line] has given you 28 or 30 steamships fit for war purposes without additional expense to your Navy for one-tenth the sum for which you could build and maintain them in your Navy proper. We owe it to American industry and enterprise, to the hardy citizens of our country, to maintain the system. And we owe it to our national defense, in my opinion, to maintain it."

In a special message to Congress in 1870 President Grant emphatically declared:

"A nation of the vast and ever-increasing interior resources of the United States must one day possess its full share of the commerce of these oceans no matter what the cost. Delay will only increase this cost and enhance the difficulty of attaining the result. * * * Building ships and navigating them utilizes vast capital at home. It employs thousands of workmen in their construction and manning; it creates a home market for the products of the farm and the shop; it diminishes the balance of trade against us precisely to the extent of freights and passenger money paid to American vessels and gives us a supremacy upon the seas of inestimable value in case of foreign wars."

A great British maritime historian (Lindsay), for years a member of Parliament, and all his life a shipowner, in his historic work on Merchant Shipping, published about the middle of the last century, said:

"Before the Collins Line was established the Cunarder steamers were receiving £7 10s. per ton freight, which was so much a monopoly rate that in two years after the Collins Line had commenced the rate fell to £4 per ton."

In his great work Twenty Years of Congress, James G. Blaine, of Maine, Representative and Senator in Congress, and afterwards Secretary of State under President Harrison, had this to say:

"The principle of protecting the manufactures and encouraging the navigation of America had been distinctly proclaimed in the first law of the new Government, and was thus made in a suggestive and emphatic sense the very corner stone of the republican edifice which the patriots of the Revolution were aiming to construct."

When he was a United States Senator he engaged in a notable debate on the subject of the protection of our merchant marine in foreign trade. During these remarks he said:

"Congress has passed 92 acts to aid railroads, given 200,000,000 acres of public lands worth to-day thousands of millions of dollars, and has added $70,000,000 in cash; and yet has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce."

Said Lincoln's Secretary of the Treasury:

"If I had been among those who had voted for millions upon millions of dollars for the construction of railroads to bring the productions of the interior to the seaboard, I should be ashamed to face my constituents if I had failed to do what I could toward securing the transportation of the surplus to foreign lands in United States ships."

President Arthur, in his annual message to Congress, in 1882, said:

"This subject [shipping] is of the utmost importance to the national welfare. Methods of reviving American shipbuilding and of restoring the United States flag to the ocean carrying trade should receive the immediate attention of Congress."

This is the way President Harrison expressed himself on the subject in his annual message to Congress in 1892:

"The United States has been paying an enormous annual tribute to foreign countries in the shape of freight and passage money. The balance of trade as shown by the books of our customhouses has been largely reduced and in many years altogether extinguished by this constant drain. I have felt, and have before expressed the feeling, that this condition of things was both intolerable and disgraceful."

Capt. William W. Bates, Commissioner of Navigation under President Harrison's administration and author of two great volumes on American shipping, said:

"American ships for American commerce mean American trade for American merchants."

In his annual message of 1894 President Cleveland said:

"The millions now paid to foreigners for carrying American passengers and products across the sea should be turned into American hands."

Cleveland knew the difference between a condition and a theory.

Representative Nelson Dingley, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee in 1897, went on record thus:

"The decline of our merchant marine in the foreign trade is a humiliating fact. If our shipping in the foreign trade had grown in proportion to the increase of the cargoes provided by our foreign commerce we should have had a most magnificent fleet of vessels engaged in transporting our exports and imports."

President McKinley, in his annual message of 1899, declared:

"Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory so long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress upon the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to this country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievements and with its rank among the nations of the earth."

Senator Thomas Benton, of Missouri, one of the great historical figures of the last century, and an author of renown, in his most famous work has said:

"While the lack of power to regulate foreign commerce was a primary defect of the Confederate Government (1774 to 1788) and the necessity for its exercise so great as to form a chief cause for creating the Federal Government, it is singular that Congress has always overlooked it, or confounded it with impost or revenue power. Though not now exercised, it is a power which has found a need for its exercise, and will find it again."

Half a century ago David A. Wells was one of the most noted of our economists, one who paid great attention to our merchant-marine problem. In his work, Our Merchant Marine, he said:

"During the single year 1849–50 we increased our ocean steam tonnage 113 per cent, and the seagoing qualities and performances of our vessels were so admirable that the Cunard Co., which had then been in operation 10 years, was obliged to bring out new ships to compete with them. The prospect, therefore, at one time was that the United States, although late in the start in this new department of foreign shipping, would soon equal, if not overtake, her great commercial competitor."

President McKinley in his last public speech spoke as the true American he was when he said:

"We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. They will not only be profitable in a commercial sense; they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go."

President Roosevelt spoke often and earnestly in favor of American ships for American foreign commerce. In an annual message to Congress 20 years ago he declared:

"Ships work for their own countries, just as railroads work for their terminal points. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods."

And yet there are still to be found in this country puppets who will write, and periodicals that will publish, articles asserting that this Nation does not need merchant ships of its own; that trade does not follow the flag; and that competitors can be trusted to build up our trade in foreign markets just as well as we could do it ourselves; and they give all sorts of scrambled reasons for their un-American views.

In the development of new foreign markets, shipping plays an important rôle, both in the establishment of services and by the personal contact of the shipping representatives of those lines, with potential purchases of American products.

Now, Robert Dollar is an American who has helped to build up this country's foreign trade. He knows, and, knowing, he spoke the other day as follows:

"I was much interested in a recent article on prosperity and sales. It dealt entirely with selling to our own people, who consume 80 per cent of our products; but it did not go into the importance of selling that other 20 per cent in foreign lands.

"This is very important; if it were stopped, 20 per cent of our own factories would be idle and a corresponding number of men idle. It is very difficult to sell more in the United States than is now sold, but foreign trade can be expanded indefinitely and bring money into our country.

"As an illustration: When we started our round-the-world service four years ago practically no trade existed between California and Singapore, Penang, and Ceylon. During the four years of our giving that part of the world a fortnightly service it has brought into this country $29,000,000 of new money. The increase of the then existing trade in Japan, China, and the Philippines amounted to $54,389,045—also new business that did not exist before.

"So I claim that foreign trade is a great factor to our prosperity. * * *

"You can not separate foreign trade and shipping and stay in the shipping business. One is dependent upon the other."

Secretary of State Elihu Root in 1906, in a great speech delivered before the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress at Kansas City, the last half of which was wholly devoted to the subject of an American merchant marine, which speech shortly afterwards was not only inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD but was made a Senate document as well, in part said:

"We are living in a world not of natural competition but of subsidized competition. State aid to steamship lines is as much a part of the commercial system of our day as State employment of consuls to promote business. It will be observed that both of these disadvantages under which the American shipowner labors are artificial; they are created by governmental action—one by our own Government in raising the standards of living and wages, by the protective tariff; the other by foreign governments in paying subsidies to their ships for the promotion of their own trade. For the American shipowner it is not a contest of intelligence, skill, industry, and thrift against similar qualities in his competitor; it is a contest against his competitors and his competitors' government and his own government also. Plainly, these disadvantages created by governmental action can be neutralized only by governmental action, and should be neutralized by such action."

In 1913, in a speech in the Senate of the United States, Senator WESLEY L. JONES said:

"Since 1885 foreign ships have carried over $50,000,000,000 of our foreign commerce. Estimating the freight at 15 per cent, we have paid them over $7,500,000,000 for getting our products to their markets and supplying our own. Of what benefit is a balance of trade in our favor if we pay out most of it for freight?"

In his annual message to Congress in 1914 President Wilson said:

"How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we wait for the trade to develop without them? The Government must open these gates of trade, and open them wide; open them before it is altogether profitable to open them, or altogether reasonable to ask private capital to open them."

In his annual message to Congress in 1915 President Wilson also said:

"Moreover, we can develop no true or effective American policy without ships of our own—not ships of war but ships of peace, carrying goods and carrying much more; creating friendships and rendering indispensable services to all interests on this side of the water. They must move constantly back and forth between the Americas. They are the only shuttles that can weave the delicate fabric of sympathy, comprehension, confidence, and mutual dependence in which we wish to clothe our policy of America for Americans."

The late President Harding, an ardent advocate of and worker for an American merchant marine in foreign trade, among his many utterances in favor of such a marine said:

"Our shipping will strengthen American genius and determination, because carrying is second only to production in establishing and maintaining the flow of commerce to which we rightfully aspire."

Admiral William S. Benson, who, during the World War, had supreme command in the United States Navy and charge of the manning and operating of about 450 merchant ships for transportation of troops, equipment, and supplies, said in 1921:

"The merchant service, properly organized in time of peace, is the one marine instrumentality which lends itself perfectly to automatic expansion in time of war. With the building up of the merchant marine there will always be available a sufficient number of suitable vessels to carry both personnel and munitions to any extent that this Government may be called upon to use in foreign service. It is one of the age-old traditions of British naval history that the merchant service always supplies men and ships for national defense and a similar policy is unmistakably proclaimed in the merchant marine act, 1920. As neither the Army, Navy, nor Panama transport organizations will ever suffice for military operations entailing the carriage of large bodies of men, both of our fighting services will naturally look to the merchant marine for assistance in this respect immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities. And it seems only reasonable to point out that if the merchant service is to prove indispensable in time of war, it should receive every encouragement in time of general tranquillity. There are several fundamental principles on which this encouragement might properly be based, principles recognized and fully acted upon by the leading maritime nations of the world. One of the most important involves government patronage in time of peace, not only through the bestowal of generous compensation for the carriage of mails but also having its traveling personnel and its miscellaneous freight transported by these same merchantmen which are to prove of such paramount importance to the country in time of national peril."

Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana, on July 20, 1922, said:

"Shall we play the game of our commercial rivals by stifling legislation to establish a merchant marine of our own for our national and industrial protection? Shall we allow Great Britain to dictate our sea policy and leave us in commercial bondage for generations to come? Shall we permit her to set up on the high seas a notice reading: 'British property! Americans keep off'!"

The folly of trusting our carrying trade to competitors, who thus secure inside information of our merchants' and manufacturers' business, is well known, as was succinctly stated by Secretary of Commerce Hoover at New York in a public address four years ago, in the course of which he declared:

"It is simply a truism to say that we must have an American merchant overseas marine.

"We must have ships if we would expand our exports on sound lines, and we must have them as auxiliaries to our national defense. * * *

"To secure export markets we must have some sound proportion of American-controlled shipping to assure us against combinations in rates which would prejudice our goods in competitive markets. Nor have our merchants been without experience of finding that the transport of our goods in foreign bottoms has been taken advantage of by our competitors to learn details of our trade connections.

"Combinations in control of sea rates are the commonest thing in the world shipping fabric.

"It is just as important to the farmer to be guaranteed reasonable rates of sea transport as of land freight. The real security is an American-owned merchant marine."

Henry Herbermann, who purchased 21 ships from the United States Shipping Board and still is operating them despite heavy losses in the Mediterranean trade with North Atlantic ports, and who knows whereof he speaks, said:

"If American tonnage is withdrawn from the ocean as unprofitable and our manufacturers and exporters have to depend upon foreign tonnage for the transportation of their goods, it may result in an increase in rates which may drive our products from foreign markets and result in curtailed production at home to the detriment of the manufacturer and wage earner as well * * *."

In a speech made this year in the Senate (January 5) Senator FLETCHER, of Florida, declared:

"I would a great deal rather see private enterprise take hold of the shipping in a business way, run and replace and reconstruct and rebuild, and go on with this business as it should be done in this country. We ought to have some 8,000,000 tons of merchant ships to carry about 60 per cent of our overseas trade."

In one of his recent messages to Congress President Coolidge said:

"The maintenance of a merchant marine is of the utmost importance for national defense and the service of our commerce."

Therefore, from President Washington to President Coolidge, regardless of political affiliations or sections of the country, for over a hundred and fifty years, our outstanding statesmen have declared the wisdom of providing the Nation with ships of its own, because such ships are indispensable in the promotion of our foreign commerce and essential for the national defense. Time and again has the truth of these utterances been demonstrated.

Never was this truth brought so vividly to the attention of the American people as with the outbreak of the World War.

There had been many developments before that time which should have taught our people what all the great statesmen of this country so well knew; but it was not until the crisis brought on at the beginning of the World War, when the leading maritime nations became involved and our commerce lay rotting upon the shores because the foreign merchant ships we had trusted so long no longer came at our call, that our people resolved never again to depend on other nations to do that which the wisdom of our forefathers long ago had told us we should do for ourselves.

Well may we at this time recall those words of Raleigh upon which was builded the greatest empire of modern times:

"Whosoever commands the sea commands the trade; whosoever commands the trade of the world commands the riches of the world and, consequently, the world itself."

WAR-DEBT CANCELLATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have a copy of a letter written by Hon. William W. Seymour, of Tacoma, Wash., to Mr. Frederick W. Peabody, of Ashburnham, Mass., dealing largely with the war-debt-cancellation proposition. I know Mr. Seymour personally. He is one of our high-class citizens. He made a recent visit to Europe. I ask unanimous consent to have his letter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., March 15, 1928.

In re: War debt cancellation.

Mr. FREDERICK W. PEABODY,
Ashburnham, Mass.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your circular letter of February "To the men and women who lead."

Since receiving your circular letter of last year I have been to Europe, visiting not only France but England, Italy, and some other countries.

The result of my visit has confirmed my impression before going, namely, that it would be unwise for the United States to cancel the war debt.

You seem to single out France especially. My impressions on the ground were that if any nation is to be given "the benefit of the doubt" it would be England.

I will say that however fundamentally adversely the people of these respective countries may have felt, neither Mrs. Seymour nor myself saw any of it on the surface. Everywhere we were treated courteously, and more than that, I saw no Americans anywhere who complained.

My main reasons before going against the cancellation of our war debt was that these countries, especially France and England, received large concessions in territories and "spheres of influence," which I doubt very much if they would forego, for their indebtedness to us, and then some. Another reason is that a very considerable amount they receive is paid to them by Germany. But since going there and witnessing the amount of money needlessly expended by them, especially on liquor, and learning from Americans who have lived there a number of years the sneaky way the French have of avoiding taxes, I am more than ever convinced that France especially can pay the "war debt" without any very great sacrifice.

However you and I may feel individually as to the wisdom of the Volstead amendment, its opponents claim that it was put over as "a war measure." Why should America, thousands of miles away from the main arena, far less interested than either England or France, deny themselves the purposes "of winning the war" over and above these countries and forego the money paid to them in addition? Of course, I know what they'll say—and what you will reecho—that wine and liquor, tobacco, etc., are to them part of their meal and they would have rather lost the war than forego that sacrifice, but I don't know any reason why a drink shouldn't be appreciated by many Americans as much as by them.

One of my American friends in Paris did pay his taxes, and when he mentioned it he was laughed at by the Frenchmen. After that he did not do so and "got away with it."

Our country, you are well aware, has been the leader in the world on "curtailing armaments," etc., and yet Great Britain, by refusing to cooperate, is compelling us to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on our Navy. You must be aware that both France and England are spending vast amounts on armaments and navy.

You don't mean to, I know, but I am convinced that you are unconsciously doing your country an incalculable harm by stirring up these questions and giving the countries in Europe a false hope that our Congress will "fall for it." What you say is quoted and is intentionally used by designing foreigners to injure our country in various ways.

As I say, I have a great sympathy for the English, and as for France, well, they are not paying anyhow. You just persuade them to follow out that policy. That will save them a number of billion dollars now, and us, perhaps, a good many more in the future.

Respectfully submitted.

WM. W. SEYMOUR.

NICARAGUAN AFFAIRS AND PEACE POLICY

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish merely to announce that it is my intention as soon as I can get recognition to-morrow to address the Senate on the pending amendment to the naval appropriation bill and also on Senate Joint Resolution 1.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had adopted a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 31) requesting the President to return to the House of Representatives the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 244) authorizing a modification of the adopted project for Oakland Harbor, Calif., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

OAKLAND HARBOR PROJECT, CALIFORNIA

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution just received from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 31, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 244) authorizing a modification of the adopted project for Oakland Harbor, Calif.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution. The object is merely to correct a date.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

FERTILIZER PRICES IN TENNESSEE AND ALABAMA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, some weeks ago I was made acquainted with a very remarkable situation existing in my State, to the effect that fertilizers were being sold at from $3 to $5 a ton cheaper just across the line in Alabama than they were in Tennessee. Of course, I immediately undertook to find out why this was so, if it were a fact. I have here correspondence which shows what the facts are, and the very remarkable statement occurs in a letter from Mr. Charles J. Brand, of the National Fertilizer Association, which admits that this is true and gives the reasons which he alleges why it is true.

I want to say at this time, in asking that the correspondence be printed in the RECORD, that I do not agree with the reasons offered by the Fertilizer Trust for its action in selling fertilizer from $3 to $5 a ton higher in my State than right across an imaginary line in Alabama. There is no reason why it should be that way.

It makes me feel, Mr. President, that we were certainly on the right track when we made, or attempted to make, by the bill which was passed by the Senate a fertilizer proposition out of Muscle Shoals. Surely, if the Fertilizer Trust, for reasons of its own, is able at will to sell fertilizers in one State at a higher price than in another, it is time that the Congress was doing something to remedy that situation.

Mr. NORRIS. What are the reasons that are given?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and the Senate will indulge me for just a moment, I will state them. The first reason seems to have substance. It is:

1. The State tonnage tax is 20 cents per ton higher in Tennessee than in Alabama.

That seems to be a real reason—

2. Tennessee customers (dealers) buy from 1 to 5 cars per season, while Alabama customers buy from 5 to 20 cars. This higher sales cost is estimated by one company at 55 cents per ton.

I see no reason in the world for that under the peculiar circumstances surrounding the sale of fertilizers.

3. Tennessee customers demand better drilling condition than is demanded in Alabama.

I think that is utterly without merit.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that mean better fertilizers?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not quite understand the meaning of the expression.

Mr. McKELLAR. The statement is, "A better drilling condition is demanded."

Mr. NORRIS. "A better drilling condition"?

Mr. McKELLAR. What he means is this:

This involves double milling and screening and longer curing, making an extra preparation cost of 50 cents per ton.

I am advised that that is not true.

4. The additional freight cost averages about 30 cents per ton.

I am advised by the Interstate Commerce Commission that that is not true; that the rates are the same; and, in so far as the rates are concerned, that there is no reason in the world for fertilizers being sold at a higher price in Tennessee than in Alabama.

5. The Tennessee law requires that all fertilizer be shipped in 125-pound bags, while in Alabama a 200-pound bag is most commonly used. This means six additional bags per ton for goods going into Tennessee. This adds at least 50 cents to the cost.

That, of course, on its face is manifestly without substantive reason behind it.

So this is the way the Fertilizer Trust undertakes to explain that remarkable condition. How they are able to charge the farmers of my State from $3 to $5 a ton more for fertilizer than is charged across the line in Alabama is beyond my understanding, and I am asking that these communications may be put in the RECORD, and I am making this statement in the hope that such steps will be taken as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the communications referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., March 22, 1928.

Senator K. D. McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Can you give the people of Lincoln County any explanation as to why commercial fertilizer is $3 to $5 per ton cheaper across the line in Alabama than in Lincoln and other border counties? Please investigate for the citizens of Lincoln whether this is the fault of the fertilizer interests or the Government railroad commissioners. Please reply at once.

FARMERS OF LINCOLN COUNTY.
By WM. M. SMITH.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1928.

WM. M. SMITH,
Fayetteville, Tenn.:

Answering your telegram. No; I know of no just reason why the price of fertilizer is from $3 to $5 a ton cheaper in Alabama than it is in Tennessee. If so, our State authorities should act at once to obtain redress. If it is due to unlawful combination by the Fertilizer Trust both Federal and State authorities should act. I will have the matter investigated at once and advise you. Glad you called it to my attention. It is the first information I have had of the fact.

KENNETH McKELLAR.

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., March 31, 1928.

Senator KENNETH McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You seem to be the only one that seems disposed to help out in this fertilizer matter. It is not the railroads, I think, but the fertilizer people, establishes an imaginary line at the southern border of Tennessee and make a difference of $3 to $5 a ton. Personally, myself, it does not make much difference to me, but it is a condition that affects all of southern and western Tennessee, and I do hope you will not let the matter drop until something is done to rectify this wrong that is being perpetrated on our State. I can assure you that the farmers are getting a bad deal in this matter and will appreciate fully anything that can be done.

Assuring you of my personal kind wishes, I beg to remain,

Yours truly,

WM. M. SMITH.

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., April 2, 1928.

Senator KENNETH McKELLAR.

DEAR SIR: I received a letter from the fertilizer people that they were willing to bill fertilizer to me at Alabama destination and then I could have it stopped in Tennessee, but, of course, I would have to pay railroad switching charges and put Tennessee tags on same. This means a saving of from $2 to $4.50 per ton; and the other fertilizer people are doing the same for their agents in this county. While I do not expect to get back my money for what I have already shipped, but it will save the difference on other shipments. The writer mailed some of the circulars to H. D. McAdams, Pulaski, Tenn., and to Mr. Stribley, of Lawrenceburg. The A. A. C.'s man, who makes this territory, got a copy of my telegram to you and your telegram to me, which he mailed to his compnay. I feel that you have done this county some good in the matter, and I sincerely hope that you will continue to put forth your work for the interest of the farming public in the future as you have in the past for all of Tennessee Valley should get the same prices on fertilizer as Alabama. This has at least started something. If I can be of service to you, please let me know.

Respectfully,

WM. M. SMITH.

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., April 9, 1928.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I think most all of the fertilizer people are now letting fertilizer come into Lincoln County at the Alabama price by shipping to Alabama parts and diverting to Tennessee points by paying a small switching charge to railroads. You seem to be the only public official interested in this matter. I don't think any of the other of the counties of Tennessee are getting advantage of this reshipping or stoppage, whichever you would call it. The writer is certainly glad to note that there will be no joint debate between you and the Hon. FINIS GARRETT. Your work as a public servant of the farmers stands out for its worth to them.

The general public can see no reason for swapping horses in the middle of the stream—that is, as far as I can find out.

Mr. GARRETT made a good Congressman and was appreciated.

Mr. MCKELLAR is making a good Senator, and I can find no one who can give a reason for a change.

Respectfully,

WM. M. SMITH.

THE NATIONAL FERTILIZER ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1928.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I have received your letter of the 10th and am glad to know that you will give careful consideration to my letter of the 9th.

In regard to the apparent price disparity in northern Alabama and the adjoining counties in Tennessee, it happens that I have just received information bearing on this situation from a number of companies that sell in that territory. It is therefore comparatively easy to answer the question raised by Mr. William M. Smith. In answering this question I am giving you summarized information, which I have obtained within the past few days from at least five different companies.

One company reports an average difference on four leading grades of $1.73 per ton, the largest difference being $2.25 per ton on a 12–4–4 grade. Another company reports an average difference of $1.33 per ton, the largest difference on a specific grade being $1.76. Another large company reports an average spread of $1.40 per ton, another $1.75, and still another $1.35.

These differences exist for a number of reasons:

1. The State tonnage tax is 20 cents per ton higher in Tennessee than in Alabama.

2. Tennessee customers (dealers) buy from 1 to 5 cars per season, while Alabama customers buy from 5 to 20 cars. This higher sales cost is estimated by one company at 55 cents per ton.

3. Tennessee customers demand better drilling condition than is demanded in Alabama. This involves double milling and screening and longer curing, making an extra preparation cost of 50 cents per ton.

4. The additional freight cost averages about 30 cents per ton.

5. The Tennessee law requires that all fertilizer be shipped in 125-pound bags, while in Alabama a 200-pound bag is most commonly used. This means six additional bags per ton for goods going into Tennessee. This adds at least 50 cents to the cost.

These added costs would total $2.05, and although this figure should be considered more or less approximate it must be very close to the actual difference in cost, since one of the larger companies estimates this difference at an average of $1.82 per ton. Although the others have not estimated the total difference in cost, they agree pretty well on the above-enumerated items.

It, therefore, seems to me that there is ample justification for the slightly higher prices that are being charged in southern Tennessee as compared to northern Alabama. The larger difference—namely, $3 to $5 per ton reported to you by Mr. Smith—is, of course, a retail price difference, and the figures I have given you are all based on cash prices to dealers. It is, of course, entirely possible that such differences may be found to exist in adjoining counties in the two States, due to the varying commissions charged by dealers. This might easily be true of time prices quoted by different dealers, or it might even be that the cash prices of one dealer are being compared with the time prices of another. At any rate, I am convinced that in so far as fertilizer manufacturers are concerned there are no price differences between the two territories that can not be amply justified by the difference in actual costs of manufacturing and selling.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES J. BRAND,
Executive Secretary and Treasurer.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, STATE OF TENNESSEE,
Nashville, April 17, 1928.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: With further reference to the claim that commercial fertilizer is being sold in Tennessee at $2 to $5 per ton higher than in the States south of us, we have been making some investigations and find that prices are lower on the same brands in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi than they are in Tennessee, and higher in Kentucky than they are in Tennessee. They are higher in Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio than they are in Kentucky. We are advised by one manufacturer that this is due to the fact that the farther away you get from the ports of entry the greater the cost of manufacture, but this does not explain why fertilizer manufactured in Nashville and shipped to Alabama, freight prepaid, should sell there from $2 to $5 per ton cheaper than it is sold even in the vicinity of Nashville.

I appreciate your interest in the matter. I am endeavoring to get sufficient data to take this matter up with the Federal Trade Commission. I have been advised that this is the best course to pursue. Will you kindly favor me with your advices in the matter, and should we decide to carry it before the Federal Trade Commission will you advise us as to just how to proceed. Any assistance which you may render us will be duly appreciated.

Thanking you, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

HOMER HANCOCK, Commissioner.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, April 20, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed Lord, out of the depths of our conscious need and out of our deepest gratitude we would pray never leave nor forsake us. Bless us with that deep experience of the soul that can not be measured, and help us to that peace that no human mind has ever understood. Lead us to that love whose depths no mortal heart has ever sounded, and to that joy that no earthly lip has ever expressed. All along the pathway that awaits our footfall, may every mountain be brought low and every valley raised up and every rough place made plain. May our mornings and our evenings bring to us satisfaction because of work well done. Raise us to a plane where the losses and the crosses of life are exalted and where the beatitude of our Heavenly Father rests upon us. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 8835. An act to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to provide for terms of court at Bryson City, N. C.; and

H. R. 12441. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act in reference to writs of error," approved January 31, 1928, Public, No. 10, Seventieth Congress.

The message further announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 710) entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Northwestern Bands of Shoshone Indians may have against the United States," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. SCHALL, and Mr. ASHURST to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before taking up the business for to-day I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that we are honored by having in the Speaker's row in the Member's gallery one of the premier aces of America; that man who made a nonstop flight, with a passenger, from this continent to Germany, 60 miles beyond Berlin, one of the outstanding feats of aviation. We are honored by having as a visitor in the gallery to-day Clarence D. Chamberlin. [Applause.]

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. SNELL, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 174

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3555, entitled "An act to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and which shall continue not to exceed 12 hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of the point of order as provided in clause 7 of the Rule XVI, the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Agriculture, now in the bill, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the five-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with the committee substitute, as amended, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and committee substitute thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. SNELL, from the Committee on Rules, also submitted the following resolution for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 175

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 744, entitled "An act to further develop an American merchant marine, to assure its permanence in the transportation of the foreign trade of the United States, and for other purposes." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and which shall continue not to exceed four hours, the time to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and those opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of the point of order as provided in clause 7 of Rule XVI the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries now in the bill, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the five-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with the committee substitute, as amended, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and committee substitute thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from New York yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the information of the Members of the House as to the order of business next week, we are to assume that the resolution for the consideration of the agricultural bill will come up after we have concluded the flood control bill?

Mr. SNELL. That is the expectation, that the farm relief bill will be considered immediately after the conclusion of the flood control bill.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. As I understand, the present bill we are considering is a Senate bill?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If I recall correctly, the two resolutions just offered are for the consideration of Senate bills?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I am just wondering when we are going to consider the Senate bill with reference to Muscle Shoals?

Mr. SNELL. I could not answer that this morning.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Are you going to wait for the Boulder Dam bill until it passes the Senate or are you going to consider the House bill?

Mr. SNELL. I can not answer that.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day we begin at the first number on the calendar, that the bills may be considered in order in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that all bills to which there are less than three objections be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that it shall be in order to-day to consider the Private Calendar in the House as in Committee of the Whole, beginning with the first bill on the calendar and including all bills having less than three objections.

Mr. TILSON. Up to the present star.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could we not do that in, say about an hour and a half from now so that we can get the bills. I believe we do not have the bills here at the present time. Could we not proceed from the star until half past one and then we can start at the beginning?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request on account of the situation in regard to the bills. I ask unanimous consent that we may now begin at the star and after considering bills unobjected to for an hour and a half we may then go back to the first bill on the calendar and call bills to which there are less than three objections.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand from the gentleman that we are to begin at the star and consider those bills which have not heretofore been considered?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; for an hour and a half, until we get the other bills.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the intention with respect to continuing consideration of the flood control bill?

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman please, it is thought that time may really be gained by suspending consideration of the flood control bill for the day for further study of the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will it be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. I suppose so. There is nothing definite settled beyond to-day.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the present understanding?

Mr. TILSON. That is the present understanding.

Mr. HASTINGS. That its consideration will be resumed to-morrow.

Mr. TILSON. There is no understanding beyond to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut modifies his request which now is that it shall be in order to-day to consider bills unobjected to upon the Private Calendar, beginning at the star, in the House as in Committee of the Whole, until half past 1 and thereafter it shall be in order to start at the beginning of the calendar and consider bills to which there are less than three objections.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman want to fix an arbitrary time—half past 1?

Mr. TILSON. I am informed it will take probably an hour to get the bills ready, so we may properly consider those bills. It was not expected that that portion of the calendar would be taken up, and this is the reason for my modified request.

Mr. TUCKER. They are to be taken up an hour and a half from now?

Mr. TILSON. We have fixed the time at half past 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of bills here below the star which are entitled to consideration, and I shall have to object until all of those bills shall have been considered.

Mr. TILSON. It is all one request so that we take up no bills at all unless we get this consent.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. There is one bill there I have killed six or seven times, and I am not going to let it come up again without my objection when there are unconsidered bills here.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will indicate the bill, I have no doubt he will get two other gentlemen who will stand with him.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. It is the Near East relief bill—that is the unhappy name of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I object unless that one bill shall be eliminated from consideration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Nebraska will permit, I will help the gentleman object to that one bill just to please the gentleman, so as not to prevent the other bills from coming up.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman need have no apprehension about his bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, since I have assurances of the aid of that fighting little colleague from New York in an effort to kill this objectionable bill, I withdraw my objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the platform of the National Socialist Party in the RECORD. It is a very interesting document.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall object to printing the platform of any party in the RECORD. This is not what the RECORD is for.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment? I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts understands that this platform does not contain the declaration for beer and wine which the gentleman from Milwaukee desired, and with that fortunate omission I hope the gentleman will not make any objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD was not instituted and is not carried on for the purpose of politics. It is carried on to record the proceedings of the Congress. I have stood against these extraneous matters going into the RECORD and I must maintain that position.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] can get a little time and read it, so we will just be saving time. Other platforms have gone into the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Well, if the gentleman wants to take the time of the House to read it, all right.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 30 minutes at some time to read it and explain it.

The SPEAKER. At what time?

Mr. BERGER. Any time next week.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that just before adjournment to-day the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may address the House for 10 minutes before adjournment this afternoon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS AS A RESULT OF SUBMARINE ACCIDENTS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10437) granting double pension in all cases to widows and to dependents when an officer or enlisted man of the Navy dies from an injury in line of duty as the result of a submarine accident, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at 1.30 o'clock p. m. the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. O'BRIEN] may have permission to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at 1.30 o'clock this afternoon the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. O'BRIEN] may address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE FLOOD CONTROL BILL

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on flood control and the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I dropped into the Willard last evening and was accosted by a gentleman whom I remembered to have met in New Orleans last summer when I visited the lower Mississippi region to learn what I could about the flood situation.

Knowing my interest in the subject, he invited me to attend a meeting of the representatives of the 7,500 owners of the 4,000,000 acres in the flooded area whose land is to be taken by the Federal Government for the proposed flood-way. Also he said there would be represented the railways whose tracks would have to be raised in the proposed plan, besides the other representatives of the 15,000,000 acres which would be benefited by the project. In fact he said I would meet the representatives of big lumber companies and other corporations which were interested in the proposed bill—in other words, the very best people.

I was ushered into a private parlor where there were engaged in animated conversation about two score of very prosperous-looking gentlemen.

Shortly after I entered the room the meeting was called to order by a portly gentleman, whose name I did not catch, and he proceeded to make a most astounding address. Realizing its import, I asked my friend if there would be any objection to my taking notes, to which he replied in the negative.

Omitting the customary exordium of generalities this is what I took down:

This meeting has been called to register our protest against the scandalous imputations and implications contained in the speeches of Representative JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, who has outrageously misrepresented the attitude of our friends who are the owners of the land to be taken in the proposed spillways and flood-ways under the Jones bill. He has intimated that we proposed to mulct the Federal Government out of $75 an acre for cut-over lands which we purchased for $1.25 per acre, and that the railroads in the affected area which suffered a loss of $6,318,000 through the flood, want to exact damages to the extent of $75,000,000 for the raising of their tracks under the proposed scheme of flood prevention. We desire to assure him and all others that he wholly misrepresented our attitude.

We realize that in every crisis which this country has had to meet designing and unscrupulous men have not hesitated to put on the cloak of the mendicant or to wrap the American flag around them nor scrupled to use either for their own profit or aggrandizement.

We do not stand in such attitude. On the contrary, this is our credo:

The Mississippi River is entitled to its right of way. It is not an interloper. It was there before the white man settled on its banks. It is a great continental river. It is entitled to free and uninterrupted access to the sea.

Its habits of occasional overflow were soon made known to the first settlers. They took possession of its banks with full knowledge of the river's habits. They possessed themselves of these lands knowing the danger of their situation. The doctrine of caveat emptor applies. The river is entitled to an easement in the lands subject to overflow.

The greed of man has restricted its banks and closed its natural outlets. As the river once flowed it had several natural outlets or mouths called a delta.

Every great continental river is entitled to a delta. The Delta of the Mississippi has been greatly curtailed and confined to one outlet. Originally it had outlets into Lake Pontchartrain and Lake Borgne, also along the Atchafalaya Valley and the Tensas Basin. These have been closed.

The obligation of the Federal Government in the Mississippi, as in all other navigable streams, consists principally in preserving its navigability.

Areas on the low-lying banks of such streams subject to floods are occupied by settlers at their peril. If they take up their abode upon such lands or attempt to farm them, they impliedly assume the burden of protecting themselves.

Land subject to an easement has not the value it would have if it were unburdened by such use. If the land is freed of the easement of the river's tendency to overflow it will have a vastly increased value.

The obligation of the Government is to save human life but not to free the land of its easement or encumbrance. It should not be made a part of this scheme for the Government to augment the values of land subject to flood.

The practice in every community where a road or highway is built which augments the value of adjacent or abutting land is to have such owners contribute to the cost, and we are willing to contribute our share. [Loud and prolonged applause, the audience rising.]

I was pleased beyond measure at this manifestation of altruism and took advantage of the enthusiasm to make my departure. As I was leaving I heard a voice saying, "That fellow has been taking notes," and then a big burly fellow grabbed me and shouted, "Give up those notes!"

I refused indignantly and immediately was attacked and thrown to the floor and was nearly suffocated with the weight of several men trying to overcome me when—I woke up. It was all a dream!

REFORESTATION A FACTOR IN FLOOD CONTROL

In my remarks before the Flood Control Committee of the House, Wednesday, December 7, 1927, I suggested the bill to be brought out by the committee should embody at least three definite features, to wit:

First. Setting the levees farther back from midstream, so as to enlarge the capacity of the channel.

Second. Opening up again the old branches of the Delta and providing for natural spillways.

Third. A definite plan of reforestation and curtailment of timber cutting within the watershed area of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

The bill before us includes the first two recommendations but is silent on the subject of reforestation, showing that the framers of the bill before us do not seem to appreciate the woeful effects of forest denudation in bringing about flood conditions.

I want therefore to insert in the RECORD some observations on the effects of forest denudation from the pen of Raphael Zon, of the Lake States Forest Experiment Station, as follows:

Accurate records, continued for a long period of years, of the effect of forested and deforested watersheds upon the behavior of streams are available for many countries, including the United States. They are particularly abundant in Switzerland, and the French, Italian, and Tyrol Alps. This effect has now been so universally recognized that such countries as Switzerland and France have adopted as a definite policy, involving large expenditures of money, the control of mountain streams by means of forestation.

* * * * * * *

It is not so much the storage of water in the forest floor that gives forests such a prominent part in the regulation of stream flow as their ability to prevent erosion. The forest is the most effective agent for protecting the soil from erosion, because (1) the resistance of the soil to erosive action is increased by the roots of the trees which hold the soil firmly in place, and (2) at the same time the erosive force of the run-off is itself reduced because the rate of its flow is checked and its distribution over the surface equalized.

* * * * * * *

The famous French engineer, Demontsey, computed that one mountain torrent brought down after one storm, in 85,000 cubic yards of water, over 221,000 cubic yards of detritus, or more than two and one-half times its own volume.

* * * * * * *

The entire top soil is gone from hundreds of thousands of acres in western Virginia, western Pennsylvania, eastern Kentucky, and southeastern Ohio. From these lands rain water courses much faster to the Mississippi than formerly.

* * * * * * *

Trees, grass, wood lots, forests, and other soil-building crops will vastly improve the flood situation. Not only will they slow up the run-off water but they will save the most valuable part of the soil and will reduce the clogging of streams, which cuts down their carrying capacity and adds to the flood danger.

* * * * * * *

In the light of all these facts one can not escape the conviction that the cutting away and burning of the forest on the western slopes of the Appalachians, where the Ohio and its tributaries rise, increased erosion from the slopes, raised the water level in the tributaries, and increased the flood danger farther down the Mississippi.

* * * * * * *

Given a river flowing through a flat, alluvial plain, depositing sediment at its own bottom as it goes, and constantly filling up its bed, the building of levees along its banks under such conditions is courting disaster. The average level of the river will rise between the levees, and the bottom will rise as further sediment is deposited. Therefore, soon the levees will have to be built higher. The net result of the process is only to lift the whole bodily above the plain. This is shown clearly by the Yellow River in China. There are points where "China's Sorrow" has now been lifted 60 feet above the plain. And there is our own Colorado River, whose bed is 200 feet above the Imperial Valley.

* * * * * * *

Also, I quote from an article by Col. W. B. Greeley, Chief of the United States Forest Service, entitled "Use common sense":

Forest protection at the source of streams, proper agricultural methods in the valleys and foothills which would increase the absorption of water in the soil and prevent erosion, construction of storage reservoirs for flood regulation where these are required, levees and bank protection where this work is needed, outlets and spillways, and all other work bearing on the control of water should be harmonized into one great unifying system for each drainage basin.

The Mississippi Basin contains about 89,000,000 acres of forested or denuded land, which has little or no utility except in growing timber. No one can assert that the condition of this vast land surface, or the degree of care or of neglect it receives, has no bearing upon the flow of the Mississippi River.

As evidence of the estimation in which reforestation is held in other countries, I herewith append a summary of foreign legislation on the subject:

REFORESTATION IN OTHER COUNTRIES

Austria. For the regulation of the lower portions of the rivers $1,350,000 was appropriated at the same time, and of this sum $400,000 has been expended on reforestation. (Ibid., p. 22.)

Russia. Before the war over 100,000,000 acres of forests had been classed as protection forests, or forests which are indispensable to control of stream flow. (Ibid., p. 22.)

Japan. Has close to 2,000,000 acres of forests specifically designated to prevent denudation of soil and occurrence of floods, embracing some 353,000 separate forest areas. (Ibid., p. 23.)

Italy. In 1877 the first law for maintaining protection forests was passed. It was not, however, until the passage of a new law in 1910 that made obligatory upon communities and private owners reforestation of denuded areas in the mountains that rapid progress was made. (Ibid. p. 23.)

Spain. In 1908 a law was passed for the conservation in flood areas and in other places where the permanence of the forest is essential as a preventive against erosion and rapid surface run-off. (Ibid. p. 23.)

France, through bitter experience, has learned the lesson of forestation of mountains. Other countries, such as Palestine, Assyria, Arabia, Greece, Tunisia, Algeria, Italy, Spain, Persia, Siberia, Dalmatia, all bear the same evidence of deforestation. In 1860 France, after terrible floods of 1856 that ravaged the valleys of the Rhine, the Loire, the Rhone, the Garonne, and the Seine, and caused the loss of a great number of lives and did damage amounting to more than $38,600,000, passed the first law on the reforestation of the mountains. Since then and up to about 1913 some 500,000 acres have been acquired and more than one-half of the land has been planted. Already 163 of the mountain streams have been entirely controlled and 654 are beginning to show the controlling effects of the forests upon their watersheds. Thirty-one of the mountain streams now entirely controlled were considered hopelessly bad half a century ago. (From Floods, Forests, and the Future, published by the American Tree Association, p. 21.)

Three-fourths of the forests of Switzerland are regarded at the present time as protection forests; that is, they are located in the basins of torrents, where they serve to lessen the harmful effects of run-off. (Ibid. p. 22.)

FOREST RESERVES GOOD BUT NOT SUFFICIENT

In the United States we seem to have concentrated our attention mostly on the establishment of forest reserves with the aim of preserving the beauties of nature and conserving game. But that is not sufficient. A forest reserve is a beautiful thing, but its utilitarian value should not be forgotten. Forest reserves alone are not going to correct the flood satuation, but the Government should require a general percentage of forestation within the area of every navigable river's watershed; in other words, restore as nearly as possible the conditions that were found in this watershed in 1850.

THE NATION'S DUTY TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FISCAL RELATIONS

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, the pending appropriation bill for the District of Columbia brings up again the irritating question as to the proper distribution of the burden of the annual costs of maintenance between the Federal Government and the citizens of the District. Each year we are confronted with the same controversial question as to whether or not the $9,000,000, or lump-sum, contribution which the Federal Government has been making toward the carrying on of the municipal activities of the District is fair and equitable, and we are asked to decide whether the share of the respective parties should not be expressed in the form of a ratio, or percentage, as was formerly the practice.

It will be difficult for a hard-headed business man to see the difference between the two methods of apportionment. It is quite obvious that if the Senate and the House conferees could only agree on the proper amount that the Federal Government should contribute, it ought not to make any difference whether the contribution was expressed in dollars or as a percentage.

The real question then is the determination of the amount of the Federal contribution, which will be fair to the taxpayers of the United States as well as to the taxpayers of the District.

I think the proponents of both methods of apportionment will candidly admit that in our present state of darkness as to the many complicated factors entering into the solution of the problem, there is no possible way of extemporizing at this moment even a rough formula which will be even approximately accurate.

If the lump sum of $9,000,000 is guesswork, which even its proponents admit, the fixing of any arbitrary percentage or ratio is equally amenable to the same criticism.

I have alluded to the many and complicated factors which enter into the determination of the problem. As a beginning toward solution, we will assume that we must begin with a determination of the relative assessed valuation of Federal and of District taxpayers' property—that is, land and improvements:

Taxpayers' property	$1,137,000,000
District property (land and buildings)	50,000,000
Total District property	1,187,000,000
Federal property (land and buildings)	470,000,000
Total property to be used as basis	1,657,000,000

[NOTE.—There is an item of $75,000,000 of untaxed property in the District representing the assessed valuation of embassies, churches, schools, and charitable institutions, which, for the time being, will be omitted from the calculation, because of the difficulty of classification. The legations, for instance, it is obvious, should be classified under Federal responsibility, while the schools, churches, and charitable institutions are a distributable factor.]

Therefore, taking $1,657,000,000 as the basis of the calculation, we find that the Federal possessions in the District, to wit, $470,000,000, constitute 28.4 per cent of the whole, excluding the embassies, churches, schools, and charitable institutions. The classification of these in the Federal and District columns, respectively, would not materially affect the result.

From this preliminary calculation it is hard to escape the conclusion that, using it alone as a basis, the Federal Government, having 28 per cent of the total property ought to contribute an amount equal to 28 per cent of the current appropriation.

That, however, is going too fast. The figure $1,657,000,000 excludes the legations, churches, schools, and charitable institutions. Adding the appraised value of these we get $1,732,000,000 as the total of realty in the District of every class, of which $595,000,000, or over 34 per cent, is exempt from taxation.

Using this gross valuation as the basis of our calculations we find, if it were all taxed, it would raise $29,444,000. But we must take off the exempt property, $595,000,000. Deducting that we have $1,137,000,000, which is productive of revenue, upon which the District will collect $19,169,934. But, in addition to that, the District collects from other sources. The following is a complete summary of income:

To be raised by taxation in 1928

Real estate, $1,137,000,000	$19,169,934
Tangible property, $102,000,000	1,734,000
Intangible property, $440,000,000	2,200,000
Public utilities, corporations, bonds, building associations, $46,000,000 gross receipts on which tax is based	2,000,000
Fines, fees, permits, etc. (see p. 8, District finances)	2,800,000
Total estimated receipts for year 1928	27,903,934
Contribution of Federal Government	9,855,000
Total	37,758,934

Another factor in the calculation to be considered is property exempt from taxation:

Property in District exempt from taxation

Federal real estate, land and buildings	$470,000,000
District government lands and buildings	50,000,000
Legations, churches, schools, and charitable institutions	75,000,000
Total exempt	595,000,000

Then there is the factor as to the use of the property. There is a large amount of Federal property included in the above-mentioned sum of $470,000,000 of which the District has the entire or partial use.

My colleague, Mr. SIMMONS, the chairman of our subcommittee, put a table in the hearings—see page 1078—in which he included all the parks, museums, public squares, monuments, and bridges, and even the reservoir and pumping station, as if the people of the District had their exclusive use.

I venture to suggest that this is an unreasonable contention, and herewith submit a corrected list:

Corrected list United States property and improvements in the District of Columbia from which the Federal Government derives the primary use and benefit

Name assessed	Land	Improvements
State, remaining portion of Ellipse	$11,420,865
Monument Grounds	13,853,388
Agricultural Grounds	6,214,168	$1,831,400
Judiciary Square (courthouse)	3,455,060	1,700,000
Lafayette Square	10,620,750
United States of America	118,791
Rock Creek Park	1,000,864	500
Do	8,261,600
Smithsonian Institution	388,135	645,000
Red Cross Building		587,300
Pan American Building	1,075,555	867,000
Lincoln House	33,278	4,500
Post office (city)	1,052,826	3,000,000
Potomac Park	19,241,097
Do	14,453,208
Above Anacostia Bridge	572,787
Do	393,057
Highway Bridge		450,000
Zoo	1,108,770	207,000
Total	93,264,199	9,292,700
Improvements	9,292,700
Grand total	102,556,899

Which leaves only $55,113,000 of which the District, by any stretch of the imagination, can be said to derive the primary use and benefit.

If we calculate the tax on the total Federal property—$470,000,000—at the rate of $1.70 per hundred, we find the Federal Government ought to be liable for $7,990,000. But deducting the valuation of Federal property, of which the District has the primary use, to wit, $55,113,101—a very liberal allowance—we find the amount of Federal property for purely Federal uses to be $414,886,899, on which the tax would be about $7,055,000.

These figures are subject to modification, owing to the necessity of considering a number of factors too intricate to go into; but the net result would not be materially affected.

This result, however, is a far fly from the figure of $5,819,210, which our chairman estimates in his speeches to be the amount for which the Federal Government is liable.

If his figures are correct, then the Federal Government is making a present to the District each year of about $4,000,000; and if it were correct, I do not blame him for believing that the Federal Government is liberal enough.

If it is a present, or donation, what is it given for? Here is the crucial point requiring mature consideration. According to his contention, the donation is $4,000,000; according to mine it is only $2,000,000. Now, the question is: What is it for? All will concede that it is for the vague, intangible, and indefinite obligation which the Federal Government owes to the District as the site of the Capital of the Nation, in which all the taxpayers of the Nation have a pride as well as a sense of responsibility.

An exact scientific appraisal of this responsibility perhaps can never be arrived at. Perhaps, too, the taxpayers of the District are indifferent as to whether or not it is ever determined. The fact, however, that this difference in figures on property and tax estimate and the amount of Federal contribution exists, shows that something is lacking in present methods of apportionment.

With this review of the factors entering into the problem, let us look at the present situation.

Whether $9,000,000 as a lump-sum contribution is right or wrong, exact or inexact, the fact remains that the estimates of the present appropriation bill were figured out on the basis of that contribution. It amounts to about 29 per cent of the appropriation bill before us. To transform the $9,000,000 into a 29 per cent contribution would not affect the result. However, to raise the contribution to 33⅓ per cent or 40 per cent would raise the Federal contribution to such a sum as would create a surplus. The tax rate for the current year is already fixed at $1.70, so the surplus derived from the Federal Government under such a change would go into a blind pool of no advantage whatever to the taxpayers, at least for the current year.

However, that does not change the obvious conclusion that some method other than either the lump sum or the ratio basis should be adopted in the future to set at rest this irritating question.

On page 18 of the hearings will be found a table which shows that the percentage of the Federal contribution to the District expenditures covered in the annual District appropriation bills has been dropping steadily. The following is an abbreviated summary:

Table of contributions, 1922–1929

Fiscal year	Total appropriations	District of Columbia share	Final United States share	Per centage of final United States
1922	$22,977,411.07	$13,784,647.70	$8,780,298.48	38.212
1923	27,231,343.01	16,469,244.51	9,860,021.47	36.210
1924	20,505,454.41	12,424,349.78	7,220,977.19	35.210
1925	31,183,151.28	22,037,796.02	9,625,415.23	30.870
1926	31,189,730.38	22,189,638.38	9,729,744.50	31.195
1927	34,894,562.36	25,894,071.85	9,654,272.33	27.667
1928	33,873,899.35	24,872,874.00	9,906,025.35	29.240
1929	34,431,836.00	25,431,836.00	9,845,000.00	28.590

The drop from 38 per cent in 1922 to 29 per cent in 1929 is, no doubt, responsible for a part of the clamor against the lump-sum method of contribution. The chief objection to it is its aspect of permanency and absoluteness. Its effect is also felt inevitably in the making up of each year's estimates, its tendency being to cramp and retard development of the school, highway, and park programs.

I am of the opinion that the Federal contribution should not be limited or bound by an inexorable formula, either on a percentage or on a lump-sum basis, but should vary each year in accordance with the work to be accomplished, taking into consideration the ratio between strictly Federal and strictly District improvements, and also making allowance for the fact that this is the Capital of the Nation, in which every American takes a profound pride. And in arriving at a fair ratio the Congress of the United States should not take a small or picayune attitude, but do everything in its power to promote its development into the most beautiful capital of the world.

DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9495), disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9495), disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9495) to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. KETCHAM, and Mr. ASWELL.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Private Calendar beginning at the star.

JOHN GOLOMBIEWSKI

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7079) for the relief of John Golombiewski.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. I have had little time to look these bills over as the calendar came up unexpectedly. Is the gentleman from Illinois in charge of the bill?

Mr. RATHBONE. No; I am not. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] is in the hospital. I am familiar with the case.

Mr. HOOPER. Was this contest in good faith?

Mr. RATHBONE. Yes. Mr. Golombiewski was a Republican in a district strongly Democratic.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill or any bill of a similar nature. Under the rules of the House no money can be voted for a contestee or a contestant except with the certificate of the chairman of the committee that heard the case. There ought not to be any deviation from that and I object.

HORACE G. KNOWLES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 3325) an act for the relief of Horace G. Knowles.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, was this man confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. This case has been before Congress for many years, and it is through the insistence of the gentleman now addressing the House that the amount has been reduced. The department and all concerned seemed to think that Mr. Knowles was entitled to $7,000. I found that he came to Washington and loafed around here instead of going out and trying to get a job somewhere else. He was not obliged to stay here, but he thought the Government was going to pay him for waiting around.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was he under orders?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; but not to the extent he claimed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,296.49 to Horace G. Knowles as salary for the period of March 30, 1909, to December 22, 1909, during which period he was commissioned as a minister of the United States to Nicaragua and was all that whole period under instructions to await orders of the State Department.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 5, after the word "appropriated," add "and in full settlement against the Government"; in line 5, strike out the figures "$7,296.49" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,666.67"; in line 7, strike out "December 22" and insert "July 30."

The committee amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

E. L. F. AUFFURTH AND OTHERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5953) for the relief of E. L. F. Auffurth and others.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to take this occasion to throw a bouquet to myself. I am obliged to be away from the House this afternoon. This is the first time I have been absent when the business of the Committee on Claims was being considered. I am obliged to be absent because of a very important engagement. The calendar came up unexpectedly, and it is impossible for me to remain. I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: To E. L. F. Auffurth, the sum of $105.60; to Adrian M. Finney, the sum of $177.87; to Thomas C. Smith, the sum of $177.87; to Eugene J. Tremant, the sum of $177.87; to John L. Uhde, the sum of $177.87; to W. W. Van Court, the sum of $177.87; said sums representing salary lost by them during suspension while employees in the United States post office and customhouse at New Orleans, La.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the word "appropriated" in line 5 and insert in lieu as follows: "and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $105.60, to reimburse E. L. F. Auffurth for loss of salary while employed in the United States post office and customhouse at New Orleans, La."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WIDOW OF ALBERT F. SMITH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9213) granting relief to the widow of Albert F. Smith.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we have some information in respect to the bill. Was this man a deserter or what is there to it? There was something wrong with his military record. This is in effect a pension bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I get it from the record, this is what happened. The man enlisted on June 6, 1861. He was in an engagement and was taken prisoner. He was kept a prisoner of war until December, 1861, when he was paroled. I assume, of course, though I do not know, that under the conditions of the parole he could not enter back into the service again. After he was paroled and he reported to his military authorities, he was given a certificate of sick leave until September 28, 1862, and then he disappeared.

Mr. KNUTSON. What became of him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not know.

Mr. HUDSON. He is on the roll charged as a deserter.

Mr. KNUTSON. What became of him after he disappeared? Was he ever found again?

Mr. HUDSON. Yes; and the affidavits are in the record. The affidavits are from a number of citizens showing that he continued living at his home but was physically and mentally incapacitated for filling out any term of enlistment.

Mr. KNUTSON. This is in effect a pension bill, because it will confer upon the widow the same right that widows of regularly discharged soldiers have. I think we ought to have some further explanation.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I reported the bill. I can merely say that he was paroled home and the muster roll of his company showed a discharge at Providence in 1862.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When was he married? That is the important thing.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, there are several important things here besides his marriage, although that is important.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He is dead.

Mr. KNUTSON. Service has something to do with it.

Mr. GLYNN. I have no information as to when he was married.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to this.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ALFRED G. V. MELDAHL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4108) to correct the military record of Alfred G. V. Meldahl.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Alfred G. V. Meldahl, late of Company E, Twenty-second Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on November 28, 1902: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to this act.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have some explanation of this bill? This is another pension bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. KAHN], I think, can give some information on this bill.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this bill grants this man the status of an honorably discharged soldier, provided that no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act. He served one enlistment and was honorably discharged. Then he reenlisted again and was discharged as a private without honor because he had gotten into some trouble before his second discharge. He was discharged dishonorably on a general order that men who had had trouble should be discharged without honor. He came in under that order.

Mr. KNUTSON. When was his first enlistment?

Mrs. KAHN. He was discharged the first time on March 21, 1902. Then he reenlisted.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GEORGE PETTIT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9827) for the relief of George Pettit.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hate to be the one to object to this class of legislation and this type of bill, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that some of these bills are very rank. Every time this calendar is called bills are reported out that are rawer than ever. I do not think it is any compliment to the brave men who are already on the pension rolls for us to go ahead and pass these bills and clutter them up with a gang of deserters. I object to this bill and to several others along this line.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this soldier gave to the country more than two years of honest, loyal service. All of his comrades whom the gentleman is pleased to term the better soldiers of the Civil War have been on the pension rolls for years. This man unquestionably has but a few more years to live at the very best. He can not live more than five years. A pension has been withheld from him all of these years. In view of the fact that he has more than two years of honorable service, I think the gentleman ought not to object at this time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

JAMES SCOTT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11216) to correct the military record of James Scott.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LUCIUS K. OSTERHOUT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9995) for the relief of Lucius K. Osterhout.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to say that this is a case where the record will show that when the soldier enlisted, or a very short time thereafter, he was taken sick and remained sick practically the entire time of his service. This statement is supported by hospital records and evidence of every kind; and the fact that he is now 78 years old and can live only a few more years——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long did he serve in the Army? Was it not only one day?

Mr. McCLINTIC. No. He was in the Army about four or five months. Most of the time he was in the hospital. He was sick practically all the time. The committee viewed it this way, that inasmuch as he was ill practically all the time, when the end of hostilities came and the company moved off and left him, of course he did not realize the importance of trying to get an honorable discharge, and went on to his home.

I know this old fellow personally, although he does not live in my district at the present time. He lives up on Long Island. But I remember that every time we had any kind of celebration he always got out his fife and drum corps and marched at the head of the procession. He has lived an honorable life, and has always performed patriotic service in every good cause. Inasmuch as he is now old and was sick most of the time of his service it would seem to be only right to give him an honorable discharge and let him spend the rest of his days in peace.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WILLIAM CHILDERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4357) for the relief of William Childers.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I object.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I am sorry. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11951) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by the acts of March 6, 1920, and February 27, 1926.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can we get some information on this bill?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, this claimant is one of the contractors who suffered damage on account of the increase in the price of materials during and on account of the war. The gentleman will recall, of course, the contractors' bill which Congress passed, and under which damages were allowed or refunds made to a number of contractors who suffered loss by reason of this increase after their contracts were made. This company was a subcontractor on the Federal building at Nashville, Tenn. It claims damages to the extent of something like $1,790. I think that is the amount. The law under which these claims were filed limited the time for their receipt in the Treasury Department. This contractor, thinking that mailing the claim complied with the law, deposited the claim duly attested in the post office at Nashville, Tenn., the day before the time expired. It was received here by special delivery the morning after the time expired. This bill seeks only to give the contractor his day in court and permit him to prove his claims, just as the other contractors were allowed to do.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by the acts of March 6, 1920, and February 27, 1926, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that said act shall include the Tanksley-Drumright Stone Cut Co., subcontractor for the Norman-Kerr Co. in the construction of the additions to the post-office building at Nashville, Tenn., and as to said subcontractor numbered claims for reimbursement as provided by said act of August 25, 1919, as amended by the acts of March 6, 1920, and February 27, 1926, may be filed within three months after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to recommit was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

D. GEORGE SHORTEN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11960) for the relief of D. George Shorten.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection of the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was the postmaster under bond?

Mr. COLTON. Yes. But he had really been released, and after he was entirely out and without responsibility another man was appointed to take his place. He had left the town entirely at the time of the burglary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He was under bond. Has the bondsman made good the loss?

Mr. COLTON. I am not sure of that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The law requires a bondsman to be appointed. When a defalcation or robbery takes place the bondsman has to make good, and then the insurance companies come in and make a refund.

Mr. COLTON. No. That is not the point in this particular case. There is a technicality involved in this case. He was not really the postmaster, but they held him just the same, because the other man's bond had not been approved.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He suffered the loss of salary?

Mr. COLTON. Yes; and in fact he lost a good deal more than is provided in this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He had taken that up with the department?

Mr. COLTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to D. George Shorten, late postmaster at Storrs, Utah, the sum of $95.06, being the amount stolen by a burglar on March 30, 1922.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "and in full settlement against the Government."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MICHAEL MARLEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5223) for the relief of Michael Marley.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. I would like to see the gentleman withdraw his objection. Here is a man who served faithfully in the Philippine Islands and simply because of a little altercation between himself and a fellow soldier, who would not return a loan of $20, he is to be penalized, after three or more years of faithful service in the Philippines, and anyone who served in the Spanish-American War knows what that service means. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over and retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10042) to provide for the addition of the names of certain persons to the final roll of the Indians of the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to add to the final roll of the Indians of the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., approved January 22, 1920, under the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 591), and the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 9), the names of the following persons, descendants of the confederated Flathead Tribes of Indians; Joseph Russell Bird; Daniel Lawrence Pablo; Valerie Roullier; Henry Roullier, jr.; Julia Roullier; Laura Soucie; Blanche Soucie; Joseph Soucie; Julia Soucie; Rose Marie Soucie; and Audra Jane Martin. The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to pay each of the persons named a sum equal to that heretofore paid per capita to those whose names were upon the approved roll, and to allot each of these persons, except Audra Jane Martin, the same area of land allotted to children of the Flathead Reservation enrolled upon the final roll, such payments to be made from any tribal funds in the Treasury to the credit of the Flathead Indians, the allotments to be made from any available tribal unallotted lands of the Flathead Reservation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALLIE E. M'QUEEN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9789) for the relief of the Sallie E. McQueen and Janie McQueen Parker.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I am rather unfamiliar with this calendar and I would like to have the gentleman from Alabama make a brief explanation about the reason for this bill and the reason for issuing this patent.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker, the relief that is desired to be secured by this bill is this: To permit the parties named in the bill to purchase from the Government, they being the equitable owners of this land, as I may call them, these 80 acres which they have lived upon and claimed to own openly and notoriously and for which they have paid taxes ever since the year 1873. This land has been bought and sold ever since the last 56 years and the people believing that they owned it.

Mr. HOOPER. And it has been held continuously by these people?

Mr. BOWLING. It has been held continuously by these people for 56 years. I have the chain of title here. They are not asking for anything except that they be permitted to purchase the land from the Government at the price that was charged entrymen when the other land about it was entered.

Mr. HOOPER. I am wholly satisfied with the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue a patent to Sallie E. McQueen and Janie McQueen Parker for the west 80 acres of fractional section 1, township 18, range 18, St. Stephens meridian, lying south of the Coosa River in Elmore County, Ala., upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 6, after the figures "18" where they first occur, insert the word "north," and after the figures "18" where they next occur, insert the word "east."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM CHILDERS

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 377 (H. R. 4357), for the relief of William Childers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 377. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William Childers, formerly employed in quarring stone for use in connection with the Government Lock No. 1, on the Levisa Fork of the Big Sandy River, the sum of $3,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as full compensation for injury and consequent loss of the left eye sustained in the course of his employment and without negligence on his part.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 7, strike out the sign and figures "$3,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$840."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word "quarrying" in line 5.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIE G. CHAPMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9721) for the relief of Willie G. Chapman.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] on the floor?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to the bill.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that I am going to object because here is a man who admits he deserted in the midst of hostilities. He was sentenced to serve five years for desertion during hostilities and the bill has no merit.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman please, the conviction was not for desertion, it was for insubordination, and the sergeant who preferred the charges and who appeared as the prosecuting witness at the court-martial, has an affidavit in the record which states that the physical condition of this soldier brought about this condition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But if the gentleman please, granting all the gentleman says, he did avoid getting into combat.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Well, he was a sick man and was discharged because of physical disability, as the record shows.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AUGUST J. MACK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10472) to authorize the appointment of Master Sergeant August J. Mack as a warrant officer, United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] in charge of the bill?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes; the bill is one which I introduced myself.

Mr. HOOPER. And the gentleman is convinced there was a failure on the part of the mails to deliver the application of this man?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Absolutely. There were three applications received.

Mr. HOOPER. And were the men together?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. This man's application was sent by the commanding general two days before those of the other two who were appointed.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman from New York is satisfied as to the merits of this bill?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes; and there is no objection on the part of the War Department.

Mr. HOOPER. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of existing law, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to take the same action with respect to the application of Master Sergt. August J. Mack for appointment as a warrant officer, United States Army, that he could have taken had the application of Sergeant Mack not been delayed in the mail en route from China to Washington, D. C.; and if necessary, in order to accomplish this purpose, the number of warrant officers authorized by law for the Army is hereby increased by one.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARION BANTA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10067) for the relief of Marion Banta.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Marion Banta, of Carrollton, Carroll County, Ky., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $81.50, in full compensation for the amount of a check cashed and the proceeds thereof appropriated by the United States Government, which was given by said Marion Banta to guarantee the performance of a contract.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

M. M. EDWARDS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3936) for the relief of M. M. Edwards.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to M. M. Edwards, widow of Lieut. John Davis Edwards, chief engineer of the U. S. S. Shaw, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,401.50 for the loss of her husband's household goods and personal effects which were destroyed in the disaster to the U. S. S. Shaw, occurring on October 9, 1918, which destruction was due to collission with His Majesty's ship Aquitania.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "appropriated," insert "and in full settlement against the Government"; and in line 8 strike out "$1,401.50" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JESSE R. SHIVERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4396) for the relief of Jesse R. Shivers.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jesse R. Shivers, North Wildwood, N. J., the sum of $796.95, for damages sustained to motor boat L–659, in collision with U. S. Coast Guard patrol boat CG–110, February 9, 1926.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5, after the word "appropriated," add "and in full settlement against the Government."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

In line 6, strike out the figures "$796.95" and insert "$300."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the second committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the second committee amendment was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN P. STAFFORD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5322) for the relief of John P. Stafford.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROWBOTTOM] asked me to make an inquiry of the proponents of the bill, whether the postmaster was in any way negligent.

Mr. PARKS. This bill was introduced by my colleague [Mr. TILLMAN], who was called away on account of illness in his family. I think I can state the circumstances. I do not think the Government sustained any loss finally. These were revenue stamps that got into a waste basket and were burned by the action of the janitor.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROWBOTTOM] wanted me to inquire what was the delay in taking the inquiry?

Mr. PARKS. There was no very great delay; about a week.

Mr. HOOPER. The report says a month.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What troubles me is the relationship between the bondsman, the postmaster, and the Government in these cases. Have these sureties paid this loss?

Mr. PARKS. I understand the postmaster has made the loss good to the Government. I think he paid it to the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is not to relieve a surety?

Mr. PARKS. No.

Mr. HUDSON. The record says that the postmaster put the stamps in a safe in the national bank for safe-keeping; that the bank was not careful in guarding his interest as it should be, and that the clerk took the stamps, and they were burned up by the negligence of the janitor as waste paper. Now, they come back, notwithstanding the negligence on the part of the postmaster and the bank and ask reimbursement. Does not the record show that he took the stamps out of the bank and held them for a month before he made an inventory?

Mr. PARKS. Here is what occurred. He carried them to the national bank in an envelope that had become worn, and some of them dropped on the floor of the post office; they were put in the wastebasket by a janitor that could neither read nor write. The reason they believe that is that they found some of the stamps in the waste basket that were not destroyed. It was a month before they discovered the loss. They were revenue stamps and not postage stamps.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the stamps were never used then the Government suffered no loss. Did the postmaster pay for them in the settlement with the Government?

Mr. PARKS. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman will admit that the postmaster was negligent. We are passing bills constantly to relieve postmasters when they have not used ordinary common sense in safeguarding the property.

Mr. PARKS. I think the gentleman is too severe in his criticism in this case. I hope you will not object to doing justice to this man because of other cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not want to punish this man, but I hope we will adopt the policy of requiring good faith in the accounting officials to safeguard Government funds.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. In the case of some of these postmasters they are bonded, and their bonds cover the embezzlement of employees, over whom they have no jurisdiction. These employees are under the civil service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the bond covers these men, and they pay out of their own pockets.

Mr. SCHAFER. Not in all those cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $469.10 to John P. Stafford, former postmaster at Springdale, Ark., to reimburse him for the loss of war tax revenue stamps which were stolen, through no fault or carelessness on his part, from the aforesaid post office, and while serving as postmaster."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 13035) to amend section 641 of the act approved May 19, 1924, entitled "World War veterans' relief," providing for the payment of a certificate upon certain conditions, was erroneously referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. This refers to adjusted compensation over which the committee has no jurisdiction. I ask unanimous consent that it be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ELMER J. NEAD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8474) for the relief of Elmer J. Nead.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $277.35 to Elmer J. Nead, in full compensation against the Government for damages sustained as the result of an accident caused by a naval ambulance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOSE FRANCISCO RIVAS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8888) for the relief of Jose Francisco Rivas.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the House to the fact that this is a bill on a claim growing out of President Coolidge's and Secretary Kellogg's war with Nicaragua. It seems that two drunken marines, sent down there on the present expedition of occupation, brutally assaulted a pregnant Nicaraguan woman, her husband, and her child, so that they all had to have medical attention. Of course, it is obvious if the marines had not been down there, this outrage would not have occurred.

I think I ought to congratulate the Secretary of the Navy for the splendid and hard bargain that he has driven in this case. He has sent a bill up here approving the expenditure of $32.50 to pay for the medical attention of these three people and $6 for damages to the torn dress of the woman. In other words, "We are mending you up in the hospital, and patching your rags, and letting you go."

Also, there is a bit of irony in the report, which I think ought to be called to the attention of the House. Secretary Wilbur in his letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives printed in the report says:

The draft of the bill has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the Navy Department has been informed that its enactment will not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

I think it should also be noted that the introducer of this bill is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Claims, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL]. I am glad to see him committing himself this far in advance to the payment of millions of dollars that will come before his committee due to our unlawful occupation in Nicaragua. I have no objection to the passage of this very liberal measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $38.50 to reimburse Jose Francisco Rivas, a resident of Leon, in the Republic of Nicaragua, of which $32.50 is to reimburse the said Rivas for the cost of medical services rendered to said Rivas and his family and made necessary by an attack upon said Rivas, his wife, and child by two privates in the United States Marine Corps attached to the Marine Corps Expeditionary Brigade in Nicaragua on June 5, 1927, and $6 of which is to reimburse the said Jose Francisco Rivas for clothing of his wife damaged during said assault.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out lines 3 and 4 and insert: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 8, strike out "$38.50" and insert in lieu thereof "$138.50."

Mr. EDWARDS. Will this increase of $100 be in conflict with the President's financial program?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment for the sake of good international relations and for the good name of the United States. It is quite obvious in this case that a peaceful citizen of the Republic of Nicaragua, with which we are at peace, was assaulted by two United States marines. It is also obvious, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has suggested, that a hard bargain was struck to settle the damages sustained with these good citizens. To carry out what has been expressed so many times, that we are down in Nicaragua for peaceful purposes, that we are down there at the invitation of the Republic of Nicaragua, that we are down there to maintain law and order, I respectfully submit that when a thing so disorderly and so unlawful happens as occurred in this case, we should not be satisfied with simply reimbursing the actual medical expenses and to pay for this unfortunate woman's torn dress, the result of the assault, but should make adequate compensation for the humiliation and suffering sustained by these good people, citizens of the Republic of Nicaragua with which we are told we are at peace. If United States marines are down in Nicaragua to maintain law and order, let us set a good example, and instead of confining this payment to $6 for the dress and $32.50 for medical attention, make it $138.50, and send that amount down there with the apologies of the United States Government.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. In line with the gentleman's speech, it would seem to me more appropriate to make the amount $1,038.50.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. According to the measure of damages, I think $100 additional is sufficient.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would the gentleman be in favor of $1,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us make it $100.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ONA HARRINGTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2126) to provide for compensation for Ona Harrington for injuries received in an airplane accident.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to Ona Harrington, of Minonk, Ill., the sum of $667.40 as compensation for injuries received in an airplane accident in or near Kempton, Ill., on July 10, 1919.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert "and in full settlement against the Government."

The committee amendment was agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DR. PHILIP SURIANI

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3954) to reimburse Dr. Philip Suriani.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like the proponents of this bill to give us some information. It appears to be a rather far-reaching precedent, to reimburse or compensate a private dentist for dental services if we consider the facts in this case. I have no doubt but that a good many thousands, if not tens of thousands, of enlisted men in the Army would have just as valid claims.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that these military attachés must have good teeth to attend all the high teas. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will.

Mr. HOOPER. I do not know whether I can say anything that will change the gentleman's mind in this matter. I do not like to be in the position of getting up and having to speak in behalf of the bill, but the gentleman should realize that for a couple of sessions the committee has given these matters very careful attention. This Italian dentist has been waiting for months and years to get his money. The Government of the United States has recently been getting the reputation of being a poor debtor and a hard creditor. This is one of the cases where a service of this kind should be paid for.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman that I have a National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in my district, and there are thousands of cases where they can not get reimbursement under existing law. I do not see why this officer should be singled out from a large number of men whose claims have been rejected.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will.

Mr. LOWREY. I do not know of anybody connected with this case, but the situation was this: This officer was detailed in France and was later assigned to assist the United States military attaché at Rome, and the work was done at Rome. He was an attaché of the American Legation, and when he got to Rome the tooth, which had been treated elsewhere by an Army surgeon, became inflamed, and they found they had to go to the bone and scrape the bone, a very expensive treatment. He was an American officer out of reach of the American dentists, and the work had to be done.

Now, the trouble is that he is out of the service and they could not require him to pay the bill. The Italian dentist did the work for the attaché in the American service. The first work had been done by an Army dentist, and then this attaché was detailed to go elsewhere, and when he could not reach an Army dentist the previous treatment turned out to be ineffectual and the tooth abscessed and required troublesome treatment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman think this is an exceptional case on account of the international feature?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes. I think it would be very bad policy for this Government to allow a local physician in Rome to go unpaid for work done in good faith for an attaché when he understood it was Government work.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's statement I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Dr. Philip Suriani, of Rome, Italy, the sum of $422.33, for surgical dental work performed for Lieut. Morgan Heiskill, United States Army, assistant to the United States military attaché at Rome, during the period from March 16, 1919, to August 16, 1919, on the authority of the military attaché, there being no Army dental officer available, and said claim having been disallowed by the Auditor for the War Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MAUDE A. SANGER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4029) for the relief of Maude A. Sanger.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, because I think this is a splendid bill—I wonder if the gentleman who reports this bill has any information as to the number of those involved and whom this bill seeks to relieve? It seems to me we ought to pass general legislation to relieve this situation at once.

Mr. LOWREY. I do not remember about that, but there were very few.

Mr. FOSS. I understand there are no other cases.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that this is the only case?

Mr. FOSS. I think so. I made inquiry of the department and learned that if he had made a valid application and lived a day longer he would have come under the war-risk insurance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized and directed to pay to Maude A. Sanger, the mother of Paul E. Sanger, all such installments of money which she would be entitled to receive if the said Paul E. Sanger, who died on April 4, 1917, from injuries suffered in the military service of the United States, had made a valid application for war-risk insurance in the sum of $5,000 under the war risk insurance act, as amended, had named the said Maude A. Sanger as his beneficiary, and had died while such insurance was in effect. The first of such installments shall be paid within 90 days from the date of the enactment of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STAUNTON BRICK CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5341) for the relief of the Staunton Brick Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How is it that it is necessary to include in a special act compensation for damage caused by a diversion of coal for war purposes? Was not ample provision made in the various war settlement acts for such cases?

Mr. TUCKER. No. You will find that in the report of the secretary. The statement is that these parties should go to Congress for relief. I understand this claim was filed in September.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was this company's claim filed with the commission?

Mr. TUCKER. I think so.

Mr. LOWREY. I do not remember about that. The case was this: This brick company had a contract to make brick for erecting a building at the Virginia Military Institute during the war. They had the kiln ready to burn the brick and applied to the Coal Administration to allow them two cars of coal to burn these bricks. The Fuel Administration granted it and notified them that two cars of coal were shipped; one car came, they fired the kiln and went to work. But by the time they got through with that car of coal the other car had not come and never did come. It was found through the records of the Fuel Administration that the Government took it and shipped it to another place, caught it en route and shipped it to another place and thereby ruined their kiln of brick, because it was only half burned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What I can not understand is the authority of the department to settle claims against the Fuel Administration. The question in my mind is whether they filed their claim prior to 1921 and whether this claim was rejected.

Mr. LOWREY. It was never rejected, at least, I do not remember that detail of the case.

Mr. TUCKER. It was simply a claim that was not reached.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the claim was not reached and the time terminated, then, of course, they have some equity to come here, if that is the fact.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the Secretary of the Interior favorably reported on this bill? I do not see any report from any responsible Government agency in favor of this bill, and it seems that its enactment will establish a dangerous precedent. No doubt there were a great many factories and organizations during the war that did not get a car of coal just when they needed it. I shall ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TUCKER. If the gentleman will withhold that request for a moment, this case occupies, I think, a very peculiar and interesting position. If this brick company had ordered from the coal operators in West Virginia two carloads of coal to be brought to Staunton and the Government had diverted that coal under its war power we could not have complained, but this company went to the Government and asked if they could get that coal and the Government, through the Fuel Administrator, Mr. Jacob Yost, a very able and conscientious public servant, who occupied a seat upon this floor during two Congresses, a distinguished man; and, by the way, I bear upon my body many scars from his trenchant sword in two memorable contests for a seat in this body, this high official gave the brick company the right to order the coal; and he was the Government, and in carrying out the right which the Government gave them, the Government afterwards diverted one carload of coal and the kiln went to pieces.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But, if the gentleman from Virginia pleases, there is no question as to the facts. It is simply a question as to what happened to this claim. The coal was diverted on December 17; on January 10, 1918, a claim was filed with the State fuel administrator; then nothing is heard of it until July 6, 1926. The company filed a claim with the State fuel administrator, and properly so, on January 10, 1918, the loss having been sustained in the previous December; no action was taken on that, and then the first letter the War Department had about it was dated July 6, 1926. Either the company is guilty of laches or surely a sufficient and reasonable time of limitation has elapsed.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman knows that there were thousands of those claims piling up and this claim was never passed upon by the commission. It is certainly a very just claim.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If the gentleman will permit, it is a worthy claim. I was a member of the subcommittee and there is no question but what it is a just claim. The Government had complete control of the matter. They had a contract to make so many brick and required so much coal for it, and they had an order from the Fuel Administration for two carloads of coal.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was this brick company furnishing brick for the Government?

Mr. ALLGOOD. Yes; there was a Government school there.

Mr. TUCKER. It was a State school.

Mr. LOWREY. The Virginia Military Institute which, of course, was training military men at the time.

Mr. TUCKER. We are not asking anything except the actual cost of the brick.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of what the distinguished gentleman has stated I shall not object, although I have some doubt as to whether this is a proper bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Staunton Brick Co., Staunton, Va., the sum of $2,000 in full compensation for loss and damage suffered by the said Staunton Brick Co. by reason of the diversion of a car of coal for war purposes in December, 1917.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

M'ATEER SHIPBUILDING CO. (INC.)

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5935) for the relief of the McAteer Shipbuilding Co. (Inc.)

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this bill carries approval of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If the gentleman will read the last page of the report, he will find the statement made by Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, as follows:

The proposed legislation has been submitted to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, who advises that the proposed legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President. I therefore recommend favorable action on the bill submitted.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, does the Secretary of War recommend favorable action on the merits of the bill or simply because the Director of the Budget states it does not conflict with the financial program of the President? I do not think we should wholly rely on the opinion of the Director of the Budget. We are the legislative body and not the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will say to my friend that we always write to the department that had control of the matter resulting in the claim, in order that we may learn all facts the department may have, and give their recommendation in our report to the House.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the department recommended favorable action based on the merits of the case?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; and my subcommittee has held hearings and gone into the matter fully.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Government was sued for $254,000, and this is a settlement of the action which is now pending in court. It is based on the recommendation of the Department of Justice and the War Department.

Mr. HUDSON. The Attorney General has also passed on this favorably?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Attorney General and the Secretary of War have both approved it. It is a settlement of an action which is now in court and is an effort to save the Government $200,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; the amount involved is $254,000, and this is a settlement for $50,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000 in full settlement of all claims of the McAteer Shipbuilding Co. (Inc.), against the United States for losses and damages growing out of and suffered under a contract dated June 30, 1917, for the construction of the steamer El Aquario.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NORMAN P. IVES, JR.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 378, as I understand objection has been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 378. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman withhold that request a few moments?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I objected, Mr. Speaker, and I have withdrawn my objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will withhold his request, I will not object later on, but for the present I must object.

KENNETH A. ROTHARMEL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7496) for the relief of Kenneth A. Rotharmel.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Kenneth A. Rotharmel, of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook, and State of Illinois, the sum of $433.50, in full compensation for arrears of pay, including regular pay, foreign-service pay, and flying pay, during his military service under appointment and commission as a second lieutenant, aviation section, Signal Officers' Reserve Corps, from January 26, 1918, to April 4, 1918.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. I wish to say that since this bill was reported the claimant, Kenneth A. Rotharmel, has moved to New Orleans, La. I therefore offer the amendment that in lines 6 and 7 the words "of the city of Chicago, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois" be stricken out and in lieu thereof there be inserted "of the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana."

The Clerk read the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM J. TILSON

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider Calendar No. 455 (H. R. 12311), which is a bill to pay the salary of Judge William J. Tilson.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (Calendar No. 455, H. R. 12311) to provide for the payment of compensation to William J. Tilson. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 1761 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, William J. Tilson shall be paid the sum of $15,701.38 as compensation for services for the period from July 10, 1926, to March 17, 1928, during which time he held the office of United States district judge for the middle district of Georgia. There is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE STORY OF WEST VIRGINIA

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House, being a new Member of this body, and because of the fact that no legislation immediately touching the interests of my State, and especially of my immediate district, has been pending before this body, I have refrained thus far from asking the privileges of this floor. The time of my service, especially on the floor of the House, has been very profitable as well as enjoyable. I have acquainted myself somewhat with legislative procedure, and have made many very pleasant acquaintances, which I trust in time will ripen into friendships. But I believe the time has come when in duty to myself and my State, I should address myself to a matter that has long been upon my mind. Every citizen of this country should be jealous not only of his own reputation but should also be jealous of the reputation of his community, his State, and the whole country at large.

For a number of years there has been reflected in the columns of the press, especially in the cosmopolitan papers of the East, distorted and magnified pictures that grossly discredit West Virginia in the public mind. These pictures are mostly reflections of industrial strifes between operator and miner in the bituminous coal fields. These industrial strifes, often resulting in industrial war called "strikes," have not been confined to the coal fields of West Virginia, for they have been just as common, just as aggravated and ugly in all the other bituminous coal fields of the United States, yet, for some reason unknown to the people of West Virginia, it alone has suffered from the colored limelight of the jibes of the columnist and quipster, and oftentimes from ill-advised, mischievous, and groundless editorials.

I do not wish unduly to criticise the press, for I am loath to believe that it is ever intentionally unfriendly, but time and again the attention of the eastern press has been called to these libelous editorials and quips, by those of my State, who should have commanded respect and attention. I am persuaded that these wrong impressions grow out of the fact that the writers have not even attempted to fully acquaint themselves with the actual industrial, economic and social conditions of West Virginia, and certainly not with the character of its citizens, and have only observed it as a coal-producing State, and have assumed without warrant that its people are exploited by a few, and are always in a state of lawlessness and anarchy, where human life is held cheap. I shall not on this occasion attempt in any way to deal with these industrial strifes in our coal fields. It would not be wise for me to do so, as a Senate investigation is now on, and because it may be one of the "conflicting possibilities" that facts will be developed there and a means devised which will form a basis at least upon which to construct amicable relationships between these warring elements. Nor shall I discuss the differential railroad-rate question, which has recently been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and which has so seriously affected the coal interests of West Virginia, to its almost deadly hurt, because in discussing that, it would be necessary for me to deal with certain matters of law and fact as applied to interstate trade, which are now pending before the courts for decision, and which should at the present status of the controversy be left entirely to the courts for their determination.

Though perhaps, out of the findings of the investigating committee and the decrees of the courts, points of issue may be fixed which will serve as premises for legislative action, should legislation be found the only remedy for the industrial agitation which too frequently prevails in the bituminous-coal fields of the country, it is to be hoped that a long-suffering public can leave the coal industry to work out its own economic and industrial salvation without resort to legislation, for in such economic matters legislation should always be a last resort. But our citizenship, whether of the mine, factory, farm, business, or profession, is intensely anxious in having our State given the high standing in the public esteem to which it is so justly entitled.

If, in your mind's eye, you will turn to the map of the United States and find that State most irregular in shape of all others, lying between the twenty-ninth and thirty-sixth parallels of latitude and the seventy-sixth and eighty-third meridians of longitude, you will see West Virginia. For the reason that there is a narrow strip extending from the main body to the north between the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio and another to the east between Maryland and Virginia, it is called the "Panhandle State." The distance between Harpers Ferry at the extremity of the eastern panhandle and the mouth of the Big Sandy River, at Kenova, the extreme southwest, will measure 275 miles, and from the northern limits of the northern panhandle to the southern limits of the State measures 245 miles. West Virginia was long known as "The Little Mountain State," but by reference you will perceive that it is over three times the size of Massachusetts and twice the size of Maryland. It is no little State.

Its temperature, moisture, and vegetable life is modified by its latitude and the diversity of its altitude. Its topography is varied; from mountain plateau 5,000 feet above the level of the sea to the Cumberland Valley to the east at Harpers Ferry, 280 feet above the level, and to the Ohio River Valley to the southwest, at Kenova, 550 feet above the level. The most of its surface is broken by mountain range, hill, and small valley. Its interior is drained by innumerable small streams. The Potomac, flowing to the east; the Monongahela, flowing to the north, which joins the Allegheny, forming the Ohio at Pittsburgh; the Ohio, to the west; the Tug Fork and Big Sandy, to the southwest; the Great Kanawha, in the southern part of the State, flowing to the northwest into the Ohio; and the Little Kanawha, flowing to the northwest into the Ohio, are its most important rivers.

The total area of West Virginia is 24,715 square miles. Of this, 24,580 square miles, or 15,731,200 acres, are land, and 135 square miles is water surface.

The land for ages past was covered with forest indigenous to its climate—oak, maple, poplar, beech, walnut, chestnut, pine, cedar, and other valuable woods, and these great trees were underspread by laurel, holly, alder, redbud, persimmon, hazelnut, and others too numerous to mention. These woods were the habitat of the bear, the deer, the buffalo, and other wild animals, and also turkey and innumerable birds. Over 100 species of fish abounded in these waters. The clear mountain streams fairly glistened with rainbow trout; the brook and river of the lowlands swarmed in abundance with food fish, such as the wall-eyed pike, blue cat, mud cat, rock bass, white perch, and sucker. It was the hunting and fishing retreat of the Indian.

To these woods first came the white man early in the seventeenth century. The territory embraced in West Virginia was not entered by settlers until about 125 years after the settlement at Jamestown, Va. The first permanent resident, in what is now West Virginia, was a Welshman by the name of Morgan ap Morgan, who crossed the Potomac at the pack-horse ford from Pennsylvania and settled at Mill Creek, in Berkeley County, in the year 1727. In the same year he was followed by German families, who founded a little town, and named it New Mecklenburg, which is now Shepherdstown, in Jefferson County. Others very soon came into this section from Pennsylvania and across the mountains from Maryland and eastern Virginia.

In 1764 John and Samuel Pringle settled near the middle of the State, on the Buckhannon River, near the present city of Buckhannon; and John Simpson in the same year built his cabin where Clarksburg now stands. In 1768 Zackwell Morgan and others made permanent settlement in the northern part of the State, in what is now known as Morgantown.

In 1770 the Zane brothers staked their claims on Wheeling Creek, and very soon a fort was built called Fort Fincastle and later Fort Henry, where the city of Wheeling now flourishes.

In 1773 Walter Kelly brought his family from North Carolina and made his first settlement in the Great Kanawha Valley, in the southern part of the State.

But it must be remembered that practically up to the time of the Revolution the Indians maintained their rights to the territory embraced within West Augusta, and resented the encroachments of the white man upon their hunting ground. In 1744 the commissioners in Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland negotiated with the Six Nations at Lancaster, Pa., and there entered into a treaty and for a consideration of £400, or about $1,850, the Six Nations ceded to the English all the regions between the Alleghenies and the Ohio River. This treaty was not fully recognized by King George III, who ostensibly desired that the trans-Allegheny region should remain a hunting ground for the Indians, and so in 1763 he issued a proclamation forbidding the colonists to grant warrants, surveys, or patents in this territory until it could be opened by satisfactory treaties with the Indians, and two years later the King directed the Governors of Virginia and Pennsylvania to remove all settlers from this region by force. It is worthy of note that Virginia never attempted to execute the King's order. But in 1768 there was a treaty entered into a Fort Stanwix, near Rome, N. Y., between the Six Nations and the King of England, by which the Indians ceded to the King practically all of West Virginia except what is known as the Indian cession. This cession comprised about 4,950 square miles, lying north of the Little Kanawha River, which the Six Nations reserved.

This Stanwix treaty was strengthened in 1777 by a further treaty entered into by the southern Indians at Lochaber, extending the boundary lines to the Kentucky River, but many of the Indians never recognized the validity of any of these cessions, claiming that the treaties were without warrant or authority.

It is interesting to note that in 1771 Thomas Walpole, Benjamin Franklin, and others submitted a petition to the King for a grant of land, including a large part of the territory of western Virginia and the eastern part of Kentucky, proposing to form a colony under the name of Vandalia, with the capital located at the mouth of the Great Kanawha River, now Point Pleasant.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GUYER). Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. TUCKER. I have been greatly interested in the gentleman's speech. I recall the fact in connection with what the gentleman is now discussing, that the city of Staunton, my old home, was once the county seat of Pittsburgh, and that in 1770 or about that date a sturdy old justice of the peace of Pittsburgh attempted to deny the jurisdiction of Virginia in that section, and there was sent out from Winchester a company of soldiers with a drum and fife and they marched to Pittsburgh, during the winter, arrested the old man, brought him back, and put him in jail in Staunton.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is a very interesting incident.

I do not have the time to go into the history of what is known as the historic Fairfax land grant, which embraced all the counties of the eastern panhandle and a part of Tucker County of western Virginia, but the original grant from King Charles II bore date of 1681. It finally became the property of Lord Fairfax and in the year 1746 his surveyors completed the survey of this large grant and erected the famous Fairfax stone, being so far as chronicled the first monument marking land surveys in our State. The next year Lord Fairfax employed the boy surveyor, George Washington, to lay off a part of these lands in plats to suit purchasers, and he laid off more than 300 of the first farms of West Virginia, and they were soon sold to incoming home seekers.

But the Revolutionary War ended the King's authority, and grants from the Commonwealth of Virginia only were recognized thereafter, although former grants of the King were respected to some extent.

The first sale of land from Virginia noted in the records took place in 1779, and no titles can be traced before that time. But prior to that time, especially between 1764 and 1774, the settlers established titles by what was known as "tomahawk" rights. Many of the surveys made at that day were inaccurate and grants based on these surveys are the source of litigation even to the present time. Over the conflicting claims of the Indians and settlers there was continuous bloodshed. The Stanwix treaty in 1768 somewhat settled the bloody warfare, but, as has been stated, the great majority of the Indians refused to recognize the authority of the Six Nations to make this treaty. So war and bloodshed continued for many years thereafter.

But the power of the Indians was broken by the battle of Point Pleasant on October 10, 1774. The Virginians under the command of Gen. Andrew Lewis there met in decisive battle and defeated the allied forces of the confederated Indian tribes of the territory west of the Ohio River under the command of the noted Shawnee, Chief Cornstalk. This ended the last organized military effort of the Indians to wrest their cherished hunting ground from the intruding paleface.

The growth of population within the borders of the territory of West Virginia from 1800 to the present day is intensely interesting, but I can do no more than call your attention to the fact that the First Census of 1790 showed a population within its borders of 55,873, and the increase by leaps and bounds by the influx of settlers from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas especially brought the population in 1860, just before the admission of the State into the Union, to 376,880. In 1920 the census showed a population of 1,463,700, and in 1927 a fair estimate will show a population of 1,601,130. Of these people I shall deal more fully in discussing their political, social, and industrial relationships.

The political history of West Virginia is of peculiar interest. The first settlements were embraced in what was then designated Orange County, Va., which had been formed from the county of Spotsylvania in 1734, and which extended to the "utmost limits of Virginia," and included in its far reaches what is now West Virginia, Ohio, and Illinois.

In 1776 all of western Virginia and Pennsylvania to the west of the Alleghenies, with indefinite boundaries, was known as West Augusta, and claimed by Virginia. This claim in part was disputed by Pennsylvania, and the dispute was settled in the year 1781 by a temporary survey of what is now known as the Mason-Dixon line, and this was soon followed by the completion of the survey of the western boundary of Pennsylvania northward from the Mason-Dixon line to Lake Erie in 1785 and 1786. This latter line and the line northward to where it intersects the Ohio River has since constituted the boundary lines of West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Civil government followed close upon the entry of the pioneer in West Virginia, and counties were established by the Assembly of Virginia as necessities required. The first establishment of civil government within the domain of western Virginia was in the eastern panhandle, then within the jurisdiction of Spotsylvania County, and then in the Greenbrier Valley, within the bounds of what was then Augusta County.

Of the 55 counties of the State of West Virginia, 50 were created by Virginia before the division of the State. Hampshire County was established in 1754 from parts of Frederick and Augusta Counties; Berkeley was established in 1772 from a part of Frederick County; Monongalia in 1776 from the "district of West Augusta"; Greenbrier in 1777 from the parts of Montgomery and Botetort Counties. And after population increased and settlements extended, civil government followed and other counties were created. The counties of Grant, Mineral, Lincoln, Summers, and Mingo have been organized and created since the formation of the State. And now, as I have stated, there are 55 counties.

The State of West Virginia is a child of the Civil War. When Virginia voted to secede from the United States a great majority of the inhabitants west of the Alleghenies and of a few counties in the northern part of eastern Virginia were loyal and refused to acquiesce to the will of the majority of Virginia in its secession movement and desired to remain in the Union. The agitation over slavery had been waged for many years, and the majority of the people of Virginia as well as other slave States had maintained the constitutional construction that the United States was a confederacy of States, and maintained the right of a sovereign State to secede from the Union at its pleasure, and many of the people, especially of that part of Virginia east of the Alleghenies, insisted for many years that conditions might arise over the question of the extension of slavery wherein Virginia as a State would secede.

But a large majority of the people in western Virginia were opposed to secession, and Daniel Webster echoed that opposition in his great speech at the laying of the addition to the Capitol in Washington, in 1851, when he called to the men of western Virginia, who occupied the slope from the Alleghenies to the Ohio and Kentucky, and said in thunderous tones:

> What man can suppose that you would remain a part and parcel of Virginia a month after Virginia had ceased to be part and parcel of the United States?

It was but 10 years after Webster made this significant utterance that the crisis came. South Carolina seceded. Governor Letcher, of Virginia, called an extra session of the Assembly of Virginia to determine "calmly and wisely what ought to be done." This session met January 7, 1861, and ordered an election to be held to choose delegates to a convention to determine the policy of Virginia. In most of the counties of western Virginia public meetings were held and resolutions of protest passed against the holding of any such convention as was called by Governor Letcher. But the delegates were elected and the convention convened February 13, 1861, in the city of Richmond. Special commissioners from Georgia and South Carolina attended this convention and urged secession. In the meantime Fort Sumter fell April 14, and on April 17 Governor Wise, in a dramatic speech, holding his watch in his hand and with a pistol lying in front of him, with his hair bristling and his eyes glaring with excitement, urged the passage of the ordinance of secession, and the vote stood 88 in favor to 55 against. The vote of the members from western Virginia stood 32 in favor to 11 against, 4 not voting. This resolution, known as the Ordinance of Secession, was submitted to the voters of the State at a regular election to be taken May 23, but neither side awaited this election, for civil war was in its incipiency. The secessionists seized the arsenal at Harpers Ferry and the unionists of western Virginia embraced the opportunity to hold Virginia in the Union, looking to a separation.

John S. Carlisle, of Clarksburg, assumed leadership, and a meeting was held at Clarksburg, near the center of the State, on April 22, 1861, and resolutions were adopted at that meeting recommending that each county of northwestern Virginia should send at least five delegates to Wheeling on May 13 to determine action. This meeting at Wheeling convened in "mass convention" and agreed upon the necessity of separation from Virginia, and upon the formation of a new State. Carlisle was for immediate formation of this new State. Another leader, more conservative, Waitman T. Willey, of Morgantown, was opposed to immediate action and suggested deliberation. Francis H. Pierpont, of Fairmont, offered a proposition that in the event that the ordinance of secession should be ratified on May 23, as submitted by the Virginia Assembly, an election should be held in western Virginia to select delegates to a new convention to reorganize the Virginia government. This second Wheeling convention, under the Pierpont resolution, convened, and 77 representatives from 39 counties assembled at Wheeling on June 11. The question of immediate formation of a new State out of the counties represented was again presented, but the majority of the convention supported the proposition to reorganize the Virginia government out of the loyal counties of Virginia. The advantage of this was seen in that the unionists would then control a State already organized and functioning. The convention declared—all ordinances, acts, orders, resolutions, and other proceedings of the Richmond convention illegal, inoperative, null, and void.

The convention provided for a general election to fill all of the offices of the Government and elected Francis H. Pierpont governor; Daniel Polsley lieutenant governor, and James S. Wheat attorney general.

The first legislature under the reorganized government met at Wheeling on July 1, 1861, completed the organization of government, filled the offices, and elected Waitman T. Willey and John S. Carlisle as United States Senators as of the Virginia government.

On May 13, 1862, this legislature of the restored government gave by ordinance formal consent of Virginia to the erection of a new State out of her territory, which then consisted of 48 counties of northwestern Virginia, and there was provision made for three more counties—Jefferson, Berkeley, and Frederick. Jefferson and Berkeley accepted the proposition and came in, but Frederick never voted on the proposition.

A constitutional convention was called and met in Wheeling on November 26, 1861. The new constitution as framed by the Wheeling convention was adopted by vote of the people on April 4, 1862, which was followed as was heretofore stated, on May 13, by the legislature giving its formal consent to the formation of a new State.

Senator Willey on May 29, representing the reorganized State of Virginia in the United States Senate, in a speech, presented to that body West Virginia's petition for admission to the Union, with the consent resolution of the Legislature of the reorganized State of Virginia. On June 13 following the Senate Committee on Territories favorably reported the bill for admission. The resolution admitting the State was passed by the Senate on July 14, 1862, but its passage was opposed by John S. Carlile because he favored the inclusion of a number of counties of Virginia to the east of the Alleghenies. On December 10 following the resolution passed the House. On December 31 President Lincoln signed the resolution. There were certain provisions required in the resolution for gradual emancipation of slaves to be engrafted into the new State constitution before the State would be finally admitted. So the constitutional convention reconvened on March 26, 1863, and engrafted this amendment to the constitution as previously reported, and the constitution as amended was ratified by the people by a vote of 23,321 to 472, and on April 20, 1863, President Lincoln issued his proclamation by which West Virginia became the thirty-fifth State of the Union on June 20, 1863.

On August 4 the legislature of the new State met in Wheeling and elected Waitman T. Willey and Peter G. Van Winkle as its first United States Senators, and formed three congressional districts, from which Representatives to the House were duly elected.

The political proceedings severing Virginia and the admission of West Virginia into the Union were justified as necessary measures growing out of the exigencies of war, and though extreme bitterness was engendered time has long since removed it and now we are one people, with the same traditions and the same memorials, in which we glory, and the most friendly relationship, both socially and economically, exists between the people east and west of the mountains. The fact is there are no mountains now between Virginians and West Virginians.

The strategical military as well as political situation of western Virginia was perceived by the leaders of both the North and the South in the very beginning of hostilities, and armed forces were dispatched within its borders as quickly as they could be mobilized and equipped. McClellan and Lee were given command of the respective armies, and McClellan took personal command of the forces in the Tygarts Valley. The first battle of the war was fought near the center of the State at Philippi, soon followed by a more decisive battle not many miles away at Rich Mountain, near Beverly, and then the whole State was in the throes of horrible warfare, for this was border territory, and father fought against son and brother against brother in a death struggle, and so the newborn State had its baptism of blood.

When the pioneer settler came he hacked a path to his cabin door, and then made the cross path to the cabin home of his often-distant neighbor. But gradually he widened the path to a road for the sled, and then the wagon.

The first permanent graded road construction was brought about perhaps more by the necessity of communication between the settlers of Ohio and the more thickly populated eastern shore, and this demand for permanent highways brought about the construction of what was known as the National Cumberland Road, which extended from Washington to Wheeling and was opened in 1818. The St. James River and Kanawha Turnpike, between Lewisburg and Charleston, was completed in 1827.

The Staunton and Parkersburg Turnpike, running through the central part of the State, from Staunton across to Parkersburg, was completed in 1849.

What is known as the Northwestern Turnpike, extending from Winchester, Va., to Parkersburg, on the Ohio, was completed to Parkersburg in 1838. But all these routes had been marked out and roads opened and traveled from the pioneer days.

West Virginia only a few years ago recognized the necessity of improving its network of roads, and so established a pretentious State road system. The State, looking forward to hard-surfaced roads, voted to issue bonds to the amount of $50,000,000. This sum has been augmented as provided by law by reissues and sale of additional bonds as the original bonds fell due and were redeemed and supplemented by local road taxes, local bond issues, and by liberal Federal aid. So that the result is at the present time we have a network of improved State roads which contemplates the connection of every county seat in the State with hard-surfaced thoroughfares.

The three great highways referred to above are now hard surfaced and designed and known as the National Highway from east to west through Wheeling; the Northwestern Turnpike from east to west, beginning at Winchester, Va., through Grafton and Clarksburg to Parkersburg; and the Midland Trail, connecting with the Lee Highway and extending through the Great Kanawha Valley to Charleston and on to Huntington; each one of these thoroughfares crossing the Ohio River, connecting with thoroughfares on to the West.

Then the system further comprises three parallel thoroughfares through the State from north to south. We have thousands of miles of improved highways, including lateral roads, 1,000 miles of which are now hard surfaced, with many more miles of hard surfacing now under contract.

We have the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, which was completed from Harpers Ferry to Wheeling in 1853, and the Grafton branch to Parkersburg in 1857; the Chesapeake & Ohio, running through the southern part of the State, which was completed in 1873; the Norfolk & Western in the southern part of the State, completed in about the year 1900; and with numerous other lateral roads, the whole comprising a network of 4,038 miles of steam railways. There are 422 miles of electric railways.

The Ohio River within the western border of the State, and the Big Sandy and Tug Fork in the southwestern part, and the Great and Little Kanawhas in the central part, and the Monongahela River in the northern part are locked and navigable the year around. So every section of the State is given transportation facilities to a degree that promises enlarged and extended production of its unlimited resources.

We have a network of telegraph and telephone lines in West Virginia, the last report giving the number of telephones in the offices and homes of our people as 142,100. Practically every rural home has its telephone.

From the very beginning the church and the school were recognized as the handmaidens of the pioneer settlers. No sooner than a neighborhood or village was planted the preacher and teacher there began their beneficent work. The itinerant preacher taught spiritual truths in the cabin, home, and the rude log church, and each village and settlement had its school. The first mention of a schoolhouse in West Virginia is contained in an entry in the journal of George Washington. In the year 1747, while surveying the Lord Fairfax land on the upper Potomac and in the South Branch, Capon, and Patterson Creek Valley, on August 18 of that year, the journal recites that he surveyed a tract of land beginning at a corner in "the schoolhouse old field." This is the only mention, and the location is not now known.

The first school of which we have definite knowledge was in the South Branch Valley. A man by the name of Shrock began teaching in a cabin at Romney in 1753.

The first school law that affected western Virginia was enacted by the General Assembly of Virginia on September 26, 1796. It was called the aldermanic school law, which contained the following preamble:

> Whereas it appeareth that the great advantages which civilized and polished nations appear to enjoy beyond the savage and barbarous nations of the world are principally derived from the invention and use of letters, by means whereof the knowledge and experience of past days are recorded and transmitted, so that man, availing himself in succession of the accumulated wisdom and discoveries of his predecessors, is enabled more successfully to pursue and improve not only those acts which contribute to the support, convenience, and ornament of life, but those also which tend to illumine and ennoble his understanding and his nature.

In 1817 there was an act passed applying the proceeds of what is designated as a literary fund to "the education of the poor." Free schools for the indigent children in the several counties were maintained, and on October 1, 1833, of the 22 counties of western Virginia which reported, there were 655 of these schools in operation and the attendance numbered 5,874.

On March 5, 1846, another important law was passed by the general assembly which made but little improvement over the law preceding it. As the law was then only for indigent children, those who were able to pay tuition fees were required to do so. These old field schools continued until an act was passed March 5, 1846, which was prompted by a desire for something better, and a district public-school system was then established by a vote of two-thirds of the votes cast in the Commonwealth. This was the first gesture in Virginia toward a free-school system.

Higher schools of learning were early established. First an academy at Shepherdstown; then the Randolph Academy at Clarksburg in 1787; the Charlestown Academy, in Jefferson County, in 1797; the Brooke Academy at Wellsburg, in Brooke County, in 1797; Mount Carmel School, Preston County, in 1781; Lewisburg Academy, in Greenbrier County, in 1812; Monongalia Academy at Morgantown in 1814; and then followed the establishment of a great number of others, and the people wonderfully benefited by these schools and education flourished generally to a remarkable degree.

The first constitution adopted at the formation of West Virginia recognized the necessity of an ample free-school system and made provisions for it, and the legislature early extended these provisions into a wise and meritorious system. Gradually ignorance was dispelled, and now we have a school system that is comparable with the best in the country anywhere.

We have 226 high schools in the State with an attendance of 34,864; 170 junior high schools, attendance 22,379; we have elementary schools, four rooms or more, 600; three rooms or more, 350; two rooms, 880; one room, 4,937; making a total number of school buildings in the State of 7,063 and a grand total attendance in all these public schools as follows:

One hundred and eighty-five thousand nine hundred and eighty-five white boys, 182,094 white girls, with a total of 368,079 white children; 11,460 colored boys, 12,513 colored girls, with a total of 23,973 colored children; making a grand total of 392,052 children attending the public schools.

The State has a total number of high-school teachers of 2,575 and a total of elementary teachers of 12,062, making a total of 14,637 men and women employed in the profession of teaching in the high and primary schools.

We have a great university at Morgantown on the Monongahela River. We have six State normal schools. We have a great number of well-endowed denominational colleges and private institutions of learning. There are two standard colleges maintained for the colored race, one the West Virginia Collegiate Institute, located at Institute, Kanawha County, with an attendance of 268 males and 285 females; total, 553; and another, the Bluefield Institute, located at Bluefield, with an attendance of 85 males and 183 females, making a total of 268. In these colored institutes there are 342 students in the collegiate department. In the State there is expended nearly $25,000,000 for school purposes annually. The State schools of West Virginia are all co-educational. The races in the school system are segregated, but the funds are fairly and equitably allocated between these races, and each is well schooled.

The per cent of illiteracy in the State is low. In 1920 the per cent of illiteracy for children of 10 years and over is as follows:

White, native, male, 5.2 per cent; female, 4.4 per cent; average, 4.8 per cent. Foreign, male, 1.5 per cent; female, 1.6 per cent; average, 1.5 per cent. Colored, male, 16.9 per cent; female, 13.3 per cent; average, 15.3 per cent. The average of all classes is 6.4 per cent.

In 1910 the average illiteracy of all classes was 12.9 per cent, and in 1920, the average being only 6.4 per cent, there was a reduction in the 10 years of 6.5 per cent. The reduction in the last 5 years will make a marked decrease in illiteracy from the 1920 showing.

I should add that the State conducts penal institutions in the nature of schools. The Industrial School for Boys is at Pruntytown; the Home for Girls is at Salem. The State feels that the school system of West Virginia has become a challenge to the best school systems anywhere.

I especially take pride in referring to the school advantages in what is strictly the coal-mining sections of West Virginia, in the southern part of the State. In the center of every coal-mining operation there are not only standard primary schools but standard junior and senior high schools conducted, where the operators supplement the teacher's salary as raised by district levies and State funds, by large donations, and only college graduates are employed to teach in the high schools. The school buildings are modern and capacious in structure and well equipped. The schools, both primary and high, are always well attended by the miners' sons and daughters.

The student body of these schools is made up of different nationalities. It was my pleasure to entertain a basket-ball team from one of these high schools two or three years ago in my home, the personnel of which was miners' sons, and was made up of at least four nationalities, and finer specimens of virile young manhood, I assure you, I have never met.

They were intelligent and refined young gentlemen who would be a credit to any community. This particular high school had the reputation at that time that every one of its graduates, except one, had passed from high school into a college. In the northern part of the State the coal fields are in sections of diversified industry, and the children of the miners are just as well schooled as they are in the southern part of the State. I assure you that in the near future illiteracy among the children of this generation in my State will be almost nil, unless there be an influx of ignorance from the outside.

But these schools and institutions of learning have to do mainly with the cultural side of life, dealing with the head alone. About 15 years ago those engaged in the agricultural extension work, with the rural uplift in view, started what is known as the 4-H club work among the farm boys and girls, in which the work-a-day was equally emphasized with the cultural, using the fourfold life program as embedded in the heart, head, health, and hand program. There are now in the State more than 3,000 trained leaders, with 811 registered 4-H clubs, extending into all but 3 of the 55 counties, with a membership of over 13,000 boys and girls. The Federal and State Budgets provide funds for the purpose of training leadership in only corn and pig raising. This leaves the training largely volunteer in the clubs, or by allocations from other fields of educational work. But the thing in this particular program of fourfold training which gives most pride to West Virginia is that it was the first State in the Union to establish a State leaders' training 4–H camp. A few years ago the State purchased 93 acres of the old Jackson homestead on the West Fork River, a few miles below Weston, where the immortal Stonewall Jackson spent his boyhood days, and dedicated the tract as a 4–H State camp. There are now over 30 buildings constructed on this historic ground—a large assembly hall, mess rooms, and many cottages, a concrete swimming pool, and so forth. Hundreds of the boys and girls of the State assemble here by arrangement through the summer months under most careful, competent, and conscientious leaders and receive instructions along intensely practical lines of the heart, head, health, and hand. I can best describe the plan, purpose, and success of this training in the words of Mr. William H. Kendrick, assistant director in charge of the 4–H camp at Jacksons Mill. This is what he says:

> The bringing out of our 4–H program, which signifies work and taking the best there is in all the other programs and adding it to the project work of the 4–H club, is the thing that has made West Virginia 4–H club work famous. It is truly the most equally balanced youth program in the United States, and after working at it for five years we have the fourfold life chart that gives the boy and girl the picture of themselves as they really are compared with what it is possible for them to be. At this point we have made use of the national motto, which is, "To make the best better." Each member tries to be his best self. After working at this type of program for about five years the expression has come out that 4–H development is the program of work and the project is the expressed activity of that work. All the boys and girls who are in the 4–H club work hold that membership by doing one of the projects and the way he does the project is the reflection of the kind of boy or girl he is.

The hope of all this is a remolding and fashioning of the rural youth of the State, and creating within them a self and community consciousness and opening to them a vision of the dignity and worthwhileness of agricultural pursuits, which will grip them and hold them on the farm.

Our people early recognized the immeasurable worth of the press as a great educational factor and so began the publication of newspapers in cities and smaller towns, and now there are published 31 dailies, 125 weeklies, and 16 monthlies, and these, with the cosmopolitan papers and magazines, through the medium of general and rural free deliveries, with the thousands of telephones and radios, daily bring the thought and news of the world to every home.

Among the early settlers for many years the product of the farm was meager and was consumed at home, for it was a fight for the mere sufficiencies to preserve life, and the little trade existing was purely local and was in the nature of barter, and money was of no practical use, but as the years passed by the farms enlarged and there began to be a surplus of product, especially of cattle and hogs, and this surplus stock was driven across the mountains and usually found a ready market in Richmond and Baltimore. Money then began to circulate as a medium of exchange. Then came the construction of the railroads and great highways and the locking of the rivers, when the markets of the world were opened for the products of our vast natural resources.

Lumber was the first product of value, and was in demand not only for consumption in the States, but millions of feet annually were supplied to the export trade. Almost immediately after the extension of transportation facilities into the great coal areas capital followed and opened mines and coal came to the front as the chief product of traffic and trade. At this day, while the coal is but scratched, the virgin forests are almost exhausted. But there is promise in this: West Virginia soil, even unaided by man, will by nature reforest in something like 30 years, and if these woods continue to be conserved by wise and beneficent laws lumber will continue to be a source of wealth for the generations to come.

But I have for the moment digressed. Let us return to agricultural matters.

At the time of the admission of West Virginia into the Union 80 per cent of the inhabitants were engaged in agriculture and stock raising. At the present time it is not so important in a relative commercial sense as it was at that time. The census of 1925 shows that there were 90,380 farms in the State and that there were 89,666 farmers, with a farm-land area of 15,374,080 acres. It can be truthfully said that there is more bluegrass in West Virginia than there is in the State of Kentucky, and Kentucky is called the Bluegrass State. Even the hills, especially in the central and northern part of West Virginia, grow grass to their very summits. So stock raising, especially of cattle and sheep, is emphasized. Thousands of horses, cattle, sheep, and goats are produced. The cattle and sheep not only contribute to our home markets, but contribute largely to a growing export trade.

The total value of all purely agricultural crops reported in 1920 was $96,537,000. These crops consisted mainly of corn, hay, and tobacco.

In 1925 the livestock on the farms was valued at $39,318,735. Of this, you will note that the cattle were valued at $17,706,639 and sheep at $3,855,648. The chickens numbered 4,349,406, with a value of $4,164,255; the value of eggs produced in 1924 was $6,975,982.

The wool from the sheep in 1924 amounted to 2,118,096 pounds, and the value of the wool was $900,201.

It is very noticeable in the last few years that the farmer is placing more emphasis on the business of dairying, and it gives promise of becoming one of his most profitable activities in the very near future.

While corn, oats, wheat, and other small grains yield profitable crops, yet much of the soil is especially adapted to the growing of berries and vegetables. Potatoes and tobacco are dependable crops of great commercial promise.

Fruit growing is the chief activity of horticulture. The northern and eastern panhandles and certain sections of the Ohio Valley are the orchardists' paradise. The apples, peaches, pears, and other fruits in these orchard sections are of peculiar delicious flavor, which give them an attractive, extended, and limitless market. It has been satisfactorily demonstrated that practically the whole State is well adapted to fruit growing, and every farm has its orchards of well-assorted fruits. The capital invested in fruit growing is of large proportions. The census of 1924 shows 1,361,390 apple trees of nonbearing age and 5,480,350 trees of bearing age, and that there were harvested that year—1924—6,895,824 bushels of apples, and there were 1,788,502 peach trees of all ages, from which was harvested 901,413 bushels of peaches. The greater part of this fruit was shipped beyond the bounds of the State to supply the markets of the eastern cities and across the seas. While fruit growing is now of large and pretentious proportions, yet it is only in its beginnings, because the highway transportation will make possible commercial orchards in many sections of the interior, which heretofore such orchards could not be made profitable because of the inaccessibility of transportation facilities.

West Virginia ranks sixth in the United States in the steel works and rolling-mill industry. It ranks first in the United States in the production of glass and glassware. The census of manufactures of West Virginia in 1923 reported 1,487 industrial establishments, with 85,661 employees, earning $109,926,819 in wages, and the production of the labor was $489,508,462. Of this, the production of the 17 steel works and rolling mills in the State was valued at $99,151,369, and of the glass and glassware the value of the product was $50,211,232; pottery, including porcelain, $10,535,436.

The value of lumber produced was $38,726,959, and the value of paper and wood pulp was $6,707,495.

The bituminous-coal field in West Virginia covers a vast area of 17,280 square miles, or 24,720,461 acres, and is estimated as being one-thirteenth of the total coal area of the United States. This commercial coal is found in every one of the 55 counties of West Virginia, except the counties of Monroe, Hardy, Pendleton, Hampshire, Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson. It will be noted that all of these counties lie to the east of what is known as the Appalachian field, but in some of these counties are certain deposits which belong to the Mauch Chunk series and appear to be of rather an inferior quality, and for that reason is not marketable to any appreciable extent. All these coals lie in practically horizontal strata of 63 workable seams of from 3 to 12 feet in thickness, but not all found in the same localities. Those seams above the water levels are known as drift veins, and those below are designated as slope or shaft veins.

Coal production is the leading activity in the State and ranks first in production of bituminous coal. Pennsylvania led for many years, but for the first time last year West Virginia's production exceeded that of Pennsylvania's by many thousand tons.

There are 88,003 coal-mining operatives in the State. Of these, 87,728 are male and 275 female. The production of 1927 was 151,680,000 tons.

Up until very recent years coal was only considered valuable practically from the standpoint of heat unit alone, so its only by-product of commercial value was confined to what is generally known as coke; but of recent years the chemist has discovered that the lump of coal contains certain fuel gases, coal tar, ammonia, and other by-products of far greater commercial value than the heat unit. So, coking as a distinct industry is losing cast in so far as coal is coked separately in what is known as the bee-hive oven, but this coking coal is transported from mine to the place of consumption of coke, and there mixed with highly volatile coals in by-product ovens, and in them, not only the coke but the other by-products, now almost marvelous in number and value, are saved. The day is not far distant, if not already here, when the use of coal for heating purposes alone will be almost a crime in profligate wastefulness.

West Virginians are awake to all potentialities of commercial values in the chemical properties of coal, oil, and gas, as well as of other minerals found within its bounds, and as the chemist finds, capital invests in production and distribution as demand for the product arises.

Another great source of commercial mineral wealth of my State is petroleum and natural gas. Petroleum was first known in the United States on the shores of Seneca Lake in the State of New York, where small quantities collected and called Seneca oil was used by Indians and settlers as liniment for rheumatism, sprains, bruises, etc. It was first discovered in West Virginia in the Great Kanawha Valley, above Charleston.

The boring or drilling of salt wells began about 1807, and continued for more than 50 years. Nearly all of these wells contained a little petroleum which was permitted to flow over and spread upon the waters of the Great Kanawha, which gave the river the familiar nickname of "Old Greasy." It had no value and was considered a great nuisance.

In the year 1826, Dr. Samuel P. Hildreth, of Marietta, Ohio, in an article in Silliman's Journal of Science, refers to petroleum as being in demand for lamps. Later Jesse Hughes and William Lowther found oil at the waters of Hughes River, and collected about 100 barrels per year, and put it in the market as a medicine. This was the beginning of the commercial oil business in West Virginia. The first natural gas was struck in the State in a salt well drilled by Capt. James Wilson, within the limits of Charleston, in 1815, and in 1841 William Thompkins, in boring a salt well, struck a large flow of gas and used it for his furnace in the manufacture of salt, which, it is claimed, was the first use of gas for fuel for manufacturing purposes in the United States.

Oil and gas is now produced in West Virginia in immense quantities; and the gas product especially is transported by a great network of pipe lines to both domestic and industrial centers of West Virginia and the surrounding States. Millions of dollars are invested in oil and gas developments and transportation, refineries, and manufactures of by-products. The commercial value of our oil and gas products runs into millions of dollars each year.

There is little iron manufactured in the State, but vast beds of iron ore remain untouched for lack of available transportation facilities.

One of the growing industries that should not be overlooked is the manufacture of cement. This industry is now in its comparative infancy, but is of great promise.

There is no more accurate measurement of a community's economic activities than the measure of its banking institutions. West Virginia has 217 State banks and trust companies. The last report contains a record extending from 1891, when 49 banks reported a total deposit of $48,330,896.96. The last fiscal year reported the 217 banks as having deposits to the amount of $196,124,549.14. The net income of these State banks and trust companies for the year total $3,025,740.62. There are 120 national banks, with deposits at the present time of $146,390,900, making a total of bank deposits in the State of $342,514,449. I am unable to give the sum total of the net incomes, as I do not have the income data of the national banks, but as a matter of course, national bank incomes will compare favorably with our State banks.

The assessed valuation of all properties in West Virginia, which are subject to ad valorem taxation in 1927, was $2,130,255,951. The total revenues collected by the State was $20,758,241. Of these revenues, $3,161,803 arose from the sale of gasoline alone.

The future development and economic welfare of West Virginia is, to my mind, peculiarly a question of transportation. I have referred to the network of railroads, highways, and of river transportation as it exists at the present time. Improved water transportation is absolutely necessary to the further development of the vast natural and industrial resources, especially of the Great Kanawha River Valley area, where over 30 different coal seams are now being extensively mined on a commercial basis. But recently a favorable report has been made by General Jadwin, of the Department of Engineers, recommending additional locks on the Kanawha River, giving a 9-foot water stage, extending into this great coal field and industrial area, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has very graciously recommended the construction of two locks as a beginning of this necessary improvement, and legislation and appropriations will be asked of this House in the very near future to carry out these recommendations.

I assure you that the business and industrial interests of the Great Kanawha Valley of West Virginia are not knocking at the door of this Congress as mendicants, but come offering to contribute the products of mine, shop, factory, and plant of vast and valuable preportions for transport beyond the confines of State to supply the demands of our own country and to seek the markets of the world. The striking measure of this contribution to traffic and trade is shown in the past by the fact that exclusive of the outstanding values which relate to the production of coal, oil, and gas, but taking into consideration only the manufacturing industries of the Great Kanawha Valley in the area immediately affected by slackwater transportation, the annual pay roll of its plants is over $10,000,000, and the value of its yearly products is over $40,000,000. The question in your mind very naturally is as to whether or not this section as to transportation is not already sufficiently served by the great railways. Only the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Virginian will be affected to any great extent.

I recognize the fact that the problem of adjustment as to competition between carriers is most delicate in its nature. Healthy competitive transportation is much to be desired by a business community, but excessive competition in the carrying trade cripples the service of the carrier and is destructive of the very life of business in all its ramifications. But in this particular case, of the improvement of the Great Kanawha by modern locks and dams by which the water levels will be raised to a 9-foot stage, thereby facilitating water transportation, you will not be met by opposition of the great railroads of that section, but rather, as I am told by those of authority and who should know, the railroads see in this improved waterway an increase rather than a diminution of freight carriage, and that the increased facilities for water transportation will rather open new markets for coal and other products than bring the river into competition with the roads in the carriage to the present or their prospective terminals and markets.

When the time comes for the action of this House upon a measure with a view to the improvement of the Kanawha, I hope to then address myself more in detail as to the Great Kanawha area as a storehouse of potential economic energy and commercial wealth not only for the days but for the centuries to come. Part of my district, which I have the honor and pleasure to represent, is underlaid by some of the most valuable workable coal seams in the world, and which will be materially affected by the prospective waterway improvement of the Great Kanawha, so in pressing the importance of this improvement not only to the locality itself but to the country at large I am but serving my own constituency in the sense that I am seeking from this body means by which my constituency may have opportunity to more fully develop their dormant beds of valuable coal and extend their contribution and enjoy life more abundantly in the rewards of their labor and enterprise.

West Virginia has its settings in romance and history. Every hillside and valley has its bewitching legend of love and valor when the red man roamed the forest. Blennerhasset Island in the Ohio River, just below Parkersburg, through its association with Aaron Burr and the Blennerhassets in their ambitious dream of empire, is truly an isle of romance and thrilling story. Harpers Ferry, where the beautiful Shenandoah mingles its waters with the majestic Potomac, recalls to mind the frenzied rising and tragic end of John Brown's raid, which stirred the smouldering fires of sectional animosities until they flamed into internecine war. Philippi, where the first battle of the rebellion was fought. Point Pleasant, where the forces of Lewis and Chief Cornstalk met in bloody struggle.

There are many other places of national, romantic, and historical interest, but I can not take the time now to point them out. I have taken too much of your valuable time already, but as I have called your attention to the potentialities of West Virginia's natural resources and industrial and other economic activities, and given you somewhat in detail an insight into the State's history, cultural life, and business affairs generally, will you for a moment bear with me that I may call your attention to a notable contribution of men and women to not only the Nation, but to the far-distant realms of the world. I submit to you that it is a contribution worth while.

I shall gather the names of some of these distinguished sons from Virgil A. Lewis's Hand Book of West Virginia, to which I am indebted in the preparation of this address for valuable data, especially as to historic matter. I will only attempt to give you a few of the many:

Berkeley County gave to Ohio four governors—two native born and two of her sons by adoption—among the best that State ever had. These were Edward Tiffin, Thomas Worthington, Robert Lucas, and James Morrow. Randolph County gave to Alabama Reuben Chapman, one among the best governors that State ever had. Monroe County gave to Kansas a distinguished governor, James M. Harvey. The new State of North Dakota is indebted to West Virginia for a most able chief executive—Hon. Joseph M. Devine. Fayette County gave birth to James T. Farley, who from there went to the Pacific coast to become a prominent United States Senator from California. Iowa, too, recognizes West Virginia as the State of the nativity of Jonathan Prentiss Dolliver, who so ably represented her in the United States Senate. Gen. Stonewall Jackson first saw the light in Clarksburg, but was reared at Jacksons Mill, near Weston, now famed as the State's 4–H camp, which I have heretofore referred to in detail. And further, when President McKinley desired to communicate with General Garcia in the mountains of Cuba, Lieut. Andrew Summers Rowan, a Monroe County, W. Va., boy was selected for the hazardous mission, and the world knows the story of carrying the message to Garcia. Major General Miles said: "In my judgment, Lieutenant Rowan performed an act of heroism and cool daring that has rarely been equaled in the annals of warfare."

In March, 1899, the most destructive hurricane that ever swept the South Pacific Ocean passed over the Samoan Islands and in the little harbor of Apia 6 warships and 10 other vessels were dashed to pieces on the rocky coast. One hundred and forty-two officers and men of the American and German navies went down to death. Lieut. R. M. G. Brown, a Preston County, W. Va., boy, was in command of the U. S. cruiser Trenton. Rudderless and sailless she, too, was drifting to her doom upon the rocks when Lieutenant Brown sent 400 men into the rigging, thus forming a human sail, and the vessel passed the reef to the open waters. Thus was she saved from destruction and the 450 souls on board from death in a surging sea.

It was Capt. French Enzer Chadwick, a Monongalia County boy—a native of Morgantown—who so bravely commanded the flagship New York that historic day when the Spanish fleet went down at Santiago, and he and his co-commanders won more than did Nelson at Trafalgar—won more than a "peerage and a grave in Westminster Abbey"—they won a place in the hearts of the great American people.

And may I mention a few of the names of noted men whom some of you will recall, who remained within our own borders and whose bodies now sleep beneath our own soil? William L. Wilson, of Charles Town, once a scholarly and distinguished Member of this House, and afterwards Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Cleveland; Nathan B. Goff, of Clarksburg, once a Member of this House, later Secretary of the Navy, then a Federal judge, and later a United States Senator—a long life of distinguished service to his country. Henry G. Davis, of Elkins, a farseeing pioneer in railroad building and in industrial development. He was a candidate for Vice President on the Democratic ticket with William J. Bryan, and served his State with great credit in the Senate Chamber. Johnson N. Camden, of Parkersburg, another farseeing pioneer in internal development of natural resources and railroad building, and he too served his State in the United States Senate with credit.

It is but proper because of his notable service to his State and country that I should speak of an adopted son, the Hon. Stephen B. Elkins, of the city to which he gave his name. He was associated with his distinguished father-in-law, Hon. Henry G. Davis, in the great industrial and transportation developments of the State in the past half century. He also served his State in the United States Senate with great distinction and left his imprint upon important legislation of the country.

And among those who are yet in the "pulsing, throbbing world" I shall name but three distinguished sons, Melville Davisson Post, who was born near Clarksburg, who has well earned fame as a short-story writer, John W. Davis, born and reared in Clarksburg, once ambassador to the court of St. James, president of the American Bar Association, Democratic nominee for the Presidency, and now the leading lawyer of the United States, and another whose name is indelibly written in the annals of American history, President Woodrow Wilson's Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, born and reared to manhood at Martinsburg, in the eastern panhandle.

Of the women of our State thus far, their greatest honor is that they have rocked the cradles and given inspiration in the homes. But there is one woman who first saw the light in a cabin in a sequestered valley in Berkeley County whose name will always be remembered and cherished in motherhood. Heaven gave to this woman, Nancy Hanks Lincoln, the crowning honor of American motherhood in the mothering of the man of the ages, Abraham Lincoln.

I trust that West Virginia may soon be seen in a more favorable light, but I know that impressions of a community or a people, once fixed, are not easily changed or removed. So I am asking you to visit the State in person during your summer vacation and see for yourselves. Come by rail or trail. In our business communities you will be astonished and surprised to be shown such a pretentious number of the world's largest industrial plants located in the different sections of the State. I shall name them, lest you overlook them:

Proprietary Remedies Co., Wheeling.
Electrical porcelain plant, Parkersburg.
Sanitary pottery, Mannington.
Stogie factory, Wheeling.
Clothespin factory, Richwood.
Shovel factory, Parkersburg.
Sheet-glass factory, Charleston.
Tannery, Richwood.
Iron furnace, Weirton.
Chinaware plant, Newell.
Vitrolite plant, Parkersburg.
Hosiery mills, Martinsburg.
Axe factory, Charleston.
Natural-gas gasoline plant, Hastings.
Bottle factory, Fairmont.
Iron-nail factory, Wheeling.
Toy-marble factory, Clarksburg.
Thermos-bottle plant, Huntington.
Mono-metal plant, Huntington.

And notably, at Morgantown is located the only pressed prism-glass factory in the world, which supplies a large per cent of the auto headlights used in America.

At the capital city you will see the wings of the capitol which is now being built at a cost of over $5,000,000; and then take the highways and enjoy the scenic beauty of river and valley, the magnificence of hill and plateau, and the sublime grandeur of the rugged mountain, and in this panorama of bewildering beauty you will in nowise wonder why West Virginia has long been called the "Switzerland of America." You will rest for a time at the famous Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs, the Nation's playground, and at Berkeley Springs, where Washington with his family was wont to retreat for their summers.

You will not fail to turn aside to the Old Sweet Sulphur Springs, and the Capon Springs; the Salt Sulphur Springs in Monroe County, and Webster Springs near the center of the State, and with it all meet the people, enjoy their fine hospitality, and you will come away when the vacation ends, I am sure, with enlarged impressions of West Virginia, as not only nature's storehouse of potential energy, but also of diversity of its product of mine, field, furnace, and factory, and of its people both in vocational and social life, I am sure that your visit will prove a surprised revelation, and a lasting pleasure will be your remembrance. [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order Richard B. Barnitz, late captain, United States Army, before a retiring board for the purpose of a hearing of his case and to inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of his disability, and to find and report the cause which, in its judgment, has produced his incapacity, and whether such cause is an incident of the service, according to the statute, and that upon the findings of such board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Richard B. Barnitz, a captain, the grade which he had at the time of his resignation, and to place him on the retired list of the Army: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance during the period between the time that he resigned and the time of the passage of this act shall become due and payable by virtue of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FRED A. KNAUF

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6254) for the relief of Fred A. Knauf.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there ojection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object. This is another post office bill. We have several on the calendar. Under the law postmasters are required to file a bond saving the Government against all loss; notwithstanding that, in comes bill after bill relieving postmasters, when as a matter of fact it is really to relieve the bonding company who have received a premium.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, the Government of the United States is paying the bond and the premium. If we pass this bill the bonding company has received the premium and gives nothing in return.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it escapes liability.

Mr. SCHAFER. This is not a case in the class to which the gentleman refers. The bonding company did not bond the postmaster to protect him in the case of burglary but only for embezzlement or the misuse of funds. No bonding company is concerned in this case. The department has gone into this bill thoroughly and the committee of which I am a member has carefully considered it. The postmaster had to keep a large stock of stamps on hand by order of the Post Office Department. There is no negligence on the part of the postmaster, and the report shows that there is not; and it is not a bill in the class to which the gentleman from New York refers. The bond of the postmaster did not cover burglary, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to object to this bill, but inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] reported the bill, knowing the faithfulness with which he considers all legislation, I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have carefully considered this bill. It is a Wisconsin post-office burglary case, but it is not in my district. I think it is a very meritorious measure.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state positively that there is no insurance covering loss by burglary?

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. A portion of the fund was covered, but that has been cut out of the bill by these amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. How much is it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. One hundred and forty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. A mere bagatelle, of course, for the State of Wisconsin, but a considerable sum for any other State.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is not covered by any bond.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Only a small portion, but that has been cut out of the bill.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time to substitute the Senate bill, S. 1758, which has been passed by the Senate and is identical with H. R. 6254.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we have not arrived at that state as yet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill I desire to say that an identical bill was introduced in the last session of Congress and was passed by the House. The bill was not reached in the Senate, however, because it was so near the end of the session. At this session I introduced the identical bill passed last session by the House, and in the Senate the same bill was introduced.

The Senate has passed the bill this session. The Post Office Department recommends the passage of this bill and the committee likewise recommends its passage. No blame attaches to the postmaster whatever. There was but one objection when this bill came up on the calendar before; the objection was by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and I understand that he has since withdrawn his objection and will not now object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are several bills of like character on the calendar, I expect to take this matter up with the Post Office Department and find out just how far the Government is protected by these surety bonds. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to have this bill and the other bills when we come to them go over without prejudice.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is aware that the bond that the postmaster gives does not cover burglary, or anything of that kind, is he not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state that positively?

Mr. DOWELL. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But there is a question about it, and there is a division among the members of the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Absolutely not.

Mr. DOWELL. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. SCHAFER. The postmaster's bond does not cover any part of the amount provided in this bill. I agree with the gentleman from New York in his contention as to relieving surety companies on postmasters' bonds in certain instances. I carefully look into every one of these bills that come before our committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We can let the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman insists, of course, we can not stop him. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. KADING. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] will withdraw his objection. We do not know when this bill will be reached again and the gentleman has had ample time to do his investigating as this bill has been on the Calendar ever since early in the session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] on this bill. A similar bill passed this House at the last session of Congress. There is no provision in the bond which the postmaster furnishes which makes the bonding company liable for burglary loss. An identical bill has unanimously passed the Senate at this session. However, if the gentleman from New York desires to defeat this bill, he will have to follow his own course. I sincerely hope that the gentleman will withdraw his request that the bill be passed over.

Mr. LEAVITT. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall object to the request of the gentleman from New York that the bill go over without prejudice. I think the bill should be passed now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will just delay the House on the bills that are to come.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object. This bill should be considered and passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER. This requires three objections. The Chair hears no other objection, and the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill, S. 1758.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to substituting the Senate bill for the House bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Fred A. Knauf, postmaster at Sheboygan, Wis., in the sum of $141,433.82 (said sum consisting of $107 cash, $76,703.62 salable postage stamps, $64,575.20 precanceled stamps, one war-savings stamp of the value of $5, and war-tax revenue funds to the amount of $43), on account of money, war-savings stamp, and postage stamps stolen from safes in the post office at said city when burglarized on October 17, 1925.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do this simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that it is now appropriating $141,433, and very few Members on the floor know the facts involved. There is a difference of opinion existing among members of the committee that reported this bill as to the liability of the bonding company. Several gentlemen have urged that this bill be considered and passed at this time. But I respectfully invite the attention of the Members to the fact that in a very few moments you will find other bills of a similar character called up, in which the gentlemen who now urge the consideration of this bill are interested.

The question here is one of broad policy, whether or not every loss that occurs in a post office will be made good by this House, regardless of the facts and the circumstances or the law. The postmasters are required to furnish surety bonds. They pay for these surety bonds out of their own salaries. The law requires it, and the moment the loss is incurred the surety company gets the postmaster or his Congressman to come here and ask to be reimbursed. If that is to be your policy, if burglary is not covered by proper insurance, then we ought to pass a law requiring post offices to be covered by that kind of insurance, and thereby we would be saved millions of dollars every year.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If that proposition were before us it would be another question. If that character of bond had been given there would be no question as to the correctness of the position assumed by the gentleman from New York. But I think the gentleman, by the slightest sort of inquiry, will find that the bond required of the postmaster does not cover this case at all, and that this is squarely a loss, and there is no recovery from the bond.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Assuming that "the gentleman from New York" is in error as to the law, will the gentleman say in this case that it was burglary? Suppose it was larceny. Would that be covered by the bond?

Mr. DOWELL. Anything that occurred through his office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely.

Mr. DOWELL. But not through a case of burglary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KADING] give us the facts?

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I will say in reply to that that I have not the report of the Post Office Department or of the committee before me, but those reports cover the matter fully. A great deal of what was taken here consisted of canceled stamps, and I want to say that the report of the department is quite complete.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I respectfully submit that the very answer now given by the sponsor of this bill, by the gentleman who put in the bill and now calls it up, justifies my position.

Mr. KADING. Let me finish my statement. I am positive that there is no relief for the postmaster other than that provided by this bill; the same relief that Congress has granted in previous similar matters.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can do no more than to attempt to protect the Treasury and call the attention of the House to the contents of the bill. The rule requires three objections. If the gentlemen want to appropriate this $141,433 and the additional money carried by following bills that come before the House in a few moments, I can not do anything else but record my objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume the gentleman from New York wants to be fair; but he made the statement that the postmasters get the Members of Congress to introduce these bills.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. The record shows, if the gentleman from New York pleases, that this matter is sent to the Congress in a letter directed to the Speaker by the Postmaster General in pursuance to an act of Congress requiring that these matters come before Congress for decision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman should not understand me as saying that Members of Congress introduce these bills of their own motion, but I desire to state definitely and unequivocally that there are too many of these reimbursement bills coming in.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman said they were coming at the instance of the bonding companies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A great many cases are inspired and asked for by the bonding companies.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like, while I have the floor, to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the House has already this afternoon, without objection, passed some of these bills. There has been no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana is recognized.

Mr. LEAVITT. I think a few words should be said from the standpoint of the Committee on Claims regarding its attitude on these bills. The gentleman knows there is no committee of the House that gives more complete and careful consideration to all bills than does the Committee on Claims. Instead of its being a committee from which Members can easily secure favorable action and favorable reports on bills which they introduce, it is one of the most difficult committees from which to secure action and favorable reports.

In this particular case the evidence is complete that there was a burglary. A window was broken open, a burglar went into the basement of the Federal building, held up the night watchman with a revolver at his head, bound him hand and foot, gagged him, and left him. Then the robbery took place. Now, this is merely a question of whether or not the postmaster under those circumstances shall be held personally responsible for the loss of that money and those supplies, or whether the Postmaster General shall be authorized to credit his accounts and let the Government of the United States itself take the loss, which is the loss of the Government and not the loss of the postmaster himself in all justice.

The Government of the United States does not place insurance even on its Federal buildings. It takes the losses. It is not like an ordinary business concern, but is ready to carry its own losses whatever they may be. It does not carry, in bonds taken out by the postmasters and other Federal officials, insurance against burglary and losses of that kind, but takes a bond from postmasters requiring them to carry on the duties of their offices with full faithfulness.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have just talked with the Solicitor of the Post Office Department, and he tells me the bonds do cover if negligence is shown, but if not under the law, if the amount is under $10,000, they relieve the postmaster, only however where they find it was through no fault of his the money was stolen. In all other cases there is a reference to Congress and it is for Congress to determine whether the postmaster will be relieved or not.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman is practically accurate in his statement. They do have authority under the present law to give relief, on their own initiative, up to a certain amount, but when it goes over that amount they require an act of Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words. I believe our colleague the distinguished gentleman from New York objected to this bill without realizing all of the facts and circumstances relating to it. A similar bill was considered by the Claims Committee of the House in the last session of Congress and passed on the Consent Calendar. Even the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is now speaking, the distinguished gentleman from New York, and the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] had no objection to the bill at that time. An identical bill has passed the Senate at this session.

There are no provisions of law whereby postmasters' bondsmen can be held liable for burglary losses, incurred through no negligence of the postmaster. The report from the Post Office Department, which is embodied in the committee report, clearly shows that there was no negligence on the part of the postmaster at Sheboygan, Wis.

It appears that this post office was broken into by a well-organized gang of post-office burglars, who used an acetylene torch to open the vault wherein these Government funds and stamps were located.

If you will look at the report from the Post Office Department, appearing on page 9 of the committee report, you will find the following language:

> The Sheboygan office is exceptionally well conducted and the records are always current and reliable, so that the loss sustained was very readily arrived at. A record of the daily sales is kept and also a perpetual inventory is maintained. These records have always been found up to date and correct. The figures representing the loss sustained were verified by Postmaster Knauf and also by Assistant Postmaster Fontaine.

You will also find from the statement of the post-office inspectors, as embodied in the committee report, facts indicating that a large supply of stamps was kept on hand by the postmaster because he was following an order of the Postmaster General with reference to keeping certain stocks on hand.

There is not one scintilla of evidence, fact, or law which would substantiate allegations made on the floor of this House that this bill is for the relief of the postmaster's bondsmen. If this bill directly or indirectly relieved those who had bonded the postmaster I would have submitted a minority report from the Claims Committee in opposition to the bill.

I hope the gentleman from New York will permit the gentleman from Wisconsin to substitute the Senate bill so that the final enactment of this justifiable legislation can be hastened.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1758 may be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1758 may be considered in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

LAWTON (OKLA.) FIRE, 1917

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4084), for the relief of the persons suffering loss on account of the Lawton (Okla.) fire, in 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $75,000 to the persons whose names appear below, as compensation in full for loss of property destroyed by the fire on September 24, 1917, in the city of Lawton, Okla., such loss having been the result of the inability of the fire department of the city of Lawton to control said fire because of lack of water, all available water for fire-fighting purposes having been appropriated and being used by the War Department in connection with the training of soldiers at Fort Sill and Camp Doniphan: Date Crabtree, $1,132; H. D. Ingraham, $33,682.57; Anna Beaver, $1,800; W. Garven, $1,000; Mrs. C. E. Bear, $7,750; Joe Jacobson, $3,000; Dr. L. C. Knee, $3,000; S. J. Coffey, $1,413.18; C. J. Aurell, $406.75; J. G. Mitchell, $3,077.88; John H. Ledgerwood, $200; E. L. Shanklin and E. L. Kelley, $1,550; Julia N. Burns, $1,208; Hannah Beaver, $700; Mary E. Wooten, $3,150; Charles Fuson and J. E. Fuson, $3,850; Ada Hammond and O. W. Northrup, $2,419.72; Annabel Young, $1,775.35; Lee N. Wallis, $1,000; Mrs. E. C. Swisher, $959; D. D. Dean, $317; C. R. Simpson, $2,850.15: Provided, That before any of said claims are allowed and paid the Comptroller General of the United States shall make an investigation of each of said claims to determine the extent and amount of such loss and damage, and such claims shall be adjusted in amounts not in excess of the amounts set out herein and upon certificates issued to each said claimant by the said Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope there will be no objection to the very meritorious measure before the House for consideration at this time.

If you gentlemen were all as familiar with the circumstances which caused the introduction of the pending measure as I am, I feel sure none of you would oppose our bill for a moment.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] with reference to the bill we have just voted on wherein he stated that the bill then under consideration had the unanimous support of members of the Claims Committee. May I be permitted to add, in this connection, that the measure now before us which proposes to relieve and reimburse, in a small way, a few of the good citizens of the splendid city of Lawton for their losses sustained by the terrible fire of 1917 which visited that city, also has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Claims.

If you gentlemen will take the time to read the splendid report of that committee, you will agree with me that no more meritorious measure has been considered to-day, nor during this session as to that matter, than the pending bill. You will find that these good citizens come to us with clean hands, that they are not at fault in any possible way for their great loss, but the fault does lie primarily and absolutely with representatives of our Government. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, and fellow Members, that this Government wants to be fair and pay what it justly owes, and it certainly owes these good people more than any of them are asking for, which debt it should have paid many years ago.

The facts as brought out by the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims shows that on September 11, 1917, Maj. Gen. W. M. Wright, in charge of headquarters Thirty-fifth Division, stated in a communication to the city council of Lawton that arrangements had been made with respect to the water supply at Camp Doniphan and an agreement reached between the Government and the city of Lawton whereby that city gave to Camp Doniphan the entire water supply during certain hours and that the military authorities agreed to keep a water guard at the junction where water was to be diverted from the main pipe running to the city of Lawton in case of fire.

Many of you recall the terrible conflagration that broke out in the city of Lawton back in 1917, and how the city was absolutely helpless, because of lack of water which the camp was using. The committee report, which I have just referred to, shows, gentlemen, that the military authorities failed to keep a water guard on the job as it agreed to do, and for a period of more than 45 minutes no water was turned into the main line going to Lawton, although many telephone calls were sent and every reasonable effort used on the part of the citizens of Lawton to get the water Camp Doniphan was using. I call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen, that this bill does not propose to repay or reimburse anything like all of those who lost all they had in that terrible fire, but it does propose to partially reimburse those whose property was destroyed during the 45 minutes when the water was cut off from the city of Lawton and being used by the Government at Camp Doniphan.

May I be permitted to add, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion it is a shame these citizens have not been repaid years ago, and while I do not wish to unduly take up the valuable time of this House, I do want to urge that this important matter be not put off another day. These splendid, patriotic citizens are entitled to immediate relief which many of them sorely need. You gentlemen have been very kind to me, which consideration I deeply appreciate, and I sincerely trust that it is not an imposition on you to urge the passage of this bill without further discussion.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am not at all clear that this bill is meritorious. It may be. I should judge it is not on account of the array of talent that I see sitting here to bolster it up, but the thing I am curious about and what I would like to have somebody explain is where the gentleman from New York is, who a few minutes ago was sitting here objecting.

Mr. SCHAFER. I think he has gone out to get a drink of water.

Mr. MADDEN. And how he was induced to leave. I have a great deal of admiration for the genius of the gentleman from New York. I had no idea that anybody would have sufficient influence to make him disappear under such doubtful circumstances. This is a case where the Wisconsin idea prevails. There is $141,000 involved.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that bill has been passed.

Mr. MADDEN. At any rate, there are so many Wisconsin men on the floor advocating this who are generally opposed to anything anybody wants that it looks rather curious to me.

I have not had time to delve into the mysteries of the case, but I have had the privilege of watching the antics of these men who are usually aiding the watchdog of the Treasury in preserving the dignity of the shaving box.

Now, how many burglaries they have fostered and protected and encouraged by the action that has just been taken I do not know, but my hope has been all the time that with these men in whom I have always had the utmost confidence arrayed on the side of right, we would be perfectly safe in attending to our business outside of the Chamber of the House, feeling assured nothing would go wrong inside the Chamber, and while we were saving 50 cents at the end of a long and arduous day of struggle and argument and toil, we would not be spending more than a billion dollars in the House without any consideration whatever. I compliment the gentlemen on the sturdy advocacy of continued burglary of post offices.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I apologize to the gentleman. I was not alluding to him [laughter], and I shall venture to hope that the insurance companies to whom these great premiums are paid for protecting the integrity of the cash box of the Post Office Department will at least be compelled to pay the losses once in a while.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman from Illinois contend that when some Chicago post office robbers come up to Wisconsin and use an acetylene torch on a post-office vault that under existing law the postmaster's bondsmen are held liable for the loss from the burglary?

Mr. MADDEN. No; these vaults ought to be made of steel and nobody ought to be allowed to steal anything out of them.

Mr. SCHAFER. We are looking at the actual facts in this particular case.

Mr. MADDEN. I have not any doubt about it and I compliment the gentleman on his industry.

Mr. SCHAFER. And from the tone of the gentleman's speech, the gentleman would seem to intimate that this is a pork barrel bill. If the gentleman had ever studied the facts in the case I think he would arrive at a different conclusion.

Mr. MADDEN. I have, and I have arrived at the conclusion that this is not a pork-barrel scheme, it is an individual scheme of pork barrels.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will state to the gentleman that he could have objected to the bill and could have had one of his colleagues object and would have had the three objections necessary to strike the bill off the calendar if it is such a bad bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not want me to get too arduous in my opposition, does he? [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MAJ. HARRY WALTER STEPHENSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8806) authorizing the President to reappoint Maj. Harry Walter Stephenson, United States Army (retired), to the position and rank of major, Coast Artillery Corps, in the United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that the War Department states that the bill in question is for the restoration to the active list of a former major and that they do not recommend favorable consideration or the passage of the bill. I find by the notes I have here that the committee feels an injustice was done in the forced retirement of Major Stephenson and that his reappointment will be for the benefit of the Military Establishment. I am reserving the right to object, but hardly think I shall object, although I would like to ask the gentleman who is in charge of the bill, Mr. REECE, of Tennessee, what is the explanation of the difference of opinion between the committee and the War Department with respect to this bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Inasmuch as the gentleman is not here, let it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. HOOPER. Yes; Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice. I would like to have an opportunity to look into it further.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PLACING OF A RETIRED OFFICER OF ARMY ON RETIRED LIST AS A MAJOR GENERAL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7926) to place a retired officer of the Army on the retired list as a major general.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is for the benefit of General Lord, the Director of the Budget. It comes to us in a little different form from other bills and the report consists merely of letters written by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I understand, after having talked with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], why it comes to us in this form, and I subscribe to everything about General Lord that these gentlemen have said in their letters. However, Mr. Speaker, I can not sit here at this table and object to the reinstatement and then retirement of lieutenants, captains, and majors and then not enter my objection to this bill. I therefore would like to be recorded as one objector.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. HARE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the third objection, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if this is a good bill. I would like to have a little information about it.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman is referring to me for information, I will say to him I made a very comprehensive study of the merits of this case and I have yet to find any man who has ever been promoted from the rank of brigadier general to the rank of major general whose case possessed any merit approaching the merit which stands behind the case of General Lord.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the Army officers had given one one-thousandth part of the services that General Lord has given to the United States Government we could make major generals of them all.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. RANKIN. I object.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman withhold his objection? This is a case where the Chief of Finance, a brigadier general, had no idea of getting out of the Army, but was drafted by the President of the United States to be Director of the Budget. If he had stayed in the Army he would have been a major general. We are only conferring on him what he would have been entitled to, so that when he gets out of this job he may have the rank of a major general. I trust that the gentleman from Mississippi will not object.

Mr. RANKIN. I will withhold it and let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. JAMES. It has been on the calendar for three months, and we may not get back to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Let me say that the Military Committee, of which I am a member, gave very careful thought and consideration to this bill. We were satisfied that this was more than a meritorious bill. It is a bill that justice demands. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HUDSON. If the objection is going to stand I will call for the regular order.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HARE. The first objection to this bill is that it does not show on its face what its purpose is. If it is for the purpose of making General Lord a major general, why do you not say so.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Let me say that it could not apply to any other officer in the United States Army, retired or active, except General Lord.

Mr. HARE. Another question. I would like to know whether or not if General Lord is retired according to the terms of this bill he will be entitled to pay as a retired Army officer in addition to the salary that he now draws?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; the law expressly provides that he can only have the salary that he now draws. There will be no increase whatever in his pay by this bill.

Mr. HARE. No increase in salary or pay?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. Of course, when he finally leaves the Budget he will get the retired pay of a major general, the same as he would have had if he had stayed in the Army.

Mr. HARE. With that explanation, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears only two objections, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to place on the retired list of the Army as a major general, with the retired pay of that grade, the officer who was the first Chief of Finance of the Army, and who was placed on the retired list as a brigadier general while holding that office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOE BURTON COURSEY

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9017) to reinstate Joe Burton Coursey in the West Point Military Academy.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, the letter of the Secretary of War which accompanies the report says:

I believe that the approval of the proposed legislation would be against good discipline and prejudicial to the interests of the United States Military Academy. I, therefore, recommend that the proposed legislation be not favorably considered.

Now, I am not going to object at this time, but I want to ask some gentleman in the absence of Mr. REED to make some explanation or that it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. It has been passed for about two years, and if this man is to get back he ought to be reinstated now or else objection made and definitely dispose of it. The bill has been favorably reported by the committee of which Mr. REED of New York is chairman. It has been passed without a dissenting vote by the House at the last session, went to the Senate and passed that body without a dissenting vote.

Mr. HOOPER. With that statement, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Joe Burton Coursey, of the sixth congressional district, State of Mississippi, be reinstated in the West Point Military Academy, to graduate at the foot of the class in June, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE MAKING OF A REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks that I made on the anniversary of the birthday of Champ Clark on March 7.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, ex-Speaker Champ Clark is affectionately remembered by the people of the country for his lofty patriotism and his long, honorable service in the Congress of the United States.

On March 16, 1916, he delivered an address at the Washington Press Club to the newly elected Members of Congress, of whom I was one, emphasizing the value of experience, which comes from length of service.

Everyone appreciates that a Member of Congress should (1) know conditions in his district; (2) keep in touch with and be in sympathy with the people of his district; and (3) be honest and have the capacity to represent them.

No one should be elected to serve in any capacity who is dishonest or incompetent. No one would think of employing an attorney unless he thought he was capable of representing him or calling in a physician unless he had confidence in him, and for that matter no one would contract for the services of any one in a business capacity, as a carpenter, a machinist, or a laborer, or to work on the farm, without making some inquiry into the ability and experience of the person to serve them. The prudent person carefully investigates the record and qualifications and ability to serve of the person applying for employment in addition to the statements of the person interested in his own behalf. This speech of ex-Speaker Champ Clark is deserving of the thoughtful study of every voter of the country. We should exercise the same care in the selection of our public servants that we use in the selection of those who serve us personally.

The address is as follows:

REMARKS OF CHAMP CLARK AT THE WASHINGTON PRESS CLUB RECEPTION, THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1916

[Printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 17, 1916]

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph, of Roanoke, in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "topnotchers."

Let us take the present House and see how long the men who hold the high places have served. I can not name all, but will cite a few as samples.

Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year. He holds the record, or, in pugilistic parlance, "he holds the belt," for length of service in the House in our entire history. In several Congresses he was chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations and then was Speaker eight years, only one man, Henry Clay, having been Speaker longer.

I am serving my twenty-second year; Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Kitchin, chairman of Ways and Means, his sixteenth; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs and "father of the House," his twenty-sixth; Mr. Flood, chairman of Foreign Affairs, his sixteenth; Mr. Hay, chairman of Military Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. GLASS, chairman of Banking and Currency, his sixteenth; Mr. Adamson, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, his twentieth; Mr. Stephens, chairman of Indian Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Slayden, chairman of the Library, his twentieth; Mr. Henry, chairman of Rules, his twentieth; Mr. Lever, chairman of Agriculture, his sixteenth; Mr. Padgett, chairman of the Navy, his sixteenth; Mr. Lloyd, chairman of Accounts, his twentieth; and Mr. Sparkman, chairman of Rivers and Harbors, his twenty-second. There are other big chairmanships, but these will suffice to show that as a rule the big places go to old and experienced Members, for most of the men who rank close to the chairmen are old-timers. The same thing holds good with reference to members of the minority. As an illustration, Messrs. GILLETT and COOPER, who are serving their twenty-fourth year, are the ranking Republicans on Appropriations and Foreign Affairs, almost certain to be chairmen thereof should the Republicans ever again have a majority in the House, as in that event, in all probability, Mr. Mann will be Speaker, unless he is nominated for President next June.

Go through the whole list and you will find, with few exceptions, that the men of long service have the high places.

New England and the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have understood the value of long service all along, and, having elected a fairly good man to Congress, they keep him in the harness.

The Member of longest consecutive service is called "the father of the House." Five Philadelphians in immediate succession bore that honorable title—Randall, Kelly, O'Neill, Harmer, and Bingham. Then it went to Mr. Dalzell, of Pittsburgh. When General Bingham announced the death of General Harmer, his immediate predecessor as "father of the House," he stated that the five Philadelphia "fathers of the House" had served a total of 147 years, and he served 8 or 10 years after making that interesting statement.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men—Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them!

One other thing. I do not know what committee assignments you new Members secured. If they are good, you are to be congratulated. If bad, do not be cast down. No congressional tenderfoot ever had poorer assignments that I had—Claims and Old Pensions—but I never complained or kicked. I went to work as though those committees suited me exactly. Here is an illustration of what may happen and how luck plays an important part; I was next to top Democrat on both Foreign Affairs and Patents for eight years—never advanced a peg so far as committees went. Just when, at the beginning of the ninth year on those two committees, I was about to become top Democrat on Foreign Affairs, Hon. John Sharp Williams, then minority leader, assigned me to the foot of Ways and Means, and at the end of four years through the happenings of politics in five different States I jumped from the foot to the head of the Democratic minority on Ways and Means. So it may be with you. Events over which you have no control may advance you more rapidly than you dreamed of or hoped for. My advice is this: "Whatever your hand finds to do, do it with your might."

CHARLES R. WAREHAM

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8808) for the relief of Charles R. Wareham.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object Here is a case for the payment of $17,000 more. The House having already agreed to the payment of $141,000 in the matter of a similar character, I can do no more than record my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Charles R. Wareham, acting postmaster at Kearney, Nebr., in the sum of $17,204.83, due to the United States on account of funds and stamps lost in the burglary of the post office at Kearney, Nebr., on September 23, 1926.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARTHUR L. HECYKELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3721) for the relief of Arthur L. Hecykell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other objections? The Chair hears but one. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Arthur L. Hecykell, formerly lieutenant in the United States Navy, a lieutenant in the United States Navy and place him upon the retired list of the Navy, with the retired pay and allowance of that grade: Provided, That no back pay, allowance, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RUSSELL H. LINDSAY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4302) for the relief of Russell H. Lindsay.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Two objections are noted by the Chair. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Russell H. Lindsay, former ensign, United States Navy, in which grade he served honorably during the World War, an ensign in the United States Navy, and to retire him and place him on the retired list of the Navy as an ensign, with retired pay of that grade as provided by law for officers retired by reason of physical disability incident to service.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I apprehend that the membership of the House to-day is going to let this bill go through without knowing its merits, even though there are two objections to it. It is not concurred in by the Secretary of the Navy. The testimony shows that the medical boards do not agree as to the testimony, and the bill ought not to pass. I recognize, of course, that only two objections were made.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman give the committee the ground upon which he thinks we should reject this bill, in view of his statement?

Mr. HUDSON. Upon the ground that the evidence placed before the committee does not warrant its passage.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman merely stated that the Secretary of War said the bill should not pass. Has the gentleman read this report in full?

Mr. HUDSON. I have.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Is it not a fact that when this man was inducted into the Navy he was found to be physically fit and the Navy accepted him. He was then assigned to a battleship and commenced his duties. Within about 30 days he was examined by the medical board and found to have tuberculosis. They refused even to say that the disability was incurred in line of duty. Of course, I want the gentleman to understand that the passage of this bill makes no difference to me. It is not my bill. It is Mr. TIMBERLAKE'S bill. The board of medical examiners after carefully examining this man's physical qualifications for appointment as a Navy officer reported as follows:

Each member of the board [then] made a careful physical examination of the candidate and found no trace of any ailment or disability now existing.

When they accepted him into the Navy he was qualified and in 30 days later upon another examination he was found to have tuberculosis. They now claim that it was not incurred in line of duty.

Mr. HUDSON. There is nothing in the report that shows that the two boards agreed.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am satisfied that the gentleman must have read some other report.

Mr. HUDSON. I assure the gentleman that I have read the report, but I can not agree with him.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAYMASTER CHARLES ROBERT O'LEARY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4767) for the relief of Paymaster Charles Robert O'Leary, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair notes one objection. Are there any other objections?

The Chair hears no other objections, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter Paymaster Charles Robert O'Leary, United States Navy, shall be regarded as having been promoted to a pay inspector in the United States Navy on the 11th day of January, 1918, with rank as such immediately after Pay Inspector Herbert Elliott Stevens, United States Navy: Provided, That said Paymaster Charles Robert O'Leary shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by examination, his mental, moral, physical, and professional qualifications to perform all the duties of said grade: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to entitle Paymaster Charles Robert O'Leary, United States Navy, to any back pay, allowance, or other emoluments in this permanent rank.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the figures "1918," strike out the comma and the words "with rank as such immediately after Pay Inspector Herbert Elliott Stevens, United States Navy."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LUCY B. KNOX

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1406) granting six months' pay to Lucy B. Knox.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Maryland explain the bill. It seems to me that the bill is individual in character and will entail an expense of $2,370 on the part of the Treasury.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, this officer died at the Naval Academy in the interim between the time when the bill which grants the six months' pay had been repealed and was reenacted. Had he lived a month longer his widow would have received six months' pay. The widow of every officer since that time and of every officer prior to 1917 has received this amount of money. We have about four precedents of bills passed for this same purpose.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to pay to Lucy B. Knox, widow of the late Lieut. Commander Forney Moore Knox, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Forney Moore Knox was receiving at the date of his death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VINCENTIA V. IRWIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2494) granting six months' pay to Vincentia V. Irwin.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to pay to Vincentia V. Irwin, widow of the late Ensign Glendon Ward Irwin, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Glendon Ward Irwin was receiving at the date of his death.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

KENNETH M. ORR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4014) for the the relief of Kenneth M. Orr.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The SPEAKER. One objection is noted. Are there other objections? If not, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the compensation laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and so forth, their widows and dependent relatives, Kenneth M. Orr shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the United States Navy as a fireman, first class, November 20, 1922.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hooper: Page 1, line 9, after the figures "1922," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "Provided, That no back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MAJ. CHAUNCEY S. M'NEILL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9149) for the relief of Maj. Chauncey S. McNeill.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that this officer, who has been retired, shall be not only examined and reappointed to the active list but shall be carried as an extra on promotion list. It seems to me, while the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is coming in here and seeking to adjust the promotion list and saying they have too many officers now in certain ranks, after an officer is retired, they should not seek to restore to active service men on the retired list and asking that they be carried as extras on promotion list.

Mr. BOWMAN. No. The bill provides that the officer shall be examined to determine his physical fitness. The facts in this case are these: This young man spent 24 years in the service of the United States. During the World War he was examined, along with 500 or 600 other officers, and was found with a permanent disability, and he was retired from the service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. During the World War?

Mr. BOWMAN. During the World War. But since then it has been discovered that this disability which the examining officers found was an error in diagnosing his case. It was not a permanent disability. The officer has been restored to health. The young man is now a professor of military tactics at the Fishbourne Military Institute in Virginia, drawing the same salary that he would have drawn if kept on the list as a major. He is now but little past 40 years of age. He is physically fit and he desires to get back into active service, and it is unfair and unjust for this young man to be retired for an error in diagnosis when he desires to get back into active service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But he was retired and out of the military service during the World War, was he not? Am I right in that?

Mr. BOWMAN. No. He was retired during the World War on account of a physical disability. An error, however, was made in the diagnosis of this young man, and he has recovered from his physical disability. It is unfair that he should be kept on the retired list, because he is now as physically fit as you or I.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman know whether the disability was incurred during the World War service of this officer?

Mr. BOWMAN. The evidence shows that the examining officers made a mistake.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Acting Secretary of War says:

The case of McNeill does not constitute such a case, though his record as an active officer is a very creditable one.

Accordingly I recommend that S. 1573 be not favorably considered by your committee and be not enacted into law.

Mr. BOWMAN. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall sleep more comfortably if I record my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears one objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. There are two objections. Is there a further objection? If not, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to have an Army retiring board examine Maj. Chauncey S. McNeill, United States Army, retired, as to his physical fitness for active service. If the retiring board finds Major McNeill fit for active service, the President is hereby authorized to reappoint him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a major on the active list of the Regular Army, with rank from July 1, 1920, as an additional officer in such arm or branch of the service as may be decided upon by the Secretary of War. When he is restored to the active list, Major McNeill shall thereafter be carried as an extra number on the promotion list in accordance with his total active commissioned service, but no back pay shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES JAMES ANDERSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4766) for the relief of Charles James Anderson, former commander, United States Naval Reserve Force.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman who is the sponsor of this bill present? I notice that the Navy Department recommends that the bill be not enacted. I do not know but that it is a meritorious matter, but I have not had much of a chance or opportunity to examine the bill. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over for the present without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

E. C. CALLAHAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9161) authorizing the President to reappoint E. C. Callahan, formerly a captain of Infantry, United States Army, a captain of Infantry, United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I think we should have some information from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am not on the Military Affairs Committee this year, but I was last year when this bill was before that committee, and I made the report on the bill when it was reported last session. It passed the House at the last session but failed of passage in the Senate because they did not reach it. I think the bill is meritorious, and I think if the gentleman will look into it he will have no objection whatever. I have looked over the entire proceedings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This man resigned?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He did.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And then he was sorry he resigned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He resigned under pressure from a major. The main point is that he did not have the opportunity that was afforded to withdraw that resignation. When the telegram was sent to him he was not there, and he fully intended to withdraw his resignation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I will record my objections. I can not do anything else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair notes one objection. Are there other objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reappoint E. C. Callahan, formerly a captain of Infantry, United States Army, a captain of Infantry, United States Army, in accordance with the provisions of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920.

With the following committee amendment:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reappoint E. C. Callahan, formerly an officer of the Infantry, United States Army, an officer in the Infantry, United States Army, in the grade and in the position on the promotion list provided by the next to last paragraph of section 24a of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920: Provided, That said E. C. Callahan shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to any back pay or allowances of any kind: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall operate to increase the number of officers in the Regular Army now authorized by law.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FAYETTE L. FROEMKE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 548) for the relief of Fayette L. Froemke.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. One objection is noted. Are there others? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 6 of the naval appropriation act approved July 12, 1921, as provided that the application for retirement of officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy who have heretofore incurred, or who may hereafter incur, physical disability in the line of duty in time of war shall be filed with the Secretary of the Navy not later than October 1, 1921, be, and hereby is, waived in the case of Ensign Fayette L. Froemke, Pay Corps, United States Naval Reserve Force, inactive, and his case is hereby authorized to be considered and acted upon under the remaining provisions of said section if his application for retirement is filed not later than 60 days from the approval of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES JAMES ANDERSON

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 178, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in explanation of that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 178 and to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, this bill was passed over under a unanimous-consent request that the bill be passed without prejudice. Under the practice in vogue to-day the granting of that request has the effect of three objections and prevents only the present consideration of the bill. This particular bill was introduced in the House by the venerable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BUTLER] and was reported by him. I am going to ask my friend from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] whether or not he will not consent to return to the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But he had the consent of the entire House to have the bill go over.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Unfortunately the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] was not here to grant his consent.

Mr. HOOPER. After the explanation made by the gentleman from Illinois, and not wishing to work any injustice in this matter, I am perfectly willing to have that course taken by the House. I had not had an opportunity to examine this bill, the Private Calendar having come up unexpectedly, and I fear injustice would be done if I were to insist on my request that it be passed over without prejudice. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object. We can not jump all around this calendar. When the gentleman from Michigan asked that it go over he asked that it go over by the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it was passed without prejudice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. By the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does not this mean that it can be returned to and that this is the difference between being passed without prejudice and three objections? If passed without prejudice, we may return to it, whereas with three objections it could not be considered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Charles James Anderson, formerly a commander in the United States Naval Reserve Force, a commander in the United States Naval Reserves and place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and allowances of that grade: Provided, That a duly constituted naval retiring board finds that the said Charles James Anderson incurred physical disability incident to the service in time of war: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN P. HOLLAND

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4066) to place John P. Holland on the retired list of the United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of putting into the RECORD my objection to this class of bills. I have recorded my objection to a number of bills reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It seems to me if we are going to enact legislation that will benefit these men where the records show the disability did not occur in line of duty, it ought to be general legislation so that every person in the Navy may have the benefit of it rather than that certain recipients should receive this bounty from the Government by finding some Congressman who will introduce his bill because he is in his district and bring it before us. There ought to be general legislation and we should not pass this individual legislation. We are running into a large number of these individual bills.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. I yield.

Mr. HALE. This bill passed the House last session. One examining board found this young man did incur disability not only in line of duty but in time of war. This report was disapproved. He went before various examining boards, and the result was that before they got through with him the time lapsed—namely, October 1, 1921—in which under the operation of the law of July 12, 1921, he could have been retired. The young man is known to me personally. It is an extremely worthy case. He was injured in line of duty by a series of accidents, the first of which occurred in 1918 in time of war, when he was serving on board a destroyer. There were several other accidents thereafter. The young man is almost blind, and probably will be blind in the course of another year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that there is a great deal more merit in this bill than the bill we returned to and passed just a few moments ago.

Mr. HUDSON. I am not speaking about this individual bill, I will say to the gentleman from New Hampshire, in whose judgment I have great confidence, I am simply pointing out that it seems to me the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs ought to use their efforts toward general legislation rather than exerting their efforts on these individual cases.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan it is my understanding there is general legislation pending before the Congress which would take care of this case if it were passed.

Mr. HUDSON. I am very glad to hear that, because such matters ought to come up in that way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A great many of these bills coming from the Naval Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee I have objected to this afternoon, but I have gotten lonesome.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to place John P. Holland, formerly a lieutenant (junior grade), United States Navy, on the retired list of the Navy with the rank and retired pay of a lieutenant (junior grade) of the Navy: Provided, That in computing his pay credit shall be given for all his continuous service in the Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FREDERICK D. W. BALDWIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4931) for the relief of Frederick D. W. Baldwin.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. HUDSON objected.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am sure the gentlemen will withdraw their objections. This bill is similar to several other bills that have been considered, only it is more meritorious. If the gentlemen will look this bill over I am sure they will have no objection to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is now in a very strategic position unless he encourages a third objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the gentleman from Massachusetts is endeavoring to make a statement, I would like to ask the gentleman if this is a meritorious bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House at the last session. It is on the calendar of the Senate and ought to have been reached before this. This is a case of a man suffering from tuberculosis. The bill ought to have been passed a year ago. This disease, according to the report, was incurred in line of duty, and there is no bill on the calendar, in my opinion, that approaches it in being meritorious.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object. I hope we shall pass the bill and pass it quickly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair notes two objections. Is there a third objection? [After a pause.] The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., The President is authorized to appoint Frederick D. W. Baldwin, formerly an ensign in the United States Naval Reserve Force, an ensign in the Naval Reserve and place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and allowances of that grade: Provided, That a duly constituted naval retiring board finds that the said Frederick D. W. Baldwin incurred physical disability incident to the service in time of war: Provided further, That no back pay, allowances, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOSEPH S. CARROLL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2477) for the relief of Joseph S. Carroll.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I see that the report says that this is in conflict with the financial policy of the President. I am wondering what the gentleman from Maryland has to say about the passage of a bill against the wisdom of the President.

Mr. GAMBRILL. We have had many precedents set here to-day, and I am doubtful whether it ought to be raised against this particular bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This man has served only 50 years.

Mr. GAMBRILL. He has served 52 years. The bill passed the House but failed in the Senate. He has had 52 years' faithful and meritorious service, and I hope that there will be no objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of his long and faithful service in various positions at the United States Naval Academy, where he is now employed as utility man for the midshipmen's mess, and of his enlisted service in the regular Navy on various midshipmen's cruises, extending, in all, over a continuous period of 50 years, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist Joseph S. Carroll as a chief commissary steward in the United States Navy and to immediately thereafter transfer him to the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay of that rating: Provided, That the said Joseph S. Carroll shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances prior to the date upon which he may be transferred to the retired list, as herein authorized: Provided further, That the enlistment of the said Joseph S. Carroll, as herein authorized, may be effected without regard to age or physical qualifications.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STANDARD OIL CO. OF NEW JERSEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8529) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine questions of law involved in the alleged erroneous collection of tonnage taxes in 1920 and 1921 on three vessels operated by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey under bare-boat charter from a Danzig corporation.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask why it is that the claimants did not file their claims earlier, but waited from 1920 to 1928?

Mr. LEAVITT. I think the gentleman will find in the complete report a statement that an effort was made to have the claims passed upon after the question of the legality of the collection. They have been passed upon by the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce and the Attorney General, and they both hold that the assessment was properly made. There is a great deal of doubt whether the collection should have been made, but the purpose of the bill is only to allow a judicial determination of that fact.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These vessels were owned by American citizens?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; but they flew the flag of the Free City of Danzig.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was not that done to escape taxation? Was it not done to avoid the payment of Federal taxes?

Mr. LEAVITT. The statement is made in the report that the vessels were owned by an American corporation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Inasmuch as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH], who introduced the bill, is not here, I ask unanimous consent that it go over without prejudice. It involves many questions of international law and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I shall object. I think that that means under the present practice three objections, because that will be the effect of it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman can regard me as one objector.

Mr. SCHAFER. And he can record me as another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection? The Chair hears only two objections, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to hear and determine the claim of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, for refund of $60,283 alleged to have been erroneously collected in 1920 and 1921 on three vessels belonging to the claimant, being the Zoppot, 5,915 tons; the Gedania, 5,107 tons; and the Baltic, 5,173 tons, under Danzig charter; it being contended by the claimant that the tonnage taxes assessed and collected on the vessels named were not authorized by law.

SEC. 2. The Court of Claims is authorized to make proper order on its conclusions on the questions presented in section 1 of this Act: Provided further, That such notices of the suits shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by orders of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause one of his assistants to appear and defend for the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENGLEHARD SPERSTAD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 332) validating homestead entry of Englehard Sperstad for certain public land in Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the entry hereinafter described be, and the same is hereby, validated and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patent thereon upon the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the provisions of the act of June 6, 1912 (37 Stat. 123): Homestead entry, Anchorage, Alaska, No. 06094, made by Englehard Sperstad on January 28, 1924, for the southeast quarter of section 36, township 13 north, range 4 west of the Seward meridian, and in lieu of that tract the Territory of Alaska shall have the right to select equal area of public land of the character subject to selection under its school-land grant.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2488) for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, an identical bill has become a law. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be removed from the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered, and the bill lie on the table.

GEORGE M. BROWDER AND F. N. BROWDER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3372) for the relief of George M. Browder and F. N. Browder.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George M. Browder and F. N. Browder, as administrators of the estate of the late F. G. Browder, the sum of $10,000. Such sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for damages resulting from the death of the said F. G. Browder, who, on October 20, 1926, near the city of Montgomery, Ala., was struck and killed by an airplane owned and operated by the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 7, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CREDITS IN DISBURSING ACCOUNTS OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4258) to authorize credit in the disbursing accounts of certain officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Kansas tell us what attitude the Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl, takes on this bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Comptroller General says that these were technical violations of the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He objects to settling the accounts?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; because of the technical matter of violation of the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What does the Comptroller General say?

Mr. HARE. If the gentleman will permit, the Comptroller General takes no attitude in respect to that. Some of these claims were paid out of funds not authorized. For instance, the first one was paid out of a fund for a certain service and when the matter went to the Comptroller General, he said that the officer did not have the right to pay this money out of this particular fund; that it should have been paid out of other funds; and subsequently it was paid out of another fund. This charge remains against that particular fund, and the only way that it can be corrected is by act of Congress, and these acts are purely for the purpose of correcting the books in the auditor's department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Each case contained in the bill is a technical violation of the law rather than intentional?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This bill, it appears, was introduced at the request of the War Department evidently for the purpose of correcting the records.

Mr. HARE. That is correct.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The bookkeeping.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. To balance the accounts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, it is a little more than bookkeeping.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not say that. I say for balancing the accounts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These officers are now charged and debited with the amounts involved.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Some of the amounts have been paid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the following-named officers of the Army of the United States in the sums herein stated, which now stand as disallowances on the books of the General Accounting Office:

Capt. W. A. MacNicholl, Finance Department, $706.95, being the amount of payments made in his accounts for the month of June, 1925, incident to the medical care and treatment of two officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps who were injured in an aerial flight.

First Lieut. J. P. Tillman, Quartermaster Corps, $150; Capt. E. W. Wilson, Finance Department, $150; Maj. H. E. Pace, Finance Department, $150; Lieut. Col. S. B. Maj. John S. Jadwin, United States Army, retired, $350.62, representing the balance found due the United States from funds turned over by him to his agent officer for the pay and ration funds of a military mapping detachment, and which were embezzled by their immediate commanding officer to whom intrusted for disbursement: Provided, That Lieut. John C. Wade, Corps of Engineers, agent officer, shall be relieved of all responsibility and accountability in connection therewith.

Capt. Carl Halla, Finance Department, $174.85, representing the amount paid to S. J. Swiekatowski, former Army field clerk, for personal property destroyed by Government officials while in storage, and which sum was found due and recommended by board of officers.

SEC. 2. The Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the following claims and certify same to Congress.

Mrs. Letitia Spence, the sum of $966.20, being the amount found due by a board of officers on account of damages sustained to her property as the result of a fire spreading from Camp Lewis, Wash., military reservation, on July 23, 1926.

Edward F. Becken, the sum of $2,255, being the amount found due by a surveying officer for damages sustained to his property as the result of military operations at Camp Upton, N. Y., during the years 1918 and 1919.

Roy Wiedersum, first lieutenant, Air Corps Reserves, United States Army, the sum of $3,386.74, under section 6 of the act approved June 3, 1924 (Public, 1826, 68th Cong.), representing pay and allowances amounting to $645.24, from April 5 to June 27, 1925, and $2,741.50 as reimbursed approved amounts expended by him for medical and hospital treatment during the same period for injuries sustained in an airplane accident while in training.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, after line 3, insert the following:

"Capt. L. H. Price, Finance Department, $199.92, being the amount paid by him to one Beecher Roberts, private, Company K, Twenty-fourth Infantry, in his accounts for May, 1926, soldier having been found not guilty of desertion and honorably discharged.

"Capt. L. V. Houston, Finance Department, $22.10, representing overpayments to citizens' military training camp students on account of travel pay to and from camp.

"Maj. E. T. Comegys, Finance Department, $92.25, being the amount paid by him to W. R. Graham for stenographic report on hearings before the Select Committee of Inquiry into the operations of the United States Army Air Service."

Page 4, line 1, strike out "$2,255" and insert "$1,450."

In line 11, strike out "reimburse" and insert "reimbursement."

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES CAUDWELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4268) for the relief of Charles Caudwell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute an identical Senate bill (S. 1736), already passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to substitute an identical Senate bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles Caudwell, Congleton, Cheshire, England, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,219.65, or so much thereof as may be required to purchase exchange not to exceed the amount of two thousand one hundred pounds sterling, in full settlement of all claims of said Charles Caudwell growing out of his purchase of ovens at London, England, in June and July, 1919.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 4268, was laid on the table.

VALIDATING ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN PROPERTY BY WAR DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4257) for the validation of the acquisition of Canadian properties by the War Department and for the relief of certain disbursing officers for payments made thereon.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to do so, I see the bill covers something over $315,000. The legislation is recommended by the War Department. It was recommended some four or six years ago. While my colleague from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER] reported the bill, I wish that he would give the House some explanation of it.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was given careful consideration by the subcommittee and by the full committee. It is a validating bill, pure and simple. It is not an appropriating bill. It is a bookkeeping bill. During the war the Government had occasion in Canada to secure certain munition plants. The Government was unable to purchase the land out-and-out because of a law in Canada, as I recall it, forbidding the acquisition of property by a foreign country. They had to get around this by leasing the property and then by acquiring it subsequently in a roundabout way through trustees. The officers who were in charge of the work expended the money and expended it legitimately, but it will be observed that the report states:

Payments amounting to $315,490.38 by disbursing officers of the United States, for the purchase price of the land and payment of taxes, assessments, services, etc., have been disallowed by the Comptroller General on the ground that the authority to acquire and hold real estate in a foreign country can not be rested upon an appropriation in general terms, and he suggested that the Secretary of War present the matter to Congress for such disposition as it may deem advisable.

This is the only disposition that can be made. There is a loophole in the law by which the Comptroller General thought technically he was unable to recommend an out-and-out payment of it, and he has sent it to Congress for adjustment. The Government has had the benefit of the money expended and the officers have not had any benefit of the $350,000. It is simply to validate and make good a transaction by which the United States Government was able to make munitions in Canada during the period of the war.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What happens to the land that we acquired?

Mr. HOOPER. The land was resold.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was that money converted to the United States?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes. It was converted to the United States. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there is no loss on the part of the United States. This simply amounts to validating the amount so that it can be charged off the books as in favor of these officers.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 1738, which has passed the Senate and is identical with the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1738) for the validation of the acquisition of Canadian properties by the War Department and for the relief of certain disbursing officers for payments made thereon

Be it enacted, etc., That the action by the War Department for the acquisition, through trustees, of an interest in and title to certain tracts of land on which to erect additional manufacturing buildings and facilities to increase the production of shells under contracts entered into with certain Canadian contractors for the manufacture of shells and other munitions during the World War is hereby ratified and validated, and that the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the following officers in the amounts stated which now stand as disallowances on the books of the General Accounting Office: Capt. J. Q. A. Brett, United States Army (now deceased), $207,223.66; Donald Findley, formerly captain, Ordnance Department, $14,510.39; Capt. Carl Halla, Finance Department (now major), $65,068.12; Maj. E. O. Hopkins, Quartermaster Corps (now major, Finance Department), $14,728.05; Weston Patterson, formerly first lieutenant, Finance Department, $13,960.16; in all, $315,490.38.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The similar House bill was laid on the table.

JOSEPH F. FRIEND

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6842) for the relief of Joseph F. Friend.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $2,000 to Joseph F. Friend, of Swanton, Md., for the capture and arrest of Henderson Hall, a negro who attempted the robbery of the post office at Swanton, Md.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, there is a story of heroism in connection with this matter that I think should be set out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that at this point I may insert the letter addressed by the Acting Postmaster General to the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to insert the letter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1928.

Hon. CHARLES L. UNDERHILL,
Chairman Committee of Claims, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. UNDERHILL: Further reference is made to your letter of December 17, 1927, inclosing a copy of House bill 6842, providing for the payment of $2,000 for the relief of Joseph F. Friend on account of the capture and arrest of Henderson Hall for the burglary of the Swanton (Md.) post office. You requested to be furnished with an expression of opinion concerning the merits of the bill.

Briefly, the facts relating to this case are as follows: About 10 o'clock on the night of September 17, 1925, claimant, Joseph F. Friend, postmaster, was awakened while sleeping in a room adjoining the store in which the post office at Swanton is located. Uncertain as to whether some one had broken into the place or whether he had been aroused by a passing freight train, Mr. Friend secured his pistol and a flashlight. Upon entering the store he was immediately greeted by a bullet, which grazed his head. Nevertheless Mr. Friend, although two more shots were fired at him, advanced toward the post-office inclosure, discharging his own revolver as he did so. After his second shot he heard a cry, "You have hit me; I give up." Mr. Friend flashed his light upon the post-office section, and immediately the burglar (Henderson Hall) fired another shot. The postmaster continued to move forward, however, and upon reaching and looking through the general delivery window saw Hall and called upon the negro to throw up his hands. The latter jumped toward the postmaster, who fired again, the bullet hitting Hall in the eye. The burglar fell to the floor, and Mr. Friend then entered the post-office inclosure and once more demanded that he throw up his hands. As Hall put his right hand only partly up, the postmaster pulled the trigger of his revolver, but it jammed. Hall then sprang toward the postmaster and a hand-to-hand encounter ensued, during which Mr. Friend was severly beaten about the head and face. The postmaster called for help, and the negro, thinking some one was responding, managed to make his escape. About three hours later he was found by the county sheriff and a posse some 200 yards from the post office. He was in an unconscious condition and had fallen from exhaustion and the loss of blood.

On September 18, 1925, the postmaster and Hall were taken to the hospital, where the postmaster's right eye and Hall's left eye were removed. On account of his physical condition, Hall has not been prosecuted, and on April 1, 1926, an order was issued releasing him from custody. The United States attorney who handled this case made the following statement regarding the services rendered by Mr. Friend.

"His defense of the post office was nothing short of heroic, and he emerges from his encounter with the loss of an eye. I can not think of an effort more deserving of a reward."

Under order No. 650 of the Postmaster General, the notice of reward in effect at the time the offender was arrested, a reward of not more than $2,000 could be paid for the arrest and conviction of any offender on the charge of assaulting any person having lawful charge, control, or custody of any mail matter with intent to rob, steal, or purloin such mail matter or any part thereof, if in effecting or attempting to effect such robbery he did wound the person having custody of the mail or put his life in jeopardy by the use of a dangerous weapon.

As the offender has not been convicted, we can not pay a reward to Mr. Friend for his services in connection with the arrest of Hall.

In accordance with circular letter No. 49 of the Bureau of the Budget, the facts in this case were submitted to the director of that bureau for consideration as to whether House bill 6842 conflicts with the financial program of the President. A reply has just been received stating that the proposed legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President. Under the circumstances the department is of the opinion that favorable consideration should be given to the passage of House bill 6842 for the relief of Joseph F. Friend.

Very truly yours,

W. IRVING GLOVER,
Acting Postmaster General.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GEORGE W. BURGESS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8809) for the relief of George W. Burgess.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this is only $255,000, another post-office bill. I can not do anything else in the present temper of the House but record my objection.

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whoever is responsible for the bill in the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] what about the street-car tokens? Does the Government pay for those?

Mr. LEAVITT. This is one of those bills that came to the Committee on Claims through the Speaker of the House from the Postmaster General, setting forth the losses and giving to the committee full information, to the effect that it was not the fault of the postmaster at all.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, this is an omnibus bill. It is largely a bookkeeping proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope the gentleman will not adopt that phrase, "a bookkeeping proposition." I fear it will be invoked hereafter very frequently.

Mr. HOOPER. Our committee gave the matter very careful attention.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, would it not be proper to ask unanimous consent that these items be considered as read in this bill, in order to save time?

ACCOUNTS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7166) to allow credit in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army of the United States on account of refunds made to purchasers of surplus war supplies.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAPES). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill we passed over the last time we were considering the Private Calendar. It involves the accounts of officers connected with the surplus property sales of the War Department. In the Sixty-sixth Congress I pointed out what would happen from the way we were going about the sale of surplus supplies. I was on the Military Affairs Committee at the time and they got some man from Philadelphia, who was connected with the gas company, to come here and take charge of the sale of surplus supplies. And what happened? We know that there was sale after sale made through collusion. Because bidders could not examine the property, they could not bid intelligently; whereas those who were in collusion with the officers were able to do so, and they did that with the connivance of the officers. Some of the officers in charge of the sale of these surplus supplies, knowing exactly what was there, just waited for the materials to be returned and then they did whatever they pleased about them. We now have before us the result of that method of selling the surplus war supplies, but the gentleman from Michigan will say that this is simply a straightening out of the accounts of these individual officers.

Mr. HOOPER. I was going to use more guarded language after the gentleman's warning.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, it amounts to that. The loss has been sustained, and let us be very clear about it. Now that the war is a thing of the past, it is very difficult to secure a recovery from juries in the Federal courts, and I understand the department has tried to collect in many instances.

I do hope we can at some time draw the line and clean up all of the unsatisfactory activities of this surplus-property sales department that was created in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. HOOPER. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that the War Claims Committee has been very earnestly endeavoring to do the very thing the gentleman is suggesting. We are trying to have an end made at some time of these conditions which have resulted because of the war.

Mr. HUDSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that he use the word "unsavory" instead of "unsatisfactory" in this case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clek read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the disbursing officers of the Army of the United States named herein in the several amounts indicated, representing payments made by direction of local boards of sales control as authorized refundments to purchasers of surplus war supplies for which credit has been disallowed by the General Accounting Office in the audit of their accounts, to wit: Capt. Francis J. Baker, Finance Department, $59,273.11; Lieut. Col. Ward Dabney, Quartermaster Corps, $2,708.04; Capt. E. O. Hopkins, Finance Department, $3,981.40; Capt. P. G. Hoyt, Finance Department, $2,054.13; Capt. M. T. Legg, Finance Department, $17,459.52; Capt. H. B. Lovell, Finance Department, $7,912.66; Lieut. Col. S. B. McIntyre, Finance Department, $3,039.10; Capt. E. C. Morton, Finance Department, $629.58; Capt. A. J. Maxwell, Finance Department, $601.91; Capt. L. L. Simms, Finance Department, $6,246; Maj. E. B. Spiller, Finance Department, $274.63; Capt. E. W. Wilson, Finance Department, $180.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM HENRY JUDSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2525) for the relief of William Henry Judson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN and Mr. BOX objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It takes three objections. The Chair hears two.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What kind of a case is this?

Mr. WARREN. It is a desertion case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WILLIAM H. ESTABROOK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11107) for the relief of William H. Estabrook.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object. This is another desertion case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long did he serve during hostilities? I see from the report that he served one year and four months, so we will give him the benefit of the doubt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears one objection. Are there others? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William H. Estabrook, who was a member of Company I, Eleventh Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 3d day of January, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PETER S. KELLY

The next business on the private calendar was the bill (S. 1771) for the relief of Peter S. Kelly.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One objection is noted. Are there other objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, Peter S. Kelly, late of Company B, First Regiment Montana Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of the above organization on the 17th day of October, 1899: Provided, That no pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM ESTES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11094) to correct the military record of William Estes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to know how long this soldier served during the Civil War. We only have his record of desertion.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. For the gentleman's information I will state he served over two years in actual service and a much longer time than that by substitute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not like that substitute business. That does not go a very long way with me. I do not mean coffee cooling, but how long did he serve?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. The records of the War Department show he served over two years in the Civil War.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Actual service?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Actual service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And not by power of attorney?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. No; there was actual service of two years' time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How old is the gentleman?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. About 84.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair notes one objection. Are there any further objections? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William Estes shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company C, Seventh Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, October 27, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, pay, or allowance shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PETER S. KELLY

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to see if it would not be possible to have the one objection that was made to the bill for the relief of Peter S. Kelly withdrawn. The bill is Calendar No. 302. If it can possibly be done, I would like to have the one objection withdrawn. This is a Spanish War soldier of the State of Montana, and if there was time to make a statement with regard to it I am sure no one would object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The bill has been agreed to and has passed the House.

Mr. LEAVITT. I understand the situation, but for the sake of this man Kelly, who is a good friend of mine, I would like to have the one objection withdrawn if the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to suggest to the gentleman he is treading on dangerous ground. The gentleman has got his bill passed.

Mr. LEAVITT. It can not be dangerous ground, because the bill is passed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

NEAR EAST RELIEF, INC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1287) for the relief of the Near East Relief (Inc.).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska, Mr. LAGUARDIA, and Mr. SCHAFER objected.

APPOINTMENT OF ROY L. MARSTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 193) for the appointment of Roy L. Marston, of Maine, as a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GLYNN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object, Mr. Speaker, and raise the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will withhold his point of no quorum I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice. It is better to do this than to stop the calling of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his point of order?

Mr. SCHAFER. I withhold the point of order, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. GLYNN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I made the request that this bill be passed over for this reason: There are a number of vacancies on the Board of Managers, and I believe the committee should fill all of these vacancies at the same time. I believe they should consider legislation at the same time providing a member on this board from each State that has a national home. I do not like to raise a point of no quorum, but I think this bill should be passed over without prejudice so that the House can consider the filling of all the vacancies at one time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I also made objection, but in view of the fact that the author of the bill is willing to accede to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I shall not interpose an objection. I will say, however, that I think it is bad practice under the present procedure.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say that this bill was not objected to on the last Private Calendar day, but went over without prejudice upon my request. It was my understanding that one objection would be all that would be necessary to prevent the consideration at this time. If I had known that a parliamentary situation would develop which would require three objections, the gentleman can be assured that I would have had them here to-day. I will withdraw the point of no quorum in view of the fact that the bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I will renew the point of no quorum.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will not the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. FISH. I will withhold it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a very brief statement of a matter discussed yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see from yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, delivered this morning, that Mr. JONES, of Texas, has inserted in the RECORD a letter written by Mr. John T. Orr, of Dallas, president of the Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association, with reference to the services rendered agriculture by Mr. Nathan Adams, president of the American Exchange National Bank, also of Dallas.

I have known Mr. Adams for 25 years. During at least the last 14 years he has been perhaps the outstanding figure connected with financial institutions of the Southwest working for the improvement of the selling methods and the general economic condition of agriculture.

When the present Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Association began to come into operation Mr. Adams, as a prominent bank official, gave to them the benefit of his advice, financial support, and influence among financiers and business men. I happen to know that he did this over the protest of certain important depositors of his bank, and in instances at the expense of valuable accounts.

Mr. Adams's time, counsel, and influence in the financial world and his leadership among bankers have been given without reserve whenever the interest of agriculture was in peril or could be served. Mr. Orr's letter touches only a few of the high spots of Mr. Adams's service to agriculture.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my point of no quorum.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were 2 ayes and 35 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division there were 5 ayes and 32 noes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. As the status now is, the roll will be called and the Sergeant at Arms will have to bring in absent Members. I object to the vote on the ground that no quorum has voted or is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of ordering a call of the House will answer "aye" and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 10, nays 245, not voting 177, as follows:

CLARENCE E. BURT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4935) to authorize the appointment of First Lieut. Clarence E. Burt, retired, to the grade of major, retired, in the United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN and Mr. BOWLING objected.

The SPEAKER. Are there any further objections? The Chair hears but two objections, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint and commission Clarence E. Burt, first lieutenant, United States Army, retired, to the grade of major, United States Army, retired, said grade being effective as of December 8, 1918, with the retired pay of captain, said pay to be based on his length of service on January 29, 1920, the date of his retirement.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 5, strike out the word "major" and insert in lieu thereof the word "captain."

Line 9, after the word "retirement," change the period to a colon and add the following proviso:

"Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CAPT. JOHN J. CAMPBELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7409) to authorize the appointment of Capt. John J. Campbell, resigned, to the grade of captain, retired, in the United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the committee amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to summon John J. Campbell, formerly captain in the Chaplains Corps of the Army of the United States, before a retiring board, to inquire whether at the time of his resignation, July 3, 1924, he was incapacitated for active service, and whether such incapacity was a result of an incident of service, and upon the result of such inquiry the President is authorized to nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said John J. Campbell a captain in the Chaplains Corps and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Army, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for officers of the Regular Army: Provided, That the said John J. Campbell shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances.

The committee amendment was agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill for the relief of John J. Campbell."

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALFRED CHAPLEAU

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 851) for the relief of Alfred Chapleau.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair notes one objection. Are there any other objections? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, their widows and dependent relatives, Alfred Chapleau shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged April 25, 1899, from the military service of the United States in his final service as a member of the Fifth United States Artillery: Provided, That no pension, bounty, pay, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DON C. FEES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11014) for the relief of Don C. Fees.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish some one would give us some explanation of this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is introduced at the request of the Department of Justice. It appears that a motor cycle used by the Department of Justice was worn out and could not be efficiently used. The department found that they did not have an appropriation with which to buy a new motor cycle. They entered into a renting agreement with a motor-cycle dealer whereby they rented the motor cycle for a certain length of time, at the end of which time the motor cycle became the property of the Government. The department had available appropriated funds for the rental of such machines. This bill is to clear up a technical decision of the Comptroller General and to relieve the disbursing officer of the Department of Justice, who had nothing to do with the procedure. The Government does not lose a penny. The Government now has the motor cycle and the Government needs the motor cycle. In fact, I believe the Government has saved money by the transaction.

Mr. HUDSON. Does the gentleman want to establish a precedent whereby every bureau of every department when its appropriation has been used up can go out and make a contract with an automobile dealer or a motor-cycle dealer to use a car, and thus get around the need for an appropriation for a new car?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other words, they lease a car, and when they have paid the full value of the car then the disbursing officer will want to get his accounts settled by a special act of Congress. In other words, they can use funds out of the stationery fund or any other account and avoid having a special appropriation with which to buy a car.

Mr. SCHAFER. This bill is a Department of Justice bill. If the bill is not enacted into law the man responsible for the procedure will not suffer the loss, but the disbursing officer will.

Mr. HUDSON. Did the disbursing officer have any authority to contract any such debt as this? He knew he did not.

Mr. SCHAFER. Considering all of the facts in the case, I think he had authority to make the disbursement. It is a question which is debatable.

Mr. HUDSON. If he had authority, the gentleman would not need this legislation.

Mr. SCHAFER. The Comptroller General held that he did not have authority. I do not always agree with the Comptroller General's interpretations. When there is a difference of opinion between the Department of Justice and the Comptroller General, and there is only a technicality involved, we should not force this disbursing officer to make good this amount. The Government needed the motor cycle and now owns the motor cycle. The Government is not losing one cent, but has saved considerable by the transaction.

Mr. HUDSON. And I suppose next year this gentleman will allow the disbursing officer to get a Lincoln or a Packard.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. One objection is noted. Are there any other objections? If not, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow in the accounts of Don C. Fees, disbursing clerk, Department of Justice, the sum of $446.16 paid by him under authority and direction of said department for the purchase, repair, maintenance, and operation of one motor cycle with side van for transportation of freight, which was disallowed by said Comptroller General.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE SOCIALIST PLATFORM

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] desire to be recognized at this time?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I have but a few minutes. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. The Chair would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if he desires to insert printed matter, he will explain the matter to be inserted.

Mr. BERGER. I just want to make a little speech in introduction, and then insert the platform of the Socialist Party. It is a short document.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is that the platform in which by a huge majority the organization refused to go on record as in favor of the modification of the Volstead Act?

Mr. BERGER. Yes. That is the platform.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, like every new phase of civilization, socialism thus far has received the attention only of the oppressed and the lowly. The opulent and the rich have no reason to wish for a change of our system.

Until of late, outside of the working class, only students of history, of political economy, and a few advanced thinkers have given any attention to the principles of socialism in our country. Most people have but a very vague idea even of its basis. Nevertheless socialism is in the foreground of discussion.

HAVE WE REACHED THE END OF ALL PROGRESS?

Socialism stands for a new civilization.

Of course, with people who believe that whatever is will exist forever, and that we have reached the acme of civilization, it is entirely useless to argue.

But surely no educated man believes that the present conditions are the end of all progress.

That we have not reached the end of our national development is clear. Every new invention and every new political question proves that to us. And it would be sad indeed if we had reached "the end" of political and social reforms while progress is still being made in all other fields of human knowledge.

NOT THE RESULT OF ANY AGITATION

To begin with, it is unnecessary to explain that the Socialist movement is not to be traced to the irresponsible work of individual agitators or eccentric persons.

That was the argument against us when the Socialist movement was young, but now that some 40,000,000 voters throughout the civilized world are enrolled under Socialist standards it could not very well be maintained that all of this is the result of "soap-box oratory."

SEEK OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL

Our aim is as follows:

In regard to political reform, the Socialists demand the rule of the people, i. e., democracy.

On the economic field we demand socialism, i. e., the collective ownership of the social means of production and distribution.

Thus, we seek social democracy—a democracy which is founded on economic independence and upon the political and industrial equality of opportunity for all.

WE ARE NOT SIMPLY "TRUST SMASHERS"

Determined as the Socialists are in their opposition to the present capitalist system of industry, still they never consider the concentration of capital the cause of all evil.

Socialists do not now and never did try to smash the trusts. They always considered the trusts as the natural outcome of capitalist evolution. Socialists always appreciated the advantages of industrial production on a large scale as compared with the small-scale production which preceded it.

We are opposed, however, to the private ownership of these trusts.

WHAT THE TRUSTS MEAN TO-DAY TO EVERYBODY

By remaining in the hands of a few who happen to own and control the trusts, the bulk of the Nation finds itself at the mercy of monopolists. From the cradle to the grave, everyone must pay tribute to these monopolists. Everything the people require—and require as urgently as the air they breathe—is owned by a trust.

We all see it. We all feel it. We all know it.

We also fully understand that the owners of stock in our corporations and trusts—the owners of these sheets and strips of paper—which, under our present system, stand for "capital"—virtually decide how much we shall pay for our meat and our bread, how much for our oil and our coal, and how much we are to spend for our houses, clothing, and so forth.

In other words, they decide how well or how poorly we are to live. In the end, therefore, they really also decide how long or how short a time we are to live.

THE WOLVES SUCCEED BEST

And the wageworkers are not the only sufferers.

With the increase of power and concentration of wealth the educated and professional class depends more and more upon the capitalist class.

Our teachers, professors, speakers, editors, and writers, and ministers, doctors, and other professional men are more and more at the mercy of the capitalist system. There is a continuous increase of the educated proletariat.

College teachers are getting retainers from electric-utility companies. The power magnates, in their conventions, are laughing over the ease with which they are making mouthpieces of the intellectual guides of our young people.

The power trust has many university professors on its pay roll.

A GRAFTER'S WORLD

On the other hand, money making is not a matter of education.

On the contrary, the more vulgar and wolfish the man, the more readily he succeeds.

And wealth, usually expressed in dollars, has become the American deity. The "almighty dollar" is not only a figure of speech. It is by parting with a little share of his wealth that the rich man gets his dangerous powers. It is the monopoly of that which all want—some of which all must have—that makes his power so fearful.

The big grafter, or his heir, writes his check and gets all the good or bad things his heart desires. He gets adulation, professional skill, wine and women, and all the luxuries that money can buy—and the world can furnish. Organized finance in particular is all-powerful.

It is inevitable that under such circumstances wealth should also become the root of all evil. Wealth being the greatest social power, it is naturally the worst of all temptations.

Our present system creates grafters, criminals, thieves, and prostitutes.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE PRESENT TIME

And instinctively the average citizen seems to understand that graft is inherent in the present system and a part of it. This is the reason why "the man on the street"—and especially the business man—passes over the complaint about general corruption with a shrug of his shoulder or with a cynical smile. Recent events have again glaringly proved the old adage that a millionaire can not be found guilty of any crime in America.

It has become almost impossible to convict a grafter before a jury of "his peers"—especially in Washington.

We must change this "Hermesian" psychology, of course, before we can have a better world. I use the word "Hermesian" because Hermes was the god of commerce and thievery for the ancient Greeks.

POLITICIAN TRIES TO GET "HIS" SHARE

It is of greater importance, however, to remove the temptations, the occasions, and the chances for graft. Public ownership, if generally adopted, would do away with most of the chances.

As long as we have swamps we naturally shall have mosquitoes.

And as long as powerful politicians can give away our natural resources to grafting capitalists, these politicians will certainly try to get their share of the swag. And we shall have corruption rampant in our public life.

Punishment alone will never stop it.

GIVING AWAY THE PEOPLE'S INHERITANCE

Therefore, we say that of the many crimes of commission and omission with which the capitalist parties—the Republicans as well as the Democrats—can be charged, the handing over of our wonderful natural resources to greedy exploiters and grasping corporations is the greatest, the most flagrant, and the most indefensible. And it is still going on.

The Republican and the Democratic Parties are equally guilty. This unholy alliance of "big business" and government has the approval of both. And both old parties also oppose public ownership. They both favor a policy that despoils the Nation of its dearest possessions—a policy that corrupts the morals of the people.

PARTIES ACT FROM SELF-INTEREST

These conditions are plainly before us in spite of the smoke screen raised around our present system by its beneficiaries and their hirelings.

What remedy can the old political parties bring to the people?

Parties, like individuals, act from motives of self-interest.

Now both of the old parties are owned by the capitalist class. The capitalist class pays the millions necessary for their political contests. This is a fact no longer denied by the leaders of both Republican and Democratic Parties.

And what can we do about it?

MUST RELY ON EDUCATION, PLUS—

There is only one party in the field standing for the "new idea." There is only one party representing on the political field the necessary outcome of the evolution on the economic field. That is the Socialist Party.

It relies upon education and even more so upon the development of the industrial forces. Both of these factors make for socialism.

WE WANT A PEACEFUL REVOLUTION

The Socialist Party, while its ultimate purpose is to change completely the present economic system, is none the less evolutionary and constructive.

Social reforms are advocated and welcomed by all Socialists for many reasons.

In the first place, by reforms we hope to stop the continued pauperization, and consequently also the degradation of the masses of the people. If real social reforms are seriously taken up and carried out with determination, these reforms will advance our people considerably.

But the main reason for our favoring them is because such reforms, if logically carried out, offer the opportunity of a peaceful, lawful, and orderly transformation of society.

Violent revolutions may happen, of course. But like bloody wars, such revolutions are the worst and most expensive method of accomplishing anything.

APPEAL TO THE BEST IN MAN

The Socialist Party is the only true reform party in existence. We agitate for the organization of the masses. We educate, we enlighten, we reason. Our party is constructive. We appeal to the best in every man, to the public spirit of the citizen, to his love of wife and children.

DESERVES ATTENTION

On April 13, 1928, the national convention of the Socialist Party met in New York City. Delegates from 39 States gathered for a five-day conference on our present political situation, to draft a national platform for the 1928 election, and to nominate its standard bearers for the coming presidential campaign.

As the only political party of nation-wide influence in the country which differs fundamentally from the two old parties, and which has a constructive program worthy of the consideration of all thoughtful citizens, its principles and program deserve more attention.

AS TO "LIGHT WINES AND BEER"

The question of "light wines and beer" was mentioned on the floor of the House this afternoon in connection with the Socialist platform. In all fairness I am bound to admit that VICTOR L. BERGER, of Milwaukee, did propose a plank permitting the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer under proper supervision.

My plank was not adopted. The issue was left to the various States to decide in harmony with the prevailing sentiment at home. Individual Socialist legislators are to vote their own judgment.

The convention took the position that both the Republican and Democratic Parties are under the dictatorship of the Anti-Saloon League and are responsible for bringing about prohibition. The Socialists have never advocated prohibition. The old parties must bear the blame for the horrible and criminal conditions now prevailing.

It was pointed out that the two old parties continue to play football with the liquor question, in order to detract attention from the oil scandals and other evident venality, for which prominent leaders of both old parties stood sponsor.

And it was also predicated that neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party would, therefore, put into its platform a demand for the repeal of prohibition or for the modification of the Volstead Act, but, on the contrary, that both old parties would come out for the continuation of the obvious swindle of "law enforcement."

The national platform adopted at the convention reads as follows:

PLATFORM OF THE SOCIALIST PARTY FOR THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION OF 1928 AS ADOPTED AT THE NATIONAL CONVENTION HELD IN NEW YORK CITY FROM APRIL 13 TO 18, 1927

PREAMBLE

We Americans are told that we live in the most prosperous country in the world. Certainly our natural resources, our mechanical equipment, our physical power, the technical capacity of our engineers, and the skill of our workers in farm and factory make it possible for us to attain a level of well-being of which our fathers never dared to dream.

Yet poverty abounds. The owners of our natural resources and industrial equipment and the Government, which they have made virtually their tool, have not given us plenty, freedom, or peace in any such degree as we have the right and duty to demand.

Men are hungry while farmers go bankrupt for lack of effective demand for food. Tenant farming has reached a proportion of almost 40 per cent; more than 40 per cent of the value of farm lands is covered by mortgages.

Industrial workers are scarcely better off. In good years there are at least 1,000,000 unemployed. By a conservative estimate in these times of stock-market prosperity the number has risen 4,000,000.

About one-third of those of our population 65 years of age and upward are at least partially dependent upon some form of charity. While real wages have risen for certain groups, they have risen scarcely more than half the increase in the productive power of the workers. And what gains have been made are far from universal, as the misery of textile workers and the tragedy of the coal fields—to cite only two examples—abundantly prove.

In fact, at the present time a majority of workers obtain a wage insufficient to maintain themselves and families in health and decency. Furthermore, the rapid increase in the use of machinery and the growing intensity of work are leading to quicker exhaustion and to ever greater insecurity.

Not only plenty and freedom but peace is endangered by this system under which the many are exploited for the profit of the few. Some of the workers now die in President Coolidge's infamous little imperialistic war in Nicaragua, as they died in President Wilson's similar wars in Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Mexico; and above all in that great imperialistic war born of the trade and financial rivalries of the nations which cost our country tens of thousands of lives and tens of billions of dollars.

Meanwhile, the owning classes have been using the Government to curtail the power of the workers whose organized might, especially through their unions, has been chiefly responsible for whatever material gains they have made. To curb the workers, civil liberties are denied, injunctions are invoked against union activities, and the courts are made the instruments of that class justice of which the Mooney case and the legalized murder of Sacco and Vanzetti were conspicuous examples.

From the wars, waste, and cruelty of a system where the rightful heritage of the workers is the private property of the few, only the united efforts of farmers and workers of hand and brain, through their cooperatives, unions, and political party can save us. We must make government in cities, States, and Nation the servant of the people. That requires our own political party. We can not place our trust in "good men" or political Messiahs.

Bitter experience has proved that we can not trust the alternate rule of the Republican and Democratic Parties. They belong to the landlords, bankers, oil speculators, coal and power barons; in short, to the capitalist class which finances them. Under their control, the Government, by what it does and leaves undone, by its calculated inefficiency as well as its repression and corruption, makes our alleged democracy largely an illusion.

Corruption is natural under parties which are the tools of the forces of privilege. It has become accepted even by the men who are victims of it.

These things need not be. The Socialist Party offers itself as the political party of the producing classes, the workers in farm, factory, mine, or office. It is our political weapon in the class struggle, and in its triumph lies our hope of ending that struggle. Our record proves our good faith. As the only democratic labor party in the United States, we stand now as always, in America and in all lands, for the collective ownership of natural resources and basic industries and their democratic management for the use and benefit of all instead of the private profit of the privileged few.

With this ultimate aim in view the Socialist Party enters the presidential campaign of 1928 with the following program:

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AND CONSERVATION

To recover the rightful heritage of the people we propose:

1. Nationalization of our natural resources, beginning with the coal mines and water sites, particularly at Boulder Dam and Muscle Shoals.

2. A publicly owned giant power system under which the Federal Government shall cooperate with the States and municipalities in the distribution of electrical energy to the people at cost. Only when public agencies have full control over the generation, transmission, and distribution of electrical power can the consumers be guaranteed against exploitation by the great electrical interests of the country. Public ownership of these and other industries must include employee representation in the management, and the principle of collective bargaining must be recognized.

3. National ownership and democratic management of railroads and other means of transportation and communication.

4. An adequate national program for flood control and flood relief, reforestation, irrigation, and reclamation.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

To relieve the tragic misery of millions of unemployed workers and their families we propose:

1. The immediate governmental relief of the unemployed by extension of all public works and a program of long-range planning of public works following the present depression. All persons thus employed to be engaged at hours and wages fixed by bona fide labor unions.

2. Loans to States and municipalities for the purpose of carrying on public works and the taking of such other measures as will lessen widespread misery.

3. A system of unemployment insurance.

4. The nation-wide extension of public employment agencies in cooperation with city federations of labor.

LABOR LEGISLATION

The lives and well-being of the producers and their families should be the first charge on society. We therefore urge:

1. A system of health and accident insurance and of old-age pensions, as well as unemployment insurance. As long as the workers are dependent primarily upon their employers rather than on the community for protection against the exigencies of old age, sickness, accident, and unemployment, employers hostile or indifferent to the labor movement will be able to use their private insurance schemes as powerful weapons against organized labor.

2. Shortening the workday in keeping with the steadily increasing productivity of labor due to improvements in machinery and methods.

3. Securing to every worker a rest period of no less than two days in each week.

4. Enacting of an adequate Federal antichild labor amendment.

5. Abolition of the brutal exploitation of convicts under the contract system and substitution of a cooperative organization of industries in penitentiaries and workshops for the benefit of convicts and their dependents, the products to be used in public institutions, and the convict workers to be employed at wages current in the industry.

6. Legislation aiming at the prevention of occupational diseases.

TAXATION

For the proper support of Government and as a step toward social justice we propose:

1. Increase of taxation on high income levels, of corporation taxes and inheritance taxes, the proceeds to be used for old-age pensions and other forms of social insurance.

2. Appropriation by taxation of the annual rental value of all land held for speculation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES

To secure to the people the civil rights without which democracy is impossible we demand:

1. Federal legislation to enforce the first amendment to the Constitution so as to guarantee effectually freedom of speech, press, and assembly, and to penalize any official who interferes with the civil rights of any citizen.

2. Abolition of injunctions in labor disputes.

3. Repeal of the espionage law and of other repressive legislation and restoration of civil and political rights to those unjustly convicted under war-time laws, with reimbursement for time served.

4. Legislation protecting foreign-born workers from deportation and from refusal of citizenship on account of political opinions.

5. Modification of immigration laws to permit the reuniting of families and to offer a refuge for those fleeing from political or religious persecution.

6. Abolition of detective agencies engaged in interstate business.

ANTILYNCHING

As a measure of protection for the oppressed, especially for our negro fellow-citizens, we propose:

Enactment of the Berger antilynching bill, making participation in lynching a felony.

POLITICAL DEMOCRACY

The Constitution of the United States was drafted in 1787 and was designed to meet conditions utterly different from those prevailing to-day. In order to make our form of government better suited to the exigencies of the times we propose the immediate calling of a constitutional convention.

A modernized Constitution should provide, among other things, for the election of the President and Vice President by direct popular vote of the people, for reduction of the representation in Congress of those States where large sections of the citizens are disfranchised by force or fraud, for proportional representation, and for the abolition of the usurped power of the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation enacted by Congress.

CREDIT AND BANKING

For our emancipation from the money trust we propose:

Nationalization of the banking and currency system, beginning with extension of the service of the postal-savings banks to cover every department of the banking business.

FARM RELIEF

The Socialist Party believes that the farmer is entitled to special consideration because of the importance of agriculture, because of the farmers' present economic plight, and because the farmer is unable to control the prices of what he buys and what he sells. Many of the party's demands, including public development of electrical energy, nationalization of coal and railroads, and reform of the credit system, will be of distinct benefit to the farmer.

As a further means of agricultural relief we propose:

1. Acquisition by bona fide cooperative societies and by Federal, State, and municipal governments of grain elevators, stockyards, storage warehouses, and other distributing agencies and the conduct of these services on a nonprofit basis.

2. Encouragement of farmers' cooperative purchasing and marketing societies and of credit agencies.

3. Social insurance against losses due to adverse weather conditions, such as hail, drought, cyclone, and flood.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

We are unalterably opposed to imperialism and militarism, therefore we propose:

1. Immediate withdrawal of American forces from Nicaragua and abandonment of the policy of military intervention in Central America and other countries.

2. That all private loans and investments of American citizens in foreign countries shall be made at the sole risk of the bondholders and investors. The United States Government shall not resort to any military or other coercive intervention with foreign countries for the protection of such loans and investments.

3. Cancellation of all war debts due the United States from its former associated powers on condition of a simultaneous cancellation of all interallied debts, and a corresponding remission of the reparation obligations of the Central Powers, and on the further condition that our debtors reduce their military expenditures below pre-war level. The Socialist Party especially denounces the debt-settling policy of our Government in favoring the Fascist dictatorship of Italy and thereby helping to perpetuate the political enslavement of the Italian nation.

4. Recognizing both the services and the limitations of the League of Nations—the need of revision of its covenant and of the treaty of Versailles—we unite with the workers of Europe in demanding that the league be made all inclusive and democratic, and that the machinery for the revision of the peace treaties under article 19 of the covenant be elaborated and made effective. We favor the entry of the United States into the League of Nations at the time and under the conditions which will further these causes and promote the peace of the world.

5. The recognition of the Russian Government.

6. Aggressive activity against militarism, against the large Navy and Army program of our present administration, and in behalf of international disarmament.

7. Treaties outlawing war and the substitution of peaceful methods for the settlement of international disputes.

8. Independence of the Philippines on terms agreed upon in negotiations with the Filipinos, autonomy for Porto Rico, and civil government for the Virgin Islands.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time, and will extend my speech in the RECORD. [Applause.]

LAGRANGE GROCERY CO.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Private Calendar following the one where we stopped at half past one.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7895) for the relief of the Lagrange Grocery Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That inasmuch as the Lagrange Grocery Co., of Lagrange, Ga., on February 6, 1922, at the Candler Warehouse, Atlanta, Ga., bought from the United States Government 50,000 pairs of wool stockings at 10½ cents per pair, and 60,000 pairs of wool stockings at 10½ cents per pair, under sales contracts Nos. Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I might say that the House Joint Resolution 244 was passed by this House several days ago. In that resolution there was an error in date, the words "the month of June" having been inserted where "the month of January" should have been inserted. This House concurrent resolution which I offer is for the purpose of recalling that resolution so that it may be amended.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When was that joint resolution passed?

Mr. CARTER. On the 11th day of this month, on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us see. It is a law now, is it not?

THE INVENTION OF THE AIRPLANE

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the invention of the airplane and with reference to the House joint resolution providing for an investigation of the placing of proper credit for the invention, introduced by my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN], and to include therein a letter from Mr. Orville Wright, one of the inventors, to the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution and his reply.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, under leave this day unanimously granted by the House, I present these observations. I, with many others, regret that it has been found necessary to intrust the custody of the first airplane to a museum in a foreign country rather than to the Smithsonian Institution in our own country, where scientific research and genius brought to realization the dreams of centuries, where aerial navigation has opened a new and great field of transportation, brought the peoples of the earth into closer communion and understanding, and advanced civilization by an enormous bound in our own day.

In view of the fact that our colleague from South Carolina has introduced in this House Joint Resolution 224 for the appointment of a commission to investigate and determine what was the first successful heavier-than-air flying machine, it may be interesting to know how the zeal of a successor of the learned Scientist Samuel Pierpont Langley, as Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to extend the credit of Langley beyond anything which he claimed and anything that was justified, has brought humiliation to America and a lack of confidence in the integrity of the management of our great scientific institution.

Professor Langley was an earnest and enthusiastic scientific worker who believed that the airplane was possible. The Wright brothers acknowledged an indebtedness to him for inspiration and encouragement in their scientific research work in aerodynamics and its practical application to the navigation of the air. Professor Langley's scientific investigations were incomplete and inaccurate. The demonstration of the unreliability of his calculations was among the great discouragements of the Wright brothers. It has been claimed that the Langley plane, which collapsed and was wrecked twice in launching, could have flown. It is even claimed that it was repaired and flown after the death of Professor Langley and many years after the Wright brothers had perfected their invention.

The Langley plane never flew and never could have flown. After changes in the engine and changes in the structure of the plane in the application of subsequent discoveries, the original plane remodeled in the light of later knowledge made some successful hops or short flights but never sustained itself in the air under its own power until not only changes were made in the structure of the plane, but a new and more powerful and more modern motor was substituted for the original.

One of the brothers, Wilbur Wright, is dead. The other brother, Orville Wright, still survives, subject to continued suffering from the injuries received in the fall in which Lieutenant Selfridge was killed, a martyr to one of the greatest inventions of all times.

While witnesses are living and the truth can be readily ascertained, it is most fitting that an impartial investigation may be had. It should determine and record for the ages to come the facts in regard to the scientific research which made the airplane possible and to whom and in what degree credit should be given.

The world rings with applause for the feats of courage in the air of Rickenbacker, Alcock, Browne, Byrd, Lindbergh, Macready, and a host of others. The people have become aroused to the wonders of navigation of the air. We do not realize or appreciate the indomitable spirit of Wilbur and Orville Wright persevering over discouragement and ridicule in quest of the coefficient of air pressure on plane and cambered surfaces moving through the air. How to escape from a tail-spin now is a matter of common knowledge with every competent airplane pilot, but the world should learn and thrill with the experience of Orville Wright who was swept into a tail-spin with his plane in those early days of this century with nothing but his innate genius and coolness to save him from crashing death.

A Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution has been responsible for incorrect statements which have been spread broadcast and tend to belittle the achievements of the Wright brothers.

That the House may understand something of the situation, I insert the letter of the surviving brother, Orville Wright, addressed to the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution on May 14, 1925, asking merely for a fair investigation, and the reply of the chancellor as follows:

MAY 14, 1925.

MY DEAR CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT: You have already heard, no doubt, of the newspaper controversy between Doctor Walcott and myself, precipitated by the leaking out of my intention to send our first airplane, which flew on the 17th of December, 1903, to the Science Museum at South Kensington, London.

I shall be very sorry if this controversy in which the Smithsonian Institution is so intimately involved, should cause you personally any pain or embarrassment. I have not, for an instant, thought that you were in any way responsible for what has occurred, or that you would countenance the acts of some of the Smithsonian officials when you learn the facts concerning them.

As far back as 1910 my brother and I realized that the officials of the Smithsonian could not be impartial in a matter in which a former secretary had been concerned. I inclose correspondence of that date. The markings in red are mine. We saw clearly then that our original machine, which had successfully flown in 1903, was not wanted in the National Museum, because it would overshadow the 1903 Langley machine which had failed to fly. But we did not at that time dream that these officials would go so far as to lend the prestige of the institution for the private purposes of parties to patent litigation.

There would have been no objection to an honest effort to prove that the original Langley machine was capable of sustained free flight. No such effort was ever made. The objection is to the manner in which the so-called tests were conducted. I can enumerate over 20 changes made at Hammondsport, all of which were of more or less importance. I can name three or four which were of vital importance. The wings of the Langley machine collapsed in 1903, not on account of a defect in the launching device, as Professor Langley thought, but because the trussing of the wings, due to the lack of knowledge at that time of the location of the center of pressure, was improperly placed. This trussing was moved 30 inches at Hammondsport to correct that error. One other feature of vital importance which could have made the difference between success and failure was the change made in the camber of the wings. The camber of the wings used in 1903 was 1 to 12; that used at Hammondsport in 1914 was 1 to 18. This change improves the dynamic efficiency of a wing over 30 per cent.

There has been no trouble in exposing before a patent court the fraudulent character of the Hammondsport tests; but there has been great trouble in exposing it before the public. An announcement by the Curtiss Co. that the original Langley machine had been flown at the Curtiss factory at Hammondsport in June, 1914, would have carried no weight with the public. Curtiss was known as the defeated defendant in patent litigation, and his announcement of such a flight would have been looked upon with suspicion. But when the reports of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution says, "The original Langley man-carrying flying machine has been brought back from Hammondsport, after several successful flights, and is exhibited in the National Museum," and when the report of the National Museum says the original Langley machine "without modification" was flown at Hammondsport, these reports carried great weight, and were not questioned by the public.

A denial of these statements by me might have been looked upon by the public as a jealous attack upon the work of a man who was dead. As the result of this situation, I remained silent for years. Doctor Langley himself would never have countenanced tests of the character of those made at Hammondsport.

It was not until 1921 that I became convinced that the officials of the Smithsonian, at least Doctor Walcott, were fully acquainted with the character of the tests at Hammondsport. I had thought up to that time that they might have been ignorant of the fundamental changes which had been incorporated in the machine before these tests were made, and that when these changes were pointed out to them they would hasten to correct their erroneous reports. They did not do this, but have continued to repeat their early statements. By these the public has been led to think that flights were made in 1914 with the original Langley machine, with no changes excepting such as were necessary to attach floats for the new system of launching.

When the proofs on both sides concerning these changes are shown I do not think it will take you five minutes to make up your mind whether the changes were made and whether they were of importance.

It seems to me possible that you, as chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution, may wish me to present personally to you my evidence on these points and to have Doctor Walcott present at the same time to give his proofs to the contrary. It may be a way of cutting short a long and bitter controversy.

Respectfully yours,

ORVILLE WRIGHT.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Chief Justice of the United States.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1925.

Mr. ORVILLE WRIGHT,
Dayton, Ohio.

MY DEAR MR. WRIGHT: I am nominally the head of the board of the Smithsonian Institution, but my duties are such as to make it impossible for me to give any real attention to the questions which have to be settled by the secretary of the board. I have so much to do in the work of our court that I could not give the time to look into the issues which you raise. I am sorry that there is the slightest controversy in respect to the matter to which you refer, and should be glad to help straighten it out if I had the time and opportunity, but it is impossible for me to make any attempt in that direction.

Sincerely yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have here certain letters in the nature of petitions which I desire to lay before the Senate with a brief word of explanation.

The distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] yesterday discussed at length his proposal for the long-range planning of public works as a means to utilize the spending power of the Government when periods of economic depression need stimulating offset. Shorn of its self-serving political preliminaries, the Senator's economic philosophy greatly interests me. He will find it already embodied in the Jones bill (S. 2475) to create a prosperity reserve and to stabilize industry and employment by the expansion of public works during periods of unemployment and industrial depression. He will find it also in the Kenyon bill as drawn by the distinguished former Senator from Iowa in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress. The Jones bill is now pending on the calendar. By all means it should be passed, so that the basic principle may be established. Subsequently, in my judgment, the principle should be extended.

It is my contention that when economic depression reaches a point where it is advisable to invoke this stimulus of extra public work we also have reached a point where such public work should be financed by a temporary diversion of a portion of the annual sinking fund rather than by increased taxation, which of itself would hurt rather than help in such an emergency. It is upon this point that I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD certain excerpts from letters which I have received upon this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpts are as follows:

Excerpts from letter dated April 16, 1928, at Ann Arbor, Mich., and addressed to Senator VANDENBERG by Gardner S. Williams, of the American Engineering Council

I personally am prepared to indorse your proposition without reserve—namely, the temporary diversion of sinking funds to finance enhanced public works which are undertaken as an offset to emergency periods of unemployment and depression—and will submit it to the American Engineering Council, with whose view in the matter it is more in harmony than the text of the present bill.

It has been our thought that the execution of public works should be slowed down in times of prosperity and extended in times of cessation of industry without provision of a special fund, the adjustment being in the hands of those controlling the works. There are, of course, objections to the latter proposition, and I think that your suggestion accomplishes the same result as would ours.

Excerpts from letter to Senator VANDENBERG, dated April 17, 1928, at Framingham, Mass., by Henry S. Dennison

Your proposal is, it seems to me, highly practical. The psychology of it is obviously good, though, like all questions of psychology, it would be subject to the sometimes quick changes of background, to which, however, you, being on the ground, would be fully sensitive.

Considered from a purely economic viewpoint, the main question is whether public work undertaken during times of depression should be financed out of the next year's taxes or by borrowing. For, in economic effect, though not in psychologic effect, to fail by a hundred million to increase the "sinking fund" for the retirement of public debt would be the same as to provide full "sinking fund" and borrow another hundred million. I feel certain that no categorical answer applicable to all times and conditions can be given to this question. It depends upon a judgment at a given moment as to whether it is better for the Government to compete, as it were, with business for the capital or income of the country. When interest rates are low and profits not too free, borrowing would be indicated, and that is, roughly, the state of affairs at the moment. During times of expansion, however, interest rates tend to be high and profits good. Then it is better to tax. Of course, some other considerations enter, but this, I think, is the bald, primary statement of the case.

Since the record of the past has shown that periods of unemployment may come in almost any state of the money market, and since profits are likely to be on the low side during such periods, and especially since, whatever the previous state of the money market, there is a tendency toward low interest rates during times of depression, it follows that to take extra public works out of Government borrowing rather than out of taxes will more often be wise. If, however, it is found better actually to set aside funds to be drawn upon during times of depression, then those funds could be accumulated in either way that at the time of their accumulation best suited business conditions.

To sum up, then, I think your proposition is economically sound in almost all likely situations, and, in the situation of the moment, is decidedly wise, both economically and psychologically. You will, however, I am sure, be prepared to meet the superficial objections which were thrown at the similar proposition in Great Britain and served temporarily to defeat it, to wit, that borrowing to "make work" was like paper-money financing—unsound and dangerous. The point lies, of course, in the assumption that the work itself will be unsound; but in such a case it is just as bad to tax to get the funds as it is to borrow, and unsound public work is even worse in times of prosperity; bad in either case. This superficial argument depends upon the fear that the legislating bodies will be carried away by sentiment.

Excerpt from letter to Senator VANDENBERG dated April 13 at Philadelphia, Pa., from ex-Senator George Wharton Pepper

I can not think of any objection that is sound in theory to the proposal that you make respecting the suspension of payment into the sinking fund simultaneously with and to an extent equal to emergency appropriations to avert unemployment. I agree with you that it is economically sound to say that when we are making emergency appropriations for such a purpose we are not in shape to indulge in the luxury or debt reduction. I am quite sure that all of us who have been interested in this legislation would heartily approve of a modification of the bill on the lines which you suggest if this were to prove satisfactory to Secretary Mellon and Senator JONES.

Excerpt from letter to Senator VANDENBERG written April 20, 1928, at New York City, by John B. Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation

I do not think your suggestion is visionary. On the contrary, I believe it is economically sound and, subject to the everlasting necessity of also being "expedient" in legislation, it is worthy of the most serious consideration whenever this question of financing the long-range planning of public works is up for discussion. We want the principle adopted now without fail, and any incidental improvement is highly desirable where practicable.

A large number of thoughtful citizens look upon this (the Jones bill) as a reasonable measure of preparedness which we may reasonably expect to be taken at this session of Congress as one important step in the constructive program for dealing with some future period of industrial depression.

ST. CLAIR RIVER, PORT HURON, MICH.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11404) authorizing the Port Huron, Sarnia, Point Edward International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich., and I submit a report (No. 856) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the report.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the bill has the unanimous approval of the House of Representatives, of the Senate Commerce Committee, of all the departments involved, and relates to a bridge over the St. Clair River. The element of time is exceedingly vital. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate international commerce and improve the Postal Service the Port Huron, Sarnia, Point Edward International Bridge Co., a Michigan corporation, hereinafter referred to as the company, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Clair River, so far as the United States has jurisdiction over the waters of such river, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between a point at or near the city of Port Huron, St. Clair County, State of Michigan, and a point at or near the city of Sarnia, Province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and in so far as the company, its successors or assigns, may act in the Dominion of Canada, subject also to the approval of the proper authorities thereof.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the said company, its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property in the State of Michigan needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches, as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of Michigan, upon making just compensation therefor to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said company, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. Such bridge shall be constructed in accordance with the standard specifications adopted by the American Association of State Highway Officials. During the construction of such bridge all work thereon shall be subject to inspection and approval by the State Highway Department of Michigan.

SEC. 5. The said company, its successors and assigns, shall not encumber said bridge by the issue of stocks, bonds, notes, mortgages, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness in an amount which, including all previous encumbrances whether retired or still outstanding, shall at any time exceed in the aggregate the cost as reported to and determined by the Secretary of War in accordance with section 8 hereof. Not less than two-thirds of all encumbrances or securities other than preferred stock issued against said bridge shall be first mortgage bonds, and not more than one-third may be debentures. None of said bonds issued against said bridge shall be sold for less than 92 per cent of their par value nor bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 6½ per cent per annum. None of said debentures issued against said bridge shall be sold for less than 90 per cent of their par value nor bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 7 per cent per annum. Any preferred stock issued shall be at par plus accrued dividend, shall represent value, and shall be entitled to cumulative dividends at not to exceed 7 per cent per annum.

SEC. 6. The proceeds from tolls charged for the use of such bridge shall be used: First, to pay the maintenance, repair, and operation costs; second, to pay dividends or interest on outstanding preferred stocks, bonds, notes, mortgages, debentures, or other obligations issued by the company, its successors and assigns; and, third, 20 per cent of any funds then remaining shall be retained for corporate uses by the said company, its successors and assigns, and the other 80 per cent thereof shall be applied by said company, its successors and assigns, in the purchase and retirement in accordance with section 5 hereof of said bonds, debentures, preferred stock, or other outstanding obligations legally incurred against said bridge. At the close of the fiscal year when all bonds, debentures, preferred stock, or other obligations legally incurred against said bridge shall have been retired in accordance herewith such bridge and the approaches thereto and all structures, property, property rights, and franchises, so far as the same are located within the United States, shall be conveyed by the said company, its successors and assigns, without cost or expense, to the State of Michigan or to such municipality or agency of the State of Michigan as the legislature of said State may designate, and so far as the same is situated within the Dominion of Canada shall be conveyed, without cost or expense, to the Dominion of Canada or to such Province, municipality, or agency thereof as the Dominion of Canada may designate, and all right, title, and interest of said company, its successors and assigns, therein shall then cease and determine. After said outstanding obligations of the company have been retired, said 80 per cent of the net earnings shall be held by the company and half thereof shall be turned over to the State of Michigan, or its designated municipality or agency, and half to the Dominion of Canada, or its designated municipality or agency, at the same time as the bridge is turned over. The rates of toll, if any, shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. If said bridge shall not have become the property of the State of Michigan and the Dominion of Canada, or such agencies as may be authorized by them, in accordance with the provisions of this section, within 20 years after the date that it is completed and formally opened to traffic, the said State of Michigan and the Dominion of Canada, or such agencies as may be authorized by them, shall have the additional right at any time thereafter to acquire said bridge by purchase and retirement, at par plus accrued interest or dividends, of the legally authorized obligations then outstanding against same.

SEC. 7. The said company, its successors and assigns, shall keep an accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for operating, repairing, and maintaining the bridge, the daily traffic, and the tolls collected, and shall annually submit to the State Highway Department of Michigan and to the Department of Public Highways of the Province of Ontario a sworn itemized statement showing the traffic, the tolls collected, the maintenance, repair, and operation costs, the net earnings, interest, and dividend payments, and the stock, bonds, notes, mortgages, debentures, or other obligations retired during the preceding fiscal year. The State Highway Department of Michigan and the Department of Public Highways of Ontario shall have access at any time to all records, files, and books of the said company, it successors and assigns. The mayor of the city of Port Huron, State of Michigan, and the mayor of the city of Sarnia, Province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, ex officio, shall be entitled to receive notice of and attend meetings of the board of directors of any company or corporation now existing or hereafter organized and having the control and operation of said bridge.

SEC. 8. The said company, its successors and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of Michigan a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches; the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real or other property; interest during construction; and the actual financing costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the total of said items. The Secretary of War may, and upon request of the Highway Department of the State of Michigan shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual costs of constructing and financing such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said company, its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction and financing thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the costs of the construction and financing of the bridge shall be conclusive for all purposes mentioned in this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake. A report of the maintenance, repair, and operation costs of said bridge shall be submitted by the said company, its successors and assigns, at the end of each six-month period to the State Highway Department of Michigan and to the Department of Public Highways of the Province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada. If any class of expenditures therein is disapproved by said highway departments, or either of them, such class of expenditures shall not thereafter, without approval, be an obligation payable out of the proceeds of tolls collected for the use of such bridge. Reconstruction or betterment costs in excess of $10,000 in any fiscal year must be submitted to and be approved as necessary and reasonable by the State Highway Department of Michigan and the Department of Public Highways of the Province of Ontario prior to incurring the expenditures therefor, and all betterment and reconstruction costs, duly approved if such approval is required, and actually made may be added to the cost of the bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War in accordance with the provisions of this section, and in order to meet the cost thereof additional obligations or encumbrances not in excess of the amount approved for such reconstruction and betterments actually made plus necessary financing costs, not exceeding 10 per cent, may be issued against said bridge.

SEC. 9. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the said company, its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same, subject to the terms and conditions of this act, as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 10. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF ESTATE TAX ON ESTATE OF JOHN SEALY

Mr. THOMAS. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4166) to remit estate tax on the estate of John Sealy, and I submit a report (No. 863) thereon. I will say that the bill, I think, will occasion no discussion, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to remit the tax imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1924, as amended, upon the transfer of the net estate of John Sealy, late a resident of Galveston, Tex., who died on February 19, 1926.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the bill has been reported unanimously by the committee?

Mr. KING. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. It is to remit the tax on a charitable donation given by Mr. John Sealy to a hospital in Galveston, Tex.

Mr. JONES. Is it a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. THOMAS. It is.

Mr. JONES. How much does it involve?

Mr. THOMAS. The facts are that a bequest to a hospital was made by Mr. Sealy, who died 12 days before the tax law of 1926 became effective. Because of that fact his bequest will be taxed under the 1924 tax law.

Mr. JONES. I notice that the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SMOOT] is present, so I will not make any objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not understand that the consideration of this bill will in any way displace the naval appropriation bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. If the consideration of this bill shall in any way interfere with the naval appropriation bill, we shall ask that it go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD an editorial from this morning's Washington Herald entitled "How Power Trust uses newspapers."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW POWER TRUST USES NEWSPAPERS

It is pretty to watch how the Power Trust gets hold of newspapers and uses them to block congressional action on Boulder Dam.

The Chicago Tribune, one of the leading newspapers of the country, is an illustration, brought out in the current investigation of the "electric-power industry," by the Federal Trade Commission.

On January 27, 1927, a rush telegram was sent out from New York to mobilize public opinion against the Boulder Dam bill, whose passage was then threatening.

The telegram was signed by George Oxley, publicity director of the National Electric Light Association, then the propaganda organization of the private power interests in the United States.

The telegram was received by many local publicity directors in the country, among then B. J. Mullaney, of Chicago, chairman of the Illinois Committee on Public-Utility Information.

On January 27, the same day, Mullaney instructed his assistant, McGregor, to get busy. The instructions ended:

"Perhaps Harper Leech can be interested. Perhaps some of the financial editors or reporters can be interested and then helped to get an interview out of some prominent citizen, banker, or otherwise, from the viewpoint of keeping the Government out of business."

Harper Leech was and is a feature writer on the Chicago Tribune. Well, they got Harper Leech interested. He is still interested and writing against Boulder Dam with material the private power people are furnishing him.

That is made quite clear in a letter written on March 21, 1928, less than a month ago, from McGregor to Maj. J. S. F. Richardson, of the Joint Committee of National Utility Associations, 420 Lexington Avenue, New York. Major Richardson's committee has replaced the National Electric Light Association as the official power company propaganda organization to fight Boulder Dam. McGregor writes:

MARCH 21, 1928.

DEAR MAJOR RICHARDSON: Harper Leech, of the Chicago Tribune (he who wrote as "Scrutator"), is working on a series of articles about the electric light and power industry and is obtaining quite a bit of data through this office.

Now he is on the track of Boulder Dam. He wants to know if the construction of Boulder Dam in accordance with the Swing-Johnson bill would back the water up over any other feasible dam sites for a power supply.

Also he has an idea—from some information he has obtained—that the whole Boulder Dam is a Los Angeles real-estate promotion affair. He would like to have any data that might be had to back up that theory.

I'll appreciate it if you'll have some one wire me to-morrow (Thursday), if possible, the answer to the first question, and let me know if you can send me any data to support the real-estate promotion idea.

Also, what is the latest developments, theories, etc., concerning the proposition—material that might help him.

Best wishes.

Sincerely,

R. R. MCGREGOR.

Did they get the information to Mr. Leech?

Well, the Chicago Tribune of April 5, 1928, presents Mr. Leech's article with the foreword:

"The Tribune presents a second article on the Boulder Dam, the giant water development project which is causing a hard fight in Congress."

The meat of the Leech story is in its headline: "Great clamor for a United States built Boulder Dam. Los Angeles real-estate boom awaits." The final paragraph of Mr. Leech's article reads:

"But no matter what the ultimate problems would be, the psychological effect of a Federal authorization and appropriation for Boulder Dam would be certain. A great boom in real-estate values not only in the Los Angeles region but in all of the area affected by the project would start as soon as the President signed the bill. They know a boom when they see one in the Southwest, and they can see one a long way off."

The Chicago Tribune editorial writer picked up Mr. Leech's contention that Boulder Dam was a Los Angeles real-estate proposition, and in the newspaper's lead editorial of April 16 he wrote:

"We are persuaded that the Boulder Dam proposal should be defeated. The expenditure of $125,000,000 of the taxpayers' money, primarily for the benefit of real-estate speculators, would be worse than unwise. It would be a scandal as odious as Teapot Dome."

We do not believe that the Chicago Tribune, or its eminent editors, knew that the paper was being used by the private power companies to play their game.

We believe that the resentment of the public should be turned merely against the insidious methods of the Power Trust organization, intent upon diverting newspapers from their proper function of protecting the public, and, instead, making them the mouthpieces of private monopoly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAINE to insert, after line 17, page 53, the following proviso:

Provided, That after December 25, 1928, none of the appropriations made in this act shall be used to pay any expenses incurred in connection with acts of hostility against a friendly foreign nation, or any belligerent intervention in the affairs of a foreign nation, or any intervention in the domestic affairs of any foreign nation, unless war has been declared by Congress or unless a state of war actually exists under recognized principles of international law.

The word "acts of hostility" and the words "belligerent intervention" shall include within their meaning the employment of coercion or force in the collection of any pecuniary claim or any claim or right to any grant or concession for or on behalf of any private citizen, copartnership, or corporation of the United States against the government of a foreign nation, either upon the initiation of the Government of the United States or upon the invitation of any foreign government existing de jure or de facto.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the naval appropriation bill, having to do with the marines in Nicaragua, has attracted much attention and brought about much debate. The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] admitted that mistakes had been made undoubtedly, probably based upon misinformation which had been given to the State Department and the executive department. I think that is undoubtedly true.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] also in his remarks yesterday admitted that blunders had been made in regard to the attitude of our administration, or at least its action, with reference to the marines in Nicaragua. He especially thought that a blunder had been made in withdrawing the marines from Nicaragua some months ago because, he said, a revolution was started after that withdrawal.

Looking at the situation from the outside, it seems as if the withdrawal of the marines, if it was a blunder, was based upon misinformation given by some of the financial interests of Wall Street, because it turned out apparently to their advantage. I am not accusing the administration of being connected in any way or working in combination with the Wall Street interests, but it seemed to work out that way. There was an assistant in the State Department who had been an employee of one of the big Wall Street firms, who afterwards left the employ of the State Department and went back to the New York firm after some deals were put across for the benefit of the big New York financial interests.

The revolution which took place in Nicaragua while the marines were out would indicate that the Liberals seemed to be getting the advantage and were gaining pretty rapidly. Of course, after deals were made which gave some of the financial interests in this country practical control of the railroads and banking and power interests of Nicaragua, it was time again to send the marines in to stop the revolution and protect the Government under President Diaz, which everyone seems to admit was absolutely without any authority, at least legal authority, until he was recognized by the United States and the marines were sent down there to protect him.

In view of all the mixed-up situation we have gotten into through our attempts to protect property by means of our soldiers and marines, it seems to me that the logical way out of the whole difficulty might be to outlaw the whole war proposition.

It was admitted here on yesterday by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] that we are in a state of war with Nicaragua to-day. I think there is no doubt about that. Although Congress has never authorized it, yet there seems to be a state of war, and, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] so ably set forth a couple of days ago, it would seem almost impracticable and impossible to withdraw the marines from Nicaragua at the present time because of conditions existing there, which, the chances are, if the marines were withdrawn, would go from bad to worse. So I suppose the marines will have to be left in Nicaragua at least until after the election in that country shall have been held. Notwithstanding that, I believe the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is a good one, and that it should be adopted.

It occurs to me, however, that the thing to do, the step to take, in order to avoid future trouble of this kind is to prevent all war and, if possible, to make war legally impossible. So I want to address the Senate on Senate Joint Resolution 1, which provides for the outlawing of all war. Judging from the communications I have received from practically every State in the Union in reference to the joint resolution, I believe that the great majority of the people to-day, if they were given an opportunity to vote on the subject, would vote for outlawing war, to make war impossible; and if Congress is willing to give the people a chance to express themselves, through their State legislatures and otherwise, upon this important question, I think there can be no doubt that the outcome will be the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which is proposed by the joint resolution.

Mr. President, the amendment to the Constitution proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 1 would make it legally impossible for the United States to commit the greatest crime known to man. It would outlaw war.

I believe in the proposed amendment to our Constitution because I do not want to be a party to the crime of war; because I am unwilling that the Nation to which I belong, for which I am in part responsible, shall ever again commit that crime.

No compromise is possible. We must either outlaw war and take the consequences, whatever they may be, or be ready for the next war and take the consequences, whatever they may be. There is no middle ground. It has been aptly said that—either civilization must destroy war or war will destroy civilization.

I am for the outlawing of war, believing that is the humane way of safety and sanity. It is the only way which can be taken by those who see in war a denial of Christianity and civilization, a denial of the survival of all that gives value to the work of men and of nations.

We have talked peace, but we have not repudiated war. We entered and fought a war to end war and then began to prepare at once for the "next war." We have made gestures of good will and killed Nicaraguans. We have gone to disarmament conferences and talked about the size of battleships and the elevation of guns. Colonel Lindbergh has been our envoy of international friendship, yet the very boys who seek to emulate him are being forced to take military training in our schools and colleges so that, whenever friendship fails, killing can begin.

This is both inconsistent and hypocritical, and unworthy of the American people. There is neither principle nor common sense in such a mixture.

The proposed amendment is a definite, uncompromising repudiation of war by the United States. It makes war an outlaw, depriving it, the enemy of law, of all legal sanction and prestige, of all the protection and support which our Constitution now gives it.

The amendment provides that war for any purpose shall be illegal; that it shall be illegal to prepare for war or spend money for war. It eliminates all powers of war from the Constitution. The Women's Peace Union proposed this amendment. They are honestly in favor of it and have the courage of their conviction to back it. They are using their political power to oppose the crime of war, to conserve life, and to promote the cause of civilization.

I have had letters and telegrams from men and women all over the Nation favoring this amendment. But, as in all reform movements, some scoff, scorn, and oppose.

A New York woman, opposing the amendment, wrote as follows:

I received to-day from a friend in Washington a newspaper clipping which reports a resolution put forward by you for a constitutional amendment under which the United States would be prohibited from preparing for or engaging in offensive or defensive war. I can not believe any man could be elected to your high office who entertains such treasonable sentiments, and no intelligent or patriotic American can view such a resolution otherwise.

To this lady I replied:

I am at a loss to know what the newspaper clipping to which you refer could have contained in order that you should make such rash statements as you have in your letter.

The resolution I introduced was for an amendment to outlaw war, and it seems to me that any good, Christian woman must be in favor of a measure of this kind. Zona Gale said: "When any body politic in all the world will say quietly through its lawmakers, 'We are done with every form of militarism in our State,' I am assured that this will be, not the shot, but the voice, heard around the world," which I believe is true.

In contrast with the letter from New York was one received from a citizen of North Dakota. It reads:

Listening to a sermon yesterday, my attention was called to a bill before Congress whereby the Navy is to receive a vast sum of public money for the next 10 years for the building of battleships.

Arms never mean peace, and I am opposed to any war, and I think the congregation yesterday, judging from the remarks after the sermon, were unanimously with the preacher for the prevention of all wars.

In view of our enormous public debt and the necessity of more hospitals, I think that the people who pay the taxes and do the dying and the mourning should be entitled to be heard from before this apparently mad policy is fixed.

These letters express two very usual attitudes toward war. To the lady who denounces this resolution war is apparently almost a sacred institution, her highest ideal of patriotism. To her, loyalty to our country and belief in the war system are synonymous. Anyone who says we can and should outlaw war is to her a traitor. She represents the established order, which does not explain or justify itself, yet threatens anyone who has other standards and ideas. This type of men and women are, in my opinion, the chief obstacle to a clear understanding of war and to the immediate repudiation of it, which understanding will produce.

The writer of the other letter is realistic, seeing in war death, sorrow, and the expenditure of vast sums of money which are needed for beneficent purposes and for the payment of war debts we already have. I agree with this correspondent not only in opposing all war but also in believing that armies and navies do not bring peace.

Our War Department, in Document No. 499, gave these war strengths for 1911—that is, the soldiers and the reserves fully trained:

Of France, 2,988,136; of Germany, 4,713,366; of Austria, 2,059,954; of Russia, 4,689,409; of England, 366,190; and of Italy, 1,586,270.

Did these armies stand for peace or protection? The World War demonstrated that they brought anything but peace, and the protection was, to say the least, far from perfect. It is also my belief that before any further war preparations are authorized the "people who do the dying, mourning, and paying" should have an opportunity to decide whether or not they wish to sanction war or peace, whether or not they wish to maintain armed forces or to abolish them and outlaw war.

The war powers now possessed by our Government were written into the Constitution 141 years ago. No one alive now has had any voice or vote concerning them. Since 1787 much advancement has admittedly been made, manhood suffrage has been extended, slavery has been abolished, women have secured their political freedom. But on this most vital matter the people have had no chance to express themselves. I wonder how many of our citizens to-day would agree with the statement of George Mason, in the Virginia convention, called for the ratification of the Constitution. He said:

I abominate and detest the idea of a government where there is a standing army. * * * When a standing army is established in any country the people lose their liberty. (Elliott's Debates, p. 379, Vol. III.)

And with Madison, who said at the same convention:

Mr. Chairman, I most cordially agree with the honorable gentleman last up that a standing army is one of the greatest mischiefs that can possibly happen. * * * (Ibid., p. 381, Vol. III.)

We have had, and we now have, the standing army many of our forefathers feared. We have had the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the late World War; and in addition an almost unbroken line of military expeditions and undertakings from 1789 to the present year, when our marines have been employed in Haiti, Nicaragua, China, the Philippines, and wherever else they have been sent, even without the authorization of Congress or the consent of the people. I have many clippings which tell something of the death and destruction our armed forces have caused in China and Nicaragua in 1927–28, and the recent statements from the Secretary of the Navy give 21 of our marines killed and died of wounds, and 202 natives killed in Nicaragua in the past year. I am not proud of these figures, Mr. President. It seems to be popular at present to speak of our soldiers and marines as though they were welfare workers, engaged in philanthropic missions here and there about the world. If that were really the object, Mr. President, we might better send the Salvation Army, for their record for welfare work is vastly better than that of our war forces.

O Mr. President, I am not in any way blaming the soldiers and marines. Oh, no; they are not to blame. "Their's not to reason why; their's but to do and die." The blame is ours, here in the Senate and the other branch of the Congress. We have the power to regulate these conditions and to change our methods, so that never again shall an agent of ours kill people in the name of the United States, thereby inviting hatred and violence from others.

Let us not be deceived. The purpose of armed forces is to kill, wound, to maim, to destroy. I quote from the official training regulations of the United States Government:

The fighting instinct of the individual soldier must be developed to its highest point by the instructor. (Training Regulations, No. 50–25, War Department, Washington, January 2, 1926, p. 1.)

The point of the bayonet should be directed against the opponent's throat, especially in hand-to-hand fighting, so that the point will enter easily and make a fatal wound on penetrating a few inches. Other vulnerable and frequently exposed parts are the face, chest, lower abdomen, thighs, and, when the back is turned, the kidneys. The armpit, which may be reached with a jab, if the throat is protected, is vulnerable because it contains large blood vessels and a nerve center.

Four to six inches penetration is enough to incapacitate and allow a quick withdrawal, whereas if a bayonet is driven home too far it is often impossible to withdraw it. In such cases, a round must be fired to break up the obstruction. (Ibid. p. 5.)

In many instances, a kick to kneecap or crotch will aid the butt stroke. A butt stroke or kick will only temporarily disable an enemy, and it should be clearly understood that the butt must not be employed when it is possible to use the point of the bayonet effectively. (Ibid. p. 22.)

There is a lot more in these training regulations to show how war maiming and killing can best be done, the rewards going to those most skilled in the job, as the next quotation shows:

* * * to each officer and enlisted man qualifying for the first time as bayonet expert, insignia indicating their skill with the bayonet will be issued. (Ibid., p. 43.)

Not much philanthropy or Christianity about that. Are we proud of teaching this to our boys and sending them out in the world to practice it?

Col. Charles Erskine Wood, of California, a West Point graduate of 1874, who saw 10 years of active service, in commenting upon these instructions at the hearing on this amendment last winter, said:

Now, the art of war, if it is an art, has changed very greatly since I left West Point and was engaged in slaughtering Indians * * * we did not have such things as poison gas, and my instruction in the use of the bayonet was always to spare your man if he was down and wanted quarter, and we were not told to seek out his kidneys if he lay on his belly and seek out his heart if he lay on his back. (Sixty-ninth Cong., 2d sess., hearing before subcommittee of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, constitutional amendment making war legally impossible. January 22, 1927, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.)

Mr. President, what happens to the souls of our boys while they stand before dummies in human form learning to perfect the diabolical use of the bayonet? And what must they think of us, the United States Congress, who, in the last analysis, are responsible?

So long as we sanction and provide for war we are responsible for every act of war, for all the agony, all the torture, and all the hideous waste it involves.

This, for instance, is a description of a trench raid by Maj. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, who was with the A. E. F. in France:

* * * It is a short, terrible, crashing fight, a thing of a few rods and a few minutes, filled with danger and death. It is preceded and followed by a tornado of artillery fire that drives men into the earth as the only safety, from which they may not emerge at all—or emerge to death or capture. Its suddenness, its hand-to-hand deadly encounters, its carnage at close quarters with daggers, pistols, and fearful explosives, its shattering, bloody, merciless action, make it terrible to both raiders and raided. Well that it lasts but a few minutes—it can not last more. (Bullard, Personalities and Reminiscences of the War, p. 148.)

Here is another picture of war given us by an American soldier named Wallace, writing of his experiences in the British Army in the Dardanelles:

For seven weeks we lay in this position, with 2,400 dead men lying within 10 yards of us, unable to pull them into the trench to cremate them or to get out and bury them. There it lay—heads, arms, legs, feet, hands, brains, and entrails and pieces of flesh, littered all over the slope of the parapet; the hot broiling sun blazing down upon this mass of mutilated human flesh to rot it and form maggots. And then it rained and washed all this nauseating mass into our trench. And in this we had to eat, sleep, and live! (Wallace, Daniel H., Shanghaied into the European War, 1916, published by League of Humanity, Chicago, p. 9.)

Mr. President, these things are not decent. They are not civilized. They are not Christian. We boast of our advanced civilization. We are pleased to call ourselves a Christian nation. After thousands of years of civilization and after 1900 years of Christian teachings, in the name of the Great Master, is it not time to abolish war? It seems all but incredible that at this day and age we can send our boys to war to do such deeds and endure such suffering. The reason is, of course, that in this matter of war we think in terms of nations and governments and so-called sacred property rights, and not in terms of human beings as the victims. We like to think of the courage, the bravery, the heroism of our boys. But it is our duty here to see to it that their youth, their strength, their courage, their loyalty shall not be betrayed by ignorance, fear, hate, or greed.

It is our finest young men we send to war.

The Napoleonic wars shortened the stature of the French race by killing off so many tall soldiers whose height would have been inherited had they lived to have children. So also the World War has killed off the healthiest, strongest, bravest, and most intelligent young men of Europe—medically selected for slaughter. (League or War? By Dr. Irving Fisher, p. 206.)

Why do we go into war?

I quote from an address made at Harvard University in June, 1927, by the Hon. Alanson B. Houghton, our present ambassador to the Court of St. James:

War does not originate from time to time simply in a sudden and uncontrollable impulse on the part of one of these great national masses to go out and slaughter another. War is possible, no doubt, because these masses are willing, under conditions, to fight. But these conditions are themselves an integral part of the problem. And that problem—broadly speaking, is the outcome of a series of maneuvers by which the masses concerned are brought into positions of opposition. Obviously, this maneuvering is not done by the masses themselves. Collectively and as individuals they have little, if anything, to do with the subtle and gradual shifting of international relationships. Their interests are directed to the more humble and prosaic task of earning a living.

The maneuvering is done by little groups of men called governments. These little groups seek constantly and naturally to gain supposed advantages of one sort and another for their own nationals. Out of their efforts to enlarge or to strengthen or to maintain the interests intrusted to their charge the masses they represent are gradually maneuvered into positions which, to say the least, can not easily be surrendered. If the process continues, sooner or later a situation arises in which an agreement between these small groups becomes impossible. Then, on the ground that their lives and families and property are somehow involved and endangered, these great masses of men and women, roused by every power of organized appeal and propaganda, are ordered under arms, and war follows. The entire process is in control of the smaller groups. They make the issue. They declare the war. The masses they control simply obey.

That is what our present ambassador to the Court of St. James says.

This statement is undoubtedly true. Ambassador Houghton might have added that every country in the World War conscripted its soldiers. The United States, after conscripting, endeavored to make the soldiers hate the enemy. For example, here is an extract from the diary of Maj. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard:

January 8, 1918: Am engaged in a hate-making campaign against the German. I am trying to imbue our soldiers with a determined hatred of them, their method, their purposes and acts. It is justified by German conduct in Belgium and France. It is, besides, a part of the preparation necessary. I believe that I shall succeed. * * * I deemed it especially necessary with our men, because many of them had been quite accustomed to Germans as fellow-citizens at home in the United States. Not having found them cruel or brutal, they would think that the Germans as an enemy had been lied about greatly by English and French. (Bullard, Personalities and Reminiscences of the War, pp. 116, 118.)

War ought to be outlawed because of what it always, and of necessity, involves—hating and lying, killing and maiming, violent coercion of body and soul. We ought to outlaw war, even if it could ever profit us or protect us, though there is no conclusive evidence that it can do either.

The only way in which we can outlaw war is by amending the Constitution. If there were any other way, no one would propose so drastic a change, and one which will take several years at least to accomplish. So long as our fundamental law gives war powers to the Government, war will be a legal activity, which we can not restrain by a treaty, by an act of Congress, even by a referendum of the people.

I have been asked why I do not modify this resolution. One suggestion is that war be made illegal except in case of invasion. What would be the result? We would have, as we have now, a great Army, Navy, and air force to protect us from the possible, though to my mind very improbable, invader; for even now, with war for any purpose, even aggression or conquest, entirely legal, we are told that our armed forces are merely for defense—defense of our lives, our homes, our institutions, our industries.

The most ardent of our preparedness advocates will not admit that our Army should or could be used for invasion. Our greater Navy advocates will not admit any desire for conquest. Oh, no; their one plea is preparedness and defense. Therefore, if war were legal only for the purpose of resisting invasion, we would have just such an Army, Navy, and air force as we now have. We would then, as now, confess our willingness to hide behind the bodies of our boys in order to keep ourselves safe. In the meantime our boys would be used, as they are now, to protect our business interests and alleged property rights away from home; getting us into trouble instead of keeping us out; using our flag to cover greed and coercion, instead of holding it up proudly as the emblem of liberty and justice.

There is the same objection to the proposal for a referendum on war before Congress can declare war in any given instance. The Army, Navy, and air forces would have to be maintained ready for use in case the result of the referendum were in favor of war, though I do not believe the people of the United States would ever vote in favor of war, no matter how much misleading propaganda had previously been fed to them.

It has been suggested that we enter into agreements with other nations not to fight, but keep our armed forces to use in case the other nations break their agreements. That suggestion also shows faith in the efficacy of armed force, and implies moral sanction for it. Moreover, the possession of armed forces means the use of them, either directly in actual killing or indirectly in coercing the weak, because it seems to be easier to resort to violence than to rely upon justice and intelligence. War is the selfish and greedy man's way of settlement.

If, as a practical matter, it were possible to make treaties with other countries outlawing war and also providing for complete disarmament, the treaties would not be binding as far as we are concerned, because they would be in conflict with the war powers granted by the Constitution of the United States, and a treaty can not deprive the Government of its constitutional powers. Moreover, any treaty can be nullified by an act of Congress of subsequent date, if, and in so far as, the two are in conflict.

This amendment differs from other peace plans which have been proposed in that it does not attempt to reconcile war and peace. The amendment is designed merely to make war legally impossible. Its proponents believe this can and should be done. They believe that the resort to violence is now in no sense a necessity but a habit, a survival of the time when the economic and social interests of men and nations were conflicting, not interwoven and interdependent at all points, as we now see them to be.

Therefore the proposal does not bear on its face the solution of all economic problems, all national and international relations. Many people contend that war and preparation for war must go on until a solution is found. That might be a reasonable contention, if war offered any such solution. Even then some of us might prefer the disputes, the animosities, and the problems to the war; in short, prefer the disease to the remedy. A successful operation which kills the patient does not amount to much. What war has ever been worth the cost?

War does not settle trade disputes, abolish racial animosities, guarantee the safety of lives, investments, and governments, or furnish a permanent cure for hate, greed, and murder. In fact, war actually prevents such settlements, guarantees, and cures, because it sweeps whole nations out of sanity into the grip of the most destructive emotions, far beyond the call of justice, reason, and humanity.

The development of modern warfare makes it almost impossible to talk of the defense of life or property, no matter how efficient the army, the navy, and the munition workers may be. With aircraft capable of crossing the ocean and destroying our cities in a night, it is futile to talk of the sacred right of self-defense. The right may still exist but the defense is practically impossible.

The following quotations were used by Dr. Irving Fisher in his book League or War:

[From the New York Times, March 13, 1921]

The Chemical Warfare Service has discovered a liquid poison so strong that three drops will kill anyone whose skin it touches. * * * Falling like rain from nozzles attached to airplanes, the liquid would kill everything in the aircraft's path.

The use of poisonous gas at the end of the World War was a child's game compared to what it will be in the future. (Brig. Gen. A. B. Fries, Chemical Warfare Division, United States Army.)

In a report to the League of Nations, published in the New York Times of August 22, 1924, Professor Angell said:

That whereas it is possible to take refuge from steel projectiles and high explosives in deep trenches and dugouts, there is no refuge from deadly gases.

And Professor Mayer doubts whether the world sufficiently realizes the power of the new arms and the dangers to which they expose populations, while Professor Cannon goes further and says that in the last war nothing was seen which is even comparable with the probable destruction of industrial regions and the massacres of civilian populations in the war now being planned.

Mr. President, this is a far cry from the Middle Ages, when it was forbidden to bombard a city before due notice had been given and every opportunity granted the noncombatants to flee from the danger.

No; there will be no guaranty of safety in the "next war," either to life or property. There may be an apparent victory, perhaps, for the nation which is most ruthlessly efficient in the use of bombs, poison gas, and disease germs, which sacrifices its own population and wealth and destroys without scruple or discrimination the enemy, young and old, women and children, ill and infirm. I can not believe, Mr. President, that such a victory could possibly be worth the price.

Many people realize that a guaranty of safety or defense is impossible for anyone to give, yet demand that guarantee before they will consider this amendment. They wish to keep the advocates of the amendment busy, offering them facts and figures about arbitration, passive resistance, multilateral treaties, and so on, in order that they themselves will not have to think about the amendment and the truth which it embodies, namely: That violence and bloodshed are always wrong in principle and disastrous in practice. These same people admit that stealing is wrong in principle and generally disastrous in practice. They do not say, "Give me a guaranty that I shall always have plenty of money or I will steal and make others steal for me." That would be unmoral. Is it not even more unmoral to demand the guaranty before we refrain from killing our fellow men—unmoral for those who believe that human life should be held sacred, unmoral also for those who believe that law and order must suffer whenever and wherever life is held cheap?

It is said that cannibalism became unpopular when some cannibal, with the vision of a capitalist, saw that it would be more profitable to keep his victim alive and make him work, since insteat of merely furnishing one meal he could produce many meals for his captor.

If we are not interested in abstract morality, we can certainly see that instead of killing our neighbors we might better let them live and trade with them, thus producing many meals and much prosperity for ourselves.

To my mind these are the only questions we need ask ourselves: Is war a crime against humanity? If so, shall we commit that crime? Or shall we say we are done with it—It shall be outlawed?

The proponents of this amendment say outlaw war. My home is near the Canadian border. That border is unarmed. Between Canada and the United States there is peace and friendship. It is possible to extend that peace and friendship to the world, and it is possible to begin now.

If this resolution be adopted, if the United States disarm completely and spend a little money to let the people of the world know why we are unarmed, no one will attack us. Governments might be willing, but their people never would.

In any event, I would rather take the chance that we might possibly be wrong in putting such faith in our fellow men than to face the certainty that our country will continue to commit the crime of war, and face the certainty of destruction of life and property, almost beyond human comprehension, if another world war is waged.

I am not alone in believing that the much-heralded invading enemy of an unarmed nation is a myth; almost as much of a myth as the nation which fights solely in self-defense.

"No nation has ever admitted being an aggressor," says Arthur Ponsonby, a member of the British Parliament and former Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Mr. Ponsonby has spoken for the abolition of the air forces and is working for the complete independent disarmament of Great Britain. Disarmament by example, he calls it.

No nation could get its people to support a war which was declared openly to be a war of aggression.

Continuing, he says:

An attack leveled against a nation which had repudiated the idea of ever resorting to force, and which, therefore, could not be suspected in the remotest degree of provocation, would ipso facto be a war of aggression before the world. No nation, no government, no statesman would be a party to any such move. The fear, therefore, of a disarming or unarmed nation being attacked is imaginary and need not be taken into account. * * * Disarmament must be treated as the preliminary to, not the consequence of, security.

Other members of the House of Commons are working in that body for the complete disarmament of the British Empire. On five different occasions the question of doing away with the armed forces of Great Britain has been debated and brought to a vote, the last time being on March 12, when 116 members voted to abolish the air force and 215 voted to retain it.

Mr. President, at the proper time I am going to attempt to get a vote upon this resolution, but I predict right now that there will not be enough Members of the United States Senate with the nerve to allow the resolution to be voted on. They do not want to vote for it, and they do not dare to vote against it. They have not the courage of our English brothers over in the House of Commons, where 116 voted on the 12th of March to outlaw and do away with the air force of that nation.

I have the official reports of the House of Commons. In 1924, speaking on a motion the intent of which was to abolish the British Army, Mr. Ayles said:

I believe that had we learned the lessons of the recent war, and of every war that has gone before that, we should have come to the conclusion that we can not get any kind of security from armed force and from the preparation of armed force. When have armaments given us security? What did we find during the war? We found that in 1914 the greatest military machine this world has ever known was in the field against other armies. Where is the German army to-day? It is extinct. It brought no security to the German men and to the German women, who were led to believe that armed force meant security. * * *

I want to suggest that so far as any kind of security is concerned, in the time of Napoleon, when his victorious army marched across Europe, and when he was more victorious than ever before, France was less secure than ever she had been. In 1914 the greatest military power in the world, with all the forces and all the skill which she had, was not able to safeguard her own homes or her own people.

* * * I believe in complete and final disarmament, even in the midst of an armed world. I believe that the nation that is prepared to have the courage in the midst of an armed world to lay down its arms and not to be filled with fear—fear dogging its footsteps and paralyzing its efforts—will be the only safe nation, will be the only secure nation, will be the only nation that will be able to lead the nations of the world into the paths of righteousness. * * * You have failed with all kinds of armaments and with all wars in the past. You have degraded the world; you have degraded society; you have spoiled the whole lives of millions; you have destroyed the wealth that has been built up, and which ought to have been used for the betterment of mankind. The time has come to disband your armies and for every man to say, "We will never use our hands or our brains to slaughter our fellow men." In other words, the time has come when we should dethrone Mars and exalt Christianity. (Official report, Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, vol. 171, no. 34, March 17, 1924, pp. 119–125, printed and published by His Majesty's Stationery Office, Imperial House, Kingsway, London, W. C. 2, England.

In support of the same motion Mr. Thurtle, an ex-soldier, spoke in the House of Commons:

Why am I here to support this amendment? * * * because of my experience on the other side of the channel. The conclusion I came to as a result of that experience was that the kind of ordeal to which human life is put in modern scientific war, with its intensive barrage, its poison gas, its tanks, and things of that sort, is such that no human being ought to be asked to endure it. It is an ordeal which is too great a strain for man's physical and nervous system.

I might say here, Mr. President, that right here in our own United States, of which we are so proud, we have to-day over 24,000 of our returned soldiers in hospitals for the insane.

Mr. Thurtle continued:

* * * When you inveigle the inexperienced youth of this country into the Army, do you call their attention to the fact that the Army contract involves a great deal more than getting good clothes, good pay, good food, with attractions in the shape of an education? When you put these objects and advantages before the youth of the country you always keep in the background, whether it be in the air force of the Army or whatever portion of it, the real purpose for which you are getting them, which is that you may use their lives and limbs as a living shield to protect you in the case of a great war.

* * * What we are trying to say to the House and to the people of this country is that some time some country has to break this vicious circle and to make a definite stand and say that this vicious circle of fear is not going to continue. What we want to say to the people of this country is that there can be nothing finer or greater than that this country should be the country to take that stand first of all. * * * It is the duty of this country to say, * * * "We are going to establish a precedent, we are going to give one clear call to all the nations of the world." I am perfectly certain that if we give that clear call we shall rally the whole of the peoples to our standard. (Ibid. pp. 125–133.)

If you think these English members of Parliament and this Senate joint resolution too idealistic, here is the alternative, here is war:

In the World War the United States lost 125,500 men (Leonard P. Ayres, The War with Germany, p. 57), had 205,690 wounded (ibid., p. 58). There are still in hospitals in the United States 24,493 insane or partially insane soldiers.

In spite of this fearful object lesson preparations are being made for the "next war." I want to read what Irving Fisher says of the last war and of the "next war" in his book before referred to:

THE LAST WAR

What did the war cost? Its money cost to governments was $186,000,000,000, to which might be added the billions spent during the generation preceding the war in preparing for it. This does not count the billions of dollars' worth of devastation in France and Belgium and on the sea—the destruction of ships, factories, railroads, mines, soil—nor the intangible costs of disrupting trade and industry.

In human lives it cost 10,000,000 killed. This does not include the 30,000,000 of civilians "who might be living to-day."

In morale it cost respect for law and decency, a widespread demoralization from which the world probably can not recover in a generation. (Fisher, Irving, League or War? p. 205. Harper & Bros., New York, 1923.)

THE NEXT WAR

* * * And "the next war" will probably cost more in every one of these ways. In that war not soldiers only but helpless women and children will be asphyxiated by the newly invented gas bombs to be dropped from the sky. Whole cities, like New York, will have their inhabitants put to death by this method, and its buildings set on fire by other gas devices. The next world war means the suicide of the world!

This is not the kind of a nightmare that we have in our dreams. It is a nightmare of broad daylight. It simply represents the hard, cold facts of modern warfare as thus far developed, without any guessing as to further developments which future military science has surely in store for a world so blind as to countenance war. (Ibid., p. 206.)

Some say that we are not prepared for war and that there will be no "next war," but the War Department counts to-day on a man power of more than 675,000 men, including men in the Regular Army and Navy actually in service and the Organized Reserves. This figure also embraces men and boys, still civilians but partly trained either in the National Guard, the National Guard Reserve, citizens' military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, civilian students' Army correspondence schools, the Naval Reserves, the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, rifle clubs—a total of 17 branches of both services.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. It would be relevant to the matter just referred to concerning appropriations if the Senator referred to the appropriation bill carrying nearly $400,000,000 for the Army for the next fiscal year and to the naval bill now before us, carrying nearly the same amount for the Navy for the next fiscal year. In addition to that, the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President and the Budget, as I am told, recommended an appropriation of $740,000,000 additional for new naval construction. Knowing, as we do, that most naval construction always exceeds the amount of the estimates, and in many cases the final costs are from 50 per cent to 100 per cent above the estimates, it would mean, if all of the demands of the executive departments are granted, Congress would appropriate directly and authorize the appropriation directly and indirectly approximately $2,000,000,000 for military purposes for the next fiscal year. It seems to me that the militarists in the United States, with their strident voices, are quite successful in suppressing the voices of those who speak for a safe and proper naval policy and for world peace.

Mr. FRAZIER. I appreciate the Senator's suggestion, and I may state in connection with that line of thought that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1927 gave some very interesting figures on expenditures for that year. Fifty-one per cent of the total expenditures by the United States Government for that year were for public debt and interest on the public debt, and the public debts are war debts. Thirty-one and a fraction per cent was for military functions. Seventeen and a fraction per cent was for civil functions. Undoubtedly a considerable portion of that 17 per cent plus is for war preparations, for expenditures we would not need if we were not preparing for war. In other words, 82 per cent of our annual expenditures raised by taxation from the people of the United States goes for past wars and preparation for future wars.

The ideal of the War Department is universal military training (Annual Report Secretary of War, 1921, p. 9).

In its Army Regulations the War Department takes for granted that immediately upon the declaration of war a conscription act similar to that in force during the World War will be jammed through Congress. (Army Regulations, No. 120–10, War Department, June 18, 1926, mobilization man power for military purposes, p. 7.)

The general plan for mobilization has been formulated and is in the hands of the local authorities throughout the country. (Ibid., pp. 3, 4, also Annual Report Secretary of War, 1927, p. 30.)

Army regulations for them provide in detail for the—recruitment for the organization and the reception of men from the local draft boards. (Army Regulations, No. 135–10, War Department, Washington, December 31, 1924, par. 13, c. p. 5.)

And specifically state that—prior to the operation of the selective service law—

There will be—intensive voluntary recruitment at home stations, rendezvous or mobilization points. The personnel required to bring all mobilized cadres to war strength will be obtained directly from local draft boards. * * * (Army Regulations, No. 120–10, War Department, Washington, March 5, 1924.)

We have guns, bayonets, poison gas, tanks, and bombs. We are accumulating a war reserve of weapons and ammunition. Congress has been asked to authorize "educational orders" for munitions to be placed among private concerns, those concerns to be paid for keying their factories to war production and training their men in the manufacture of war material (Annual Report Secretary of War, 1927, p. 36), the contention being that it is necessary to have definite plans to prepare millions of men for war-time production. (Ibid., p. 39), since at least 17 civilians must work behind the lines to maintain one soldier in the line. (Assistant Secretary of War, in an address on January 24, 1927, reprinted in the United States Daily, January 25, 1927.)

We have raw materials allocated by 20 commodity committees. (Annual Report Secretary of War, 1927, p. 32.)

We have military men in contact with an executive railroad officer in each corps area, and car-service division representatives in touch with War Department agents. (Ibid.)

We have maps of all the transmission systems and plans for the coordination of the power industries urged upon the National Electric Light Association as a war measure. (Ibid., p. 33.)

The Navy Department reports 305 vessels in full commission, including battleships, cruisers, submarines, destroyers, and airplane carriers, with 190 aircraft attached to the fleets. (Annual Report Secretary of the Navy, 1927, pp. 10, 42.)

Mr. President, who can tell when this "next war" is going to come? When is this fearful machine, composed potentially of all the able-bodied men of the United States, trained in the latest scientific devices of slaughter; disciplined to instant, unquestioned obedience; drilled in the art of bombing, gassing, and bayoneting their fellows; supported by regimented industries back of the lines; reinforced by those iron monsters patrolling the seven seas and further augmented by an immense air force to start on its path of terror and destruction?

Or shall we decide not to have this "next war"? The decision lies with us.

War is a tremendous stupidity, a denial of our own intelligence. It is not only murder on a vast scale, but often national suicide on a larger scale. It is the means through which, so far, many civilizations have perished, and could easily be the means by which we also might be destroyed. War is primitive and barbaric. It should have no place in present-day civilization. It should be outlawed. The United States should set the example. Are we, as Members of the United States Senate, willing to pass this resolution and give the people of the various States a chance to speak on this subject? In my opinion the great majority of the people of this country would be glad to vote to outlaw war if given an opportunity to do so. I want them to have that opportunity.

This amendment to outlaw war is not expected to meet with the approval of people who always want to follow the established custom and who think that any suggested reform is a radical heresy. It will not be approved by those who believe in the "divine right of kings," in the divine right of a government to plunge its people into war. Neither will it be approved by those who believe in the sacred right of property over that of human life.

But the amendment is favored by those who honestly believe that war is a crime toward humanity and by those who honestly believe in the right of the people to govern.

I quote from Ralph Waldo Emerson's Essay on War:

If you have a nation of men who have risen to that height of moral cultivation that they will not declare war or carry arms, for they have not so much madness left in their brains, you have a nation of lovers, of benefactors, of true, great, and able men. Let me know more of that nation; I shall not find them defenseless, with idle hands swinging at their sides. I shall find them men of love, honor, and truth; men of an immense industry; men whose influence is felt to the end of the earth; men whose very look and voice carry the sentence of honor and shame; and all forces yield to their energy and persuasion. Whenever we see the doctrine of peace embraced by a nation, we may be assured it will not be one that invites injury; but one, on the contrary, which has a friend in the bottom of the heart of every man, even of the violent and the base; one against which no weapon can prosper; one which is looked upon as the asylum of the human race, and has the tears and the blessings of mankind.

Mr. President, at the proper time I intend to do everything in my power to bring about a vote on Senate Joint Resolution 1.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FRAZIER. Gladly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has the Senator any information as to those contracts or tentative contracts which have been made for the use of industries in the next war?

Mr. FRAZIER. I will say to the Senator that I have no definite information, but from the authentic reports which I have I believe such arrangements are being made.

Mr. BROOKHART. There has been a special mobilization of industry provided for. I mean to bring it before the Committee on Military Affairs soon, if I can. In a general way, as I understand it, it is proposed that we are to bring about a stabilization of prices and of earnings, and these industries are to be given a 6 per cent capital return, plus expenses, costs, and everything else.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is, on a cost-plus basis?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; only it is 6 per cent or something like that, as I understand the arrangement. It seems to me that any arrangement of that kind would be the greatest possible encouragement for the industries to go into war, in time of depression particularly, when their earnings were low, because they would profiteer over and above peace times even by such arrangements as may have been made for stabilization in war time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. In just a moment. From our experience in the past war with the profiteering that went on, we would naturally assume that the statement of the Senator from Iowa is correct, because it is so well known that there were some 17,000 new millionaires created, as I recall.

Mr. BROOKHART. It was reported that there were 23,000. The Treasury Department could not find all of them, however.

Mr. FRAZIER. There was a vastly greater number of millionaires after the war than there was at the beginning of the war. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The query of the Senator from Iowa, which was quite strong, might be answered by what I think it is generally going to be conceded will be done in case any other war comes on, and that is the conscription not only of the man power of the country but of the money power as well. In other words, if we ever become involved in war we shall never limit the operation of conscription to the war elements.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the keynoter of the next Republican National Convention make that statement, because the Senator from Ohio remembers that at the beginning of the World War anyone who advocated such a thing as that was called a traitor. I know, because I advocated it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator may recall that I offered an amendment on the floor of the other House to that effect at the time we were discussing the man power bill; so it is no new thing to me. I have long had such a conviction.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how the Senator from Ohio escaped. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. And, secondly, I am convinced that since the war there has been a general unanimity of sentiment that in case of another war the conscription policy, if applied at all, must be applied generally.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on that proposition I desire to state that the American Legion has favored a resolution for a long time—and the rank and file of the Legion believe in it—to the effect that the next time we have a war capital shall be drafted on the same terms as those on which men are drafted. But at this session there has been introduced in both Houses a universal draft bill with the indorsement of certain leaders of the Legion, the auxiliary of the Legion, and I presume of the D. A. R.—I think that body indorsed it; at any rate, it has the indorsement of a great many of the members of that organization. That bill provides for the drastic draft of men by the President even before a declaration of war, but when it gets down to capital in war, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that it says we will stabilize the earnings of capital and the price of commodities; there is no drafting of capital about it. According to information I have—I do not state it as accurate, because it is not official—the War Department has mobilized the industries at 6 per cent, whereas if capital were drafted as are men it would be mobilized at 2 per cent, or something like that. In case that be true this draft scheme that is being tried to be put over in Congress at this time is another war-profiteering scheme of gigantic proportions.

Mr. FRAZIER. It looks that way. Since the Senator from Iowa has mentioned the Daughters of the American Revolution—I had not intended to mention that organization—I will say that I clipped from the editorial column of Arthur Brisbane in this morning's Washington Herald this little article:

> The charming and lovely Daughters of the American Revolution admit that they have a "blacklist," made up of public men and public speakers. "We must take great care in selecting our speakers," the ladies say, "for there is dangerous radicalism abroad."

Brisbane continues:

> Patrick Henry would be on that "blacklist," of course, and several other radicals connected with the Revolution. As for Him who said, "Take all thou hast and give to the poor," He would be barred from D. A. R. speaking, as a matter of course.
>
> However, these are dangerous days. It's a blessing we have those ladies to protect us.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I am in no hurry to proceed, and if he would prefer to proceed now I will yield and let him go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not want to let go by without protest the statements just made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. I know statements of that kind with regard to manufacturers and their willingness to drag this country into war if they are not doing well in their business are thought by many persons to be unworthy of any consideration whatsoever, but, coming from a manufacturing State and one that produced more munitions during the World War for the cause of the Allies and for the cause of America than any other State, and knowing many of those manufacturers personally, I want to state in the strongest and most emphatic way possible that, so far as the manufacturers of Connecticut are concerned—and I have no reason to believe that they are any better than those in the other States of the Union—I do not believe that there is a single manufacturer in this country so unpatriotic, so selfish, so thoughtless of suffering as to be willing to see war come because his business is not prosperous.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, can the Senator from Connecticut give us any information in regard to the tentative contracts which have been made?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; I am not familiar with that matter, but I wish to say that I think before the Senator made such a charge on the floor of the Senate he ought to have asked the War Department, through the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, whether any such cost-plus-6-per-cent arrangement had been made with our manufacturers.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have asked for and I expect to have that information; but there was quite wide publicity given to this mobilization plan. I do not know that it included any manufacturer in Connecticut, but I will find out; and, until I do find out, I will not hold them guilty.

Mr. BINGHAM. With regard to the mobilization, it is a well-known fact that Congress has given to the Assistant Secretary of War the power of making arrangements with manufacturers so that in case of war we need not take so long as has been the case heretofore to get under way. What those arrangements are, however, I do not know.

Mr. BROOKHART. They are not drafting arrangements such as have been so eloquently suggested by the Senator from Ohio, and I insist that capital shall be drafted on the same terms as men are drafted.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he knows how many new millionaires were made in Connecticut during the World War?

Mr. BINGHAM. No. I know that this country was very prosperous during 1914, 1915, and 1916, when the countries of the world were paying millions and millions of dollars to our manufacturers all over the country for the purchase of commodities which they needed. It is my opinion from what I saw, although I was not in a position to see much during the war, for I was in the Army myself, that the money made in this country was made before the United States entered the war rather than afterwards.

Mr. FRAZIER. But we have ample figures to show that there was all kinds of money made during the war time, when we were actually in the war. There was a lot of graft that went on during that time; there is no getting away from that and no doubt about it; although we might go a little further back and say that a great amount of money was made during the war period previous to the time we went into the war. However, does the Senator from Connecticut think it was just right for a neutral country, as we were supposed to be, to furnish some of the warring nations with munitions to carry on the war?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly. I am glad we furnished them; and if we had not furnished them there is a likelihood that the Allies might not have won the war. However, as to a single manufacturer desiring to involve us in war for the sake of making money, it is not so.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, there is room for difference of opinion there.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can the Senator mention the name of a single manufacturer who did that?

Mr. FRAZIER. The hearings brought out all kinds of facts in regard to that. I can give the record if the Senator desires.

Mr. BINGHAM. That a single manufacturer desired to involve us in war so that he could make money?

Mr. FRAZIER. They made all kinds of money, but I do not know what their desires were; of course, that is a hard thing to tell; we can only judge that from their attitude and what they did. Perhaps the Senator does not remember the occasion, but I made a statement on the floor of the Senate during the discussion of the World Court question quoting Colonel House and calling attention to the fact that he stated in an article published in a magazine, the name of which I do not recall at the moment, that had it not been for the fact that Germany was reckless in her use of submarines and in some other measures she took along that line, and had it not been for some other mistakes that Germany apparently made, this Nation might have found itself on the side of Germany instead of on the side of the Allies in the World War.

ACQUITTAL OF HARRY F. SINCLAIR

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about a very startling and shocking thing that has just taken place in the Capital of the Nation.

Some months ago the Capital was shocked, as was the Nation, when told that a "bye-bye blackbird" jury had acquitted Doheny and Fall. All honest men and women in the country were dazed, humiliated, and grieved because a court here at the Capital had gone through the farcical performance of investigating high crimes and misdemeanors of a grave national character, and had finished up by giving a clean bill of health to two notorious and guilty criminals. A Cabinet officer, one who sat at the helm of the Nation and helped guide its affairs, who had intrusted to his care rights and properties of the people and of the Government, deliberately betrayed his trust and sold out to Doheny and Sinclair the great oil reserves of the Nation.

Doheny and Sinclair, two of the money lords of the country, reveling in their ill-gotten gain, connived with Fall, this betrayer of his country, and corruptly induced him to sell himself in the market place, and through that corrupt performance they obtained the Nation's rich oil reserves.

President Roosvelt had set aside this valuable oil property to be kept and used some time in the hour of the country's need. President Wilson, followed in his footsteps, safeguarded the arrangement by which these oil reserves were to be held in trust for the people of the United States. No armed band from the outside marched against the strongholds of the Government to deprive it of that property, worth millions of dollars. It was accomplished by treason to the Government, by betrayal of a trust, and by the use of enormous funds of filthy lucre on the part of Doheny and Sinclair.

The Government went out and apprehended these outlaws and national highwaymen and took them into court to answer for their crimes.

The grand jury indicted Fall, Doheny, and Sinclair. The Doheny and Fall farcical trial of hateful memory is behind us. They both, strange to say, were acquitted. Doheny is permitted to go his way, to enjoy himself, to clip his coupons and revel in the fruits of his corrupt dealings with a traitor to the Government. Mr. Sinclair comes on to be tried, and what do we witness at the capital of the country?

Senators, where law enforcement ought to obtain, where the courts of justice ought to stand everlastingly above suspicion and devoted to the principles of right and justice, what do we find in the trial of Mr. Sinclair, this rich money lord of the Nation? When a jury is being impaneled to try him—a jury to lift their hands to God and swear that they will a true verdict render according to the law and the evidence, so help them God—what do we find?

We find Sinclair, with hired villains, trying to bribe the jury as it is being formed, and former detective agencies at the Capital in his employ engaged in this villainous work of helping to break down the courts of justice in the Nation, not out in the interior of the country but right here at the Capital itself. Then what do we see in the court?

I am not condemning courts. I am condemning a court. I am not attacking the jury system. I am attacking particular juries and particular judges. I believe in the courts; I believe in the jury system with all my heart.

What did we see? We saw the trial judge permitting the Sinclair case to be sidetracked, and the court's arm went reaching out into the briar patches and hedgerows hunting for these little fellows who were accused of trying to bribe somebody. The Sinclair case goes over and drags along for another year untried, and in the meantime they have all the time they want to perfect their corrupt arrangements to bring about his acquittal.

Senators, these truths ought to be told by somebody. You can not hold the respect and confidence of the masses of the people in the courts, in our free institutions, if you permit those high in authority to betray their trust, and permit those who are rich to buy their way out of the courthouses of the country. You can not hold the confidence of the respectable men and women of the Nation. You have got to have one standard of justice for the high and the low, the rich and the poor alike. If a millionaire violates the law, it is a reflection on the court and a shame on those in authority in it if they can not convict him and have him punished under the law like other people are punished.

This verdict to-day is shockingly astounding in the face of the ruling of the Supreme Court in this case on the vital facts of the case. This case was tried before Judge Kenyon, formerly a Republican Senator from the State of Iowa, a big, strong, clean, courageous man, now on the circuit court of appeals. He tried the case, and he said that this transaction was branded all over with fraud and corruption. The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States by the defense, and the Supreme Court sustained Judge Kenyon, saying that this whole transaction was branded all over with fraud and corruption. Then, if that is true, this whole miserable transaction was unclean, criminal, and rotten. There was no just reason for permitting them to keep this property, and the Supreme Court ordered what was left of it returned to the United States Government. There was no reason why they should not be prosecuted, punished, and imprisoned for their villainous crime against the Government that they have sworn to support and sustain. But what have we got here this morning, Senators?

We have here in the Capital a man, a haughty millionaire, who stands to-day in contempt of the Senate of the United States. He has defied the constituted authority of the greatest law-making body in the world. He refuses to give the Senate testimony when the Senate calls in the name of the Government for that testimony; and to-day he walks the streets of Washington with a clean bill of health—a verdict of acquittal at the end of another farcical performance in a courthouse at the Capital of the Nation. Senators, I read just the other morning about a poor fellow out in the West who had seven or eight children and he was not able to support them all. The little boys had heard the father talk about how scant food supplies were and say he did not see how he could provide much longer for so many children. They found one of the boys upstairs. He had shot himself through the stomach with a pistol. When the doctor reached him and asked him why he did it, the little fellow, writhing in pain, his face wet with tears, said, "I thought there would be one less for dad to have to feed." God bless that little fellow and save his life! We have many poor people in this great country struggling for an honest living, millions of them who are hard pressed for the necessities of life.

These human beings made in God's image have a right to live. Sometimes sheer want and hunger drive them to steal. I sympathize with them and pity them. If they go out and steal a loaf of bread, they are put in the penitentiary.

The military authorities not long ago disgraced a United States soldier, I am told, for stealing two dressed turkeys. Think of that! Here was a boy who went to France and offered his life for his country. Because he stole a couple of dressed turkeys the military arm of the Nation reached out, got him, and dishonorably discharged him and imprisoned him. Think of that!

Out in the Northwest the other day a man held up a bank and robbed it of one or two thousand dollars. They apprehended him and convicted him, as they should have done; but Sinclair robs the Government of the United States of a hundred million dollars' worth of property, violates the law of the land, corrupts Cabinet officers, deprives the Government of supplies for future national defense, then scorns and defies the Nation's Senate—laughs at the laws of the country and escapes punishment in a court at the Capital.

Senators, have the American people reached the point of indifference and decadence where they are no more stirred to righteous indignation by the recital of such wrongs and crimes? This country must wake up. It must be aroused to the importance of combating the dangers that threaten it. Is the spirit of honor and integrity, of self-respect, love of justice and of right principles dying out in our country? What are we doing here to safeguard and preserve them? Certain foreign influences and certain domestic influences are seeking to undermine this great American Government. "They must not pass."

Sinclair goes his way, acquitted. The finding of the circuit court of appeals based on all the facts, and they were undisputed, the decision of the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States, based on those findings, made on facts, as I have said, that were undisputed—all these have gone down to-day because Sinclair, the man that Governor Smith, of New York, appointed and kept in office during all that time, has his millions and hundreds of millions. Not only has he done that but he has put his Government bonds, strangely purchased, into the hands of Will Hayes, gathering up corrupt campaign funds for the Republican Party and turning them over to Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

He keeps them and then says that finally he turned them back, and that he, out of his own generous impulse and liberality, took out of his pocket $50,000 and paid it himself, rather than to be found with any of these Sinclair bonds in his possession; but Mr. Mellon never told anybody about that.

Senators, what would happen to the ordinary man in public office if he had been caught connected up with a big scandal like that, and a judge had brought him into court and said, "Didn't you know about this?" "Yes." "You knew about all the circumstances connected with the villainous work of this man?" whoever he might be; it happened to be Sinclair in this instance. "Yes." "Why didn't you tell it? You were guilty of concealing the truth, and to that extent helping to cover up a crime, when you were put into honorable position and expected to cry out against wrongdoing and crime arising from any source, and to serve your country faithfully."

Mr. Mellon never told anybody about it until the Senate committee investigating the matter asked him the direct question on the witness stand.

Senators, are we going to tamely and cowardly submit to the establishment of two standards of conduct in public office—one for the rich and one for the poor? Two standards of justice—one for the rich and one for the poor? If so, we had better put up two courthouses at every place—one for the rich and one for the poor—and write over the door of the entrance of the one for the poor, "Who enters here may or may not obtain justice"; and put upon the front of the other one, "Here is where verdicts are made to order and sold for cash to the highest bidder."

Are we going to come to that? God forbid! I burn with righteous indignation, as I know some of you do, as I talk to-day about this scandalous performance that has just taken place here in the Capital of the Nation. Doheny will rejoice out in California. Old Fall will rejoice—the archtraitor of his country.

Sinclair will, no doubt, spread a feast to-night when he will stand up and say, if he dared to say, "My money is powerful; it is stronger than the institutions that stand on yon Capitol Hill, stronger than the statutes enacted by Congress, stronger than the so-called justice that they claim governs and is over all in this country. My money has wrought this thing and out of the clutches of the Government and its law I am free because I and my money have willed it."

What has he done? He has left a slimy trail behind him that stinks with scandal, corruption, crime, and treason, and the Capital to-day and the Nation to-day are given notice that the ends of justice have been defeated at the seat of government—that a rich man has been acquitted, not because the facts and law justified it, not because he was innocent, but because he corruptly used the power of his purse to procure the results achieved. Admiral Robison will never be able to lift the black cloud that hangs heavy over his guilty head.

Mr. President, it is the duty of Congress to pass additional laws if we have not already laws sufficient to cover all these national scandals and crimes.

There ought to be a statute that would imprison for life any citizen who corrupts a public official and one to imprison for life any public official who becomes corrupt and betrays his country. Neither one of them should ever again be permitted to walk the earth a free man, or stand out in the open under the blue sky of heaven, who betrays his trust, proves traitor to his country, and dishonors himself and those who trust him. For the public officials are in positions of trust and power. They can do much to protect and preserve or to betray and destroy our free institutions. Fall is free out yonder, enjoying the ill-gotten gain that he obtained from Sinclair. He is a rich man now, so far as dollars go. So these mighty rich men, these national crooks, thieves, and scoundrels have laughed at and scorned the National Government. They have defeated the ends of justice and walked out free from the courthouse here at the Capital, within a stone's throw of the White House, where once sat the mighty Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Wilson. And, Senators, all this has transpired right here in the Capital of our country in this morning of the twentieth century, where we of America are supposed to be the "heirs of all the ages in the foremost files of time."

ERADICATION OF PINK BOLLWORM

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably with amendments, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, Senate Joint Resolution 129, to provide for eradication of pink bollworm and authorizing an appropriation therefor, and I submit a report (No. 865) thereon.

Mr. President and Senators, this is a great emergency. The paper that came in this morning, the United States Daily, shows that the bollworm quarantine has been extended to nine counties in Texas. It is a very serious matter, really an emergency, threatening the entire industry. The Federal Department of Agriculture thinks this pest can be entirely eradicated. It was eradicated, I will say, from southeastern Texas and southwest Louisiana in 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, at a cost to the Government of around $3,111,000. Now it has gotten into the western part of Texas, and it threatens the whole industry.

The report of the Secretary was favorable, the Budget recommended it, and there is a unanimous report from the Committee on Agriculture. I would not ask to have this matter brought up at this time if there were not a real emergency, which ought to be acted upon promptly. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would let this go over until Monday. Let me say that in the closing hours of the last session a demand was made for an appropriation of $10,000,000, as I recall—perhaps it was more—because of the great danger that threatened the corn crop, the statement being that $10,000,000 must be appropriated to eliminate the corn borer before we left the Senate Chamber. I have heard a vast amount of criticism over the action of the Senate, and many have contended that the appropriation was not needed and that much of it had been inefficiently used.

I do not like these imminent appropriations that have to come before us and be passed upon in a few minutes, without full consideration, calling for such stupendous sums.

Moreover, the agricultural appropriation bill which has just been passed carries more than $140,000,000, and in that measure there were a large number of items dealing with subjects of this character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator object?

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not object. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD] can tell him something about the necessity for this action.

Mr. KING. I will object for the present. I suggest that the Senator seek to have the joint resolution come up later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah to object?

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Utah asks that the joint resolution go over for the present. He may withdraw his objection later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11020) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1181) authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12286) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, we have had some interesting views with regard to the so-called war in Nicaragua. I studied international law under a democratic professor of international law, the late Professor Strobel, who was at one time advisor to the King of Siam, at one time minister to Spain, and at one time Assistant Secretary of State. It was Professor Strobel's idea, as supported by most of the textbooks which we used, that war was a very definite, clearly defined, legal status.

I do not believe in the doctrine of outlawing war, because it appears to me that war is illegal until the Congress makes it legal. If anybody wants to start a war because he thinks it is legal, he will soon find out that it is contrary to law, that the only way there can be war is by special act of Congress. When the people of the United States, through their representatives, indicate that they believe that war is necessary, then that war and that war alone becomes legal.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator from Connecticut then does not agree with the Senator from New Jersey in his statement yesterday that a state of war does exist in Nicaragua?

Mr. BINGHAM. I listened to the Senator from New Jersey during his address yesterday, and I did not hear him make that statement. Perhaps I was not listening at the particular moment the Senator thinks he made it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will remember, if he was here, that it came out in answer to a question I asked him at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I heard the Senator endeavor to secure an admission of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. I got it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad the Senator was satisfied.

Mr. NORRIS. I was satisfied.

Mr. BINGHAM. I can assure the Senator that he will not be satisfied with my position.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that in advance, of course.

Mr. BINGHAM. So do I.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to quote what the Senator from New Jersey said, I can refresh his memory.

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I read from yesterday's RECORD:

> Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question or two. He said he would be pleased to be interrogated when he had finished.
>
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska for that purpose?
>
> Mr. SACKETT. I yield.
>
> Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, a state of war exists now in Nicaragua?
>
> Mr. EDGE. I presume technically; yes.
>
> Mr. NORRIS. Then I would like to ask the Senator if the Constitution of the United States, which he says is being amended, has not been amended by that war being brought about by the President, without any declaration on the part of Congress.
>
> Mr. EDGE. Technically so.
> Mr. NORRIS. That is all I want to know.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to have my memory refreshed in the matter. I do not agree with that position, because I do not believe that technically a state of war exists in Nicaragua, and if the Senator will do me the honor to listen to that which I have prepared——

Mr. MCKELLAR. May I interrupt the Senator again, just before he begins his remarks?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator says that a state of war does not exist in Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator think a state of war exists in Chicago?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No.

Mr. BINGHAM. They kill people there.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I know; but this is different.

Mr. BINGHAM. There are also machine guns being used.

Mr. NORRIS. We have our troops in Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have policemen in Chicago.

Mr. MCKELLAR. We are proceeding against an army in Nicaragua, and that army is proceeding against our troops in Nicaragua, and men are being killed on both sides. The Senator will certainly admit that statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. Men are being killed on both sides in Chicago, as far as I can learn, but that does not prove there is a state of war there.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator certainly knows better than to say that conditions existing between the American Government and Nicaragua are similar to those existing in Chicago. Surely the Senator can not take that position. I have too much respect for the Senator's views to believe for a moment that he would say that there is any similarity between the two situations.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator, I am sure.

I was very much interested in an article which the junior Senator from Wisconsin asked to have printed as a Senate document some time ago, and which he quoted recently. It is called Senate Document No. 39, and in it an effort is made to show that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress has power—sole power—to declare war. In the course of the article reference is made to Article I, section 8, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, to debates in the Constitutional Convention, and to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Quotations are made also from the utterances of Presidents and Secretaries of State to show that they recognized that the power to declare war rested with Congress.

The meaning of the provision of the Constitution cited seems so clear that it is strange that it should be deemed necessary seriously to argue that the Congress possesses power to declare war. This power has on several occasions been exercised by the Congress and, while questions have been raised as to the dates on which a war began or the date on which a state of war ceased to exist, so far as is known no question has ever been raised as to the power of Congress to declare war or to recognize the existence of war by declaring that a state of war existed, or as to the efficacy of a declaration made by the Congress that a state of war existed. The opening and closing pages of the article, however, disclose that the purpose in engaging in so laborious a discussion of so simple a question is to show that, since 1903, Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Coolidge, in employing the armed forces of the United States without authorization of Congress, have sought to wrest the war-making power from Congress. The author of the article seeks to exclude President Wilson from the scope of the accusation by explaining that, although President Wilson's ventures in the Dominican Republic, Haiti, and Mexico entailed the use of armed forces without legislative authority to a greater extent than has been done by any other President before or since his time, President Wilson acted unwittingly under the influence of holdover diplomats.

In the light of the evident purposes of the article, it seems that the real question raised—although little consideration is given to it in the article—is whether the use of armed forces in the manner in which they have been used without express legislative authority constitutes war. Since the article is a professed attempt to discuss the question from a strictly legal standpoint, and inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States by which the war-making power is placed in the Congress is the fundamental law of the country, the questions as to what constitutes war and whether the practice which the author seems to regard as so iniquitous constitutes war in contemplation of law should be considered.

A statement made in the opinion of the United States in Bas v. Tingy (4 Dallas, 37) as to the meaning of war is quoted in the article. The quotation is as follows:

> It may, I believe, be safely laid down that every contention by force between two nations, in external matters under the authority of their respective governments, is not only war, but public war.

This was obviously not intended as an all-exclusive or all-inclusive definition of war. Since war between nations is largely regulated by international law, it is deemed not inappropriate to set forth a definition of war used in a recognized work on international law. The following is quoted from Oppenheim's Work on International Law:

SEC. 54. War is the contention between two or more states through their armed forces for the purpose of overpowering each other and imposing such conditions of peace as the victor pleases. War is a fact recognized, and with regard to many points regulated, but not established, by international law. * * *

SEC. 55. In any case, it is universally recognized that war is a contention, which means a violent struggle through the application of armed force. For a war to be in existence, two or more states must actually have their armed forces fighting against each other, although the commencement of a war may date back to its declaration or some other unilateral initiative act. Unilateral acts of force performed by one state against another without a previous declaration of war may be a cause of the outbreak of war, but are not war in themselves, as long as they are not answered by similar hostile acts by the other side, or at least by a declaration of the other side that it considers the particular acts as acts of war. Thus it comes about that acts of force performed by one state against another by way of reprisal or during a pacific blockade in the case of an intervention are not necessarily initiative acts of war. And even acts of force illegally performed by one state against another, such, for instance, as occupation of a part of its territory, are not acts of war so long as they are not met with acts of force from the other side, or at least with a declaration from the latter that it considers the particular acts as acts of war. * * * (Oppenheim, International Law, 2d ed., Vol. II, pp. 60–61.)

Mr. WATSON. What is the Senator reading?

Mr. BINGHAM. This is from Oppenheim's great work on international law. The Senator will recall that Oppenheim is recognized as one of the world's great authorities on international law.

It will be observed that the author distinguishes between war and the use of armed forces short of war. The distinction between war in the legal sense and war in a material sense was recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in The Three Friends (166 U. S. 63). The following quotation is taken from the opinion in that case:

But it belongs to the political department to determine when belligerency shall be recognized, and its action must be accepted according to the terms and intention expressed.

That is a distinction which appears not to have been common on the floor of the Senate in recent discussions.

The distinction between recognition of belligerency and recognition of a condition of political revolt, between recognition of the existence of war in a material sense and of war in a legal sense, is sharply illustrated by the case before us. For here the political department has not recognized the existence of a de facto belligerent power engaged in hostility with Spain, but has recognized the existence of insurrectionary warfare prevailing before, at the time, and since this forfeiture is alleged to have been incurred.

It will be seen from the foregoing that, according to responsible authorities, the use of the military forces in itself does not constitute war as that term is understood in law and as it is used in the Federal Constitution. As a matter of common historic knowledge, it has been from an early date in this country's independent existence a practice for the Executive to employ the armed forces to protect American interests abroad.

In a message to Congress of December 6, 1805, President Jefferson, in speaking of depredations committed on the commerce of the United States under the authority of Spain, stated:

Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided. I have barely instructed the officers stationed in the neighborhood of the aggressions to protect our citizens from violence, to patrol within the borders actually delivered to us, and not to go out of them but when necessary to repel an inroad or to rescue a citizen or his property; and the Spanish officers remaining at New Orleans are required to depart without further delay. (1 Richardson, 389.)

In his message of November 16, 1818, to the Congress President Monroe stated:

In authorizing Major General Jackson to enter Florida in pursuit of the Seminoles care was taken not to encroach on the rights of Spain. I regret to have to add that in executing this order facts were disclosed respecting the conduct of the officers of Spain in authority there in encouraging the war, furnishing munitions of war and other supplies to carry it on, and in other acts not less marked which evinced their participation in the hostile purposes of that combination and justified the confidence with which it inspired the savages that by those officers they would be protected. A conduct so incompatible with the friendly relations existing between the two countries, particularly with the positive obligation of the fifth article of the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, even by force, those savages from acts of hostility against the United States, could not fail to excite surprise. The commanding general was convinced that he should fail in his object, that he should in effect accomplish nothing, if he did not deprive those savages of the resource on which they had calculated and of the protection on which they had relied in making the war. As all the documents relating to this occurrence will be laid before Congress, it is not necessary to enter into further detail respecting it.

Although the reasons which induced Major General Jackson to take these posts were duly appreciated, there was nevertheless no hesitation in deciding on the course which it became the Government to pursue. As there was reason to believe that the commanders of these posts had violated their instructions, there was no disposition to impute to their Government a conduct so unprovoked and hostile. An order was in consequence issued to the general in command there to deliver the posts—Pensacola unconditionally to any person duly authorized to receive it, and St. Marks, which is in the heart of the Indian country, on the arrival of a competent force to defend it against those savages and their associates.

In entering Florida to suppress this combination no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain, and however justifiable the commanding general was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Marks and Pensacola to terminate it by proving to the savages and their associates that they should not be protected even there, yet the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts those relations were preserved. To a change of them the power of the Executive is deemed incompetent; it is vested in Congress only. (2 Richardson, 42–43.)

In a note to the Spanish minister, dated November 30, 1818, the Secretary of State stated:

After a full and deliberate examination of these proofs, the President deems them irresistibly conclusive that the horrible combination of robbery, murder, and war, with which the frontier of the United States bordering upon Florida has for several years past been visited, is ascribable altogether to the total and lamentable failure of Spain to fulfill the fifth article of the treaty of 1795, by which she stipulated to restrain, by force, her Indians from hostilities against the citizens of the United States * * *. It is therefore to the conduct of her own commanding officers that Spain must impute the necessity under which General Jackson found himself of occupying the places of their command. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. II, p. 405.)

It will be noted that the author of the article published in Senate Document No. 39 quoted from a message of President Monroe of March 25, 1818. The message of November 16, 1818, shows that General Jackson penetrated the territory of Spain, took possession of Spanish forts, and employed the Army to a much greater extent than the message of March 25, 1818, from which the author of the article quotes, indicated. Furthermore, a statement of the Secretary of State in the note to the Spanish minister, an excerpt of which is quoted above, shows that President Monroe approved the action of General Jackson. Inasmuch as General Jackson, who headed the expedition into Florida was Andrew Jackson who later became President of the United States, it is probably unnecessary to make any further comments in regard to the views and action of President Jackson as to the use of the military forces when occasion for doing so arose.

The communications of Secretary Cass, quoted in the article, show without doubt that he considered that the Congress possessed the war-making power. They show also that, while Secretary Cass recognized that the war-making power was in Congress occasions had arisen in which it was necessary to employ the military forces of the United States without authorization by Congress. He apparently understood also that such use of the military forces did not necessarily constitute war. The following paragraph of Mr. Cass's letter to Mr. Body, part of which was quoted in the article, shows that Mr. Cass recognized the necessity of the use of armed forces without express legislative provision in some instances:

Cases may occur where the circumstances may justify the employment of our naval or military forces, without special legislative provision, for the protection of our citizens from outrage, but it is not necessary to examine the extent or limit of this right, because the principle is inapplicable in your case, where you demand a forcible interposition with the Nicaraguan Government, in order to give effect to the contract to which you refer. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. VII, p. 166.)

It appears from the above that Presidents Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, and Buchanan, although they affirmed that the power to declare war was in the Congress, authorized or employed force, without legislative authority, to protect American interests. The views of various Executives as to their power to employ the armed forces can probably better be judged by action which was taken under their authority than by statements which they made.

In May, 1811, the United States cruiser President attacked and disabled the British warship Little Belt. (History of the Navy of the United States of America, by Cooper, vol. 2, p. 26.)

In 1823 a force was landed at Siquapa Bay, Cuba, from the barges Gallinipper and Mosquito to pursue pirates who had fired on the barges. The men from the United States vessels landed and, with the local authorities, killed, wounded, and took prisoners all the pirates who had reached the shore from their vessel. About the same time a force was landed from the Greyhound and Beagle at Cape Cruz. (History of the Navy of the United States of America, by Cooper, 1866, vol. 3, pp. 26–28.)

In 1832 a force of 250 seamen and marines from the U. S. S. Potomac landed on the island of Sumatra for the purpose of punishing the natives of the island for the plundering of the vessel Friendship and the murdering of the mate of the vessel and other members of the crew. The landing force engaged the natives in action, stormed a fort on shore, and burned a considerable portion of the town. Two members of the landing force were killed and 11 wounded. On the return of the party on board the Potomac they were followed by the natives carrying a flag of truce and begging for peace. (History of the Navy of the United States of America, by Cooper, vol. 3, pp. 31–36.)

In July, 1840, a force of seamen and marines was landed from the Vincennes and Peacock on one of the Fiji Islands for the purpose of punishing natives who had attacked an American surveying party. The principal town of the natives was destroyed. About the same time a force of 70 officers and men was landed on another island of the Fiji group to punish the natives for killing two American officers who had been attacked while on shore. (History of the Navy of the United States of of America, by Cooper, vol. 3, pp. 45–46.)

In 1851 the U. S. sloop Dale visited the island of Johanna and obtained under threat of bombarding the town $1,000 as indemnity for the imprisonment and detention on the island of the captain of the American whaling brig Maria. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. VII, p. 112.)

In 1854 60 sailors and marines from the American sloop Plymouth and a number of seamen landed in China and cooperated with a force of English sailors and marines against the Imperial forces, who had seized an American pilot boat. Several Americans were killed and wounded. (History of the Navy of the United States of America, by Cooper, vol. 3, p. 102.)

In 1855 a force was landed in the Fiji Islands from the sloop John Adams to obtain reparation for the wrongs inflicted by natives on Americans residing on the island and shipwrecked seamen. After several sharp skirmishes and the burning of several villages, the native chief signed articles promising better conduct. (Cooper, vol. 3, p. 105.)

In November, 1856, a force of 280 sailors and marines was landed in China from the U. S. warships Portsmouth and Levant and stormed the Canton barrier forts. Firing from the forts was silenced by the Portsmouth, and the storming party took four forts. Following the capture of these fortifications the Chinese concluded a commercial treaty with the United States. (Cooper, vol. 3, pp. 105–106.)

In August, 1858, Secretary Cass addressed to the Secretary of the Navy a letter, reading in part as follows:

> In view of the bitter feelings of hostility which exist in the east toward Christians residing there, as manifested in the recent occurrences at Jeddah and in the island of Candia, and also in the late outbreak at Alexandria, I have the honor also to suggest the importance of our squadron being directed to traverse the whole of the Levant, showing itself along the coasts of Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and of Asia Minor for the purpose of affording all possible protection to the persons and property of our citizens as well as to remind the authorities in those regions of the power of the United States. (49 MS. Dom. Let., Department of State, pp. 111–112.)

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Just as a matter of comment, all with the exception of one citation fell under the administration of Democratic Presidents, which indicates that this was not a Republican policy or a Whig policy, but an all-American policy, including all parties.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator. There is no partisan politics in it. It has been the universal practice of American Presidents, and it has been our pride as American citizens that they have done so, to demand respect for American lives and property in foreign parts and to use the armed forces of the United States in commanding such respect whenever it was necessary to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say, in respect to the comment just made by the Senator from Ohio, that I beg that he will reconsider the attempt to link the transactions in Nicaragua with any of those to which the Senator from Connecticut is referring, because there is no parallel. The line of demarcation separating the incidents referred to by the Senator from Connecticut from the proceedings in Nicaragua is so apparent that it does not require a lawyer or a professor to distinguish it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course, that is a matter of opinion, which leads to debate, and I should prefer to continue my argument, but I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. As a matter of courtesy, I should like to state, as the Senator refers to Nicaragua, that the facts are that the marines were kept in Nicaragua eight years under Woodrow Wilson; and, secondly, that the marines were landed in Haiti by the order of Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I hope that we shall not open up the debate at this time, as I desire to complete the argument which I have prepared in an effort to show that, although Congress undoubtedly has a right to declare war, various Presidents of both parties have repeatedly used the armed forces of this country abroad without any direct authorization of the Congress and nobody has claimed that such action was war.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senator from Connecticut for interrupting him, but I thought my interruption was rather pertinent to what he was saying.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to say one word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I assume that the Senate does not overlook the proposition that by silent acquiescence—to use the phrase of the Supreme Court—the Congress has approved of the use of force by or through the order of the Presidents, and, therefore, as of now, by silent acquiescence, the present occupant of the White House had legislative authority and approval for what he has done.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to resume the historical summary I am submitting, I desire to say further that under the administration of President Lincoln, in 1863, the Pembroke, a small American steamer, laden with merchandise from Yokohama, in attempting to pass through the Straits of Shimonoseki, was fired upon from the shore and by an armed brig belonging to the Prince of Nagato. The vessel was not struck. The American minister demanded redress for the insult to the American flag, and by his direction the commander of the U. S. S. Wyoming proceeded to Shimonoseki to retaliate. He found three vessels of the prince lying at anchor near the shore. He attacked them and, after a short conflict with them and the shore batteries, sank a brig and blew up a steamer, by which action some 40 persons were said to have been killed. On the Wyoming there were five killed and six wounded. The American minister presented to the Japanese Government a claim on behalf of the Pembroke for $10,000, covering loss of time and freight and the abandonment of the voyage. The claim was promptly paid. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. VII, p. 116.)

In 1864 the Mikado Government in Japan refused to recognize treaties which had been concluded with the United States, France, Great Britain, and the Netherlands. The Mikado closed the Straits of Shimonoseki. The naval forces of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands jointly proceeded to force open the Straits and obtained the unconditional surrender of the prince. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. V, p. 749.)

In 1868 armed forces of the United States were landed at various places in Japan to protect the interests of American citizens; and all this without any authorization on the part of Congress or any claim that the President was going beyond his power.

In 1893 the Brazilian Navy at Rio de Janeiro, under the command of Admiral Mello, revolted. The insurgents interfered with commercial operations at the port and threatened to bombard the city. They attempted to prevent vessels from going to the docks. Admiral Benham, of the United States Navy, employed force to protect American vessels desiring to go to the docks. In his annual message of December 3, 1894, President Cleveland referred to this incident as follows:

It appearing at an early stage of the insurrection that its course would call for unusual watchfulness on the part of this Government, our naval force in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro was strengthened. This precaution, I am satisfied, tended to restrict the issue to a simple trial of strength between the Brazilian Government and the insurgents, and to avert complications which at times seemed imminent. Our firm attitude of neutrality was maintained to the end. The insurgents received no encouragement of eventual asylum from our commanders, and such opposition as they encountered was for the protection of our commerce and was clearly justified by public law. (Moore's International Law Digest, Vol. VI, p. 439.)

In 1894 a detachment of 21 marines and 29 sailors was landed in Korea from the U. S. flagship Baltimore to protect the American Legation and American missionaries there. (Report of the Secretary of the Navy, 1895, p. 523.)

In 1900 United States troops and marines were sent to China to guard the American Legation and to participate in the operations against Tientsin and Peking at the time of the Boxer uprising. (Foreign Relations of the United States, 1900.)

Intervention in the Dominican Republic and Haiti is mentioned in the article, but the suggestion conveyed by the article that the President exceeded his constitutional authority is not convincing.

The taking of Vera Cruz by United States naval forces in April, 1914, was the result of direct affronts to this Government by General Huerta and his adherents through the arrest of the paymaster of the U. S. S. Dolphin, who had landed at Tampico with a whaleboat and boat's crew to take off certain supplies needed by his ship; the arrest at Vera Cruz a few days later of an orderly from the U. S. S. Minnesota, who had gone ashore in uniform to obtain the ship's mail; the withholding by authorities of the Mexican telegraphic system until peremptorily demanded by the American chargé d'affaires in person of an official dispatch from this Government to its embassy in Mexico City. For the incidents at Tampico and Vera Cruz Admiral Mayo demanded that the flag of the United States be saluted with special ceremony by the military guard of the port.

The immediate purpose of the landing of forces and the taking of possession of the customs was to prevent the landing of a cargo of arms intended for the Huerta régime. In this case, however, the President had delivered a message to the Congress on April 20, fully setting forth the facts, and the House of Representatives had passed a resolution supporting the President's position.

The forces were landed on April 21, and the Senate approved the House resolution the day following, namely, April 22, 1914. In submitting the matter to Congress and requesting the latter to support him in his contemplated action the President stated:

No doubt I could do what is necessary in the circumstances to enforce respect for our Government without recourse to the Congress and yet not exceed my constitutional powers as President—

I should like, Mr. President, particularly to call the attention of the Democratic Senators to that statement of President Wilson that—no doubt I could do what is necessary in the circumstances to enforce respect for our Government without recourse to the Congress and yet not exceed my constitutional powers as President—

He went on to say—but I do not wish to act in a matter possibly of so grave consequence except in close conference and cooperation with both the Senate and House. I therefore come to ask your approval that I should use the armed forces of the United States in such ways and to such an extent as may be necessary to obtain from General Huerta and his adherents the fullest recognition of the rights and dignity of the United States, even amidst the distressing conditions now unhappily obtaining in Mexico.

In connection with the Pershing expedition into Mexico in 1916 in pursuit of Villa, it was thought that an understanding had been reached between the executive branches of the two Governments in which Mexico had consented on the basis of reciprocity to the sending of American troops across the border. The President nevertheless laid the matter before the Congress, and the latter, by resolution of March 17, 1916, after reciting that the President—has ordered or is about to order the armed forces of the United States to cross the international boundary line between this country and Mexico—

And so forth, and gave its approval to the use of such forces—for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing the lawless bands of armed men who entered the United States from Mexico on the 9th day of March, 1916, committed outrages on American soil, and fled into Mexico. (Foreign Relations, 1916, p. 491.)

It appears, nevertheless, that the President considered that he had sufficient authority in this case without the approval of Congress. American troops were actually under way several days before any action was taken by the Congress. The resolution was apparently for the purpose of showing that the Congress supported the President in his action.

It is clear, Mr. President, from what is set forth above, that military forces of the United States have been employed without express statutory authority on numerous occasions practically from the beginning of the Government by many executive administrations. A substantially uniform practice of protecting American interests abroad, by force if necessary, negatives the suggestion that the Executive, while charged with the responsibility of protecting Americans abroad, is without means of meeting his obligation in this regard. While the war-making power of Congress has not been questioned by any President, and while Executives have as a rule been cautious to take no action which was likely to result in war without obtaining the approval of Congress in advance, yet they have with few, if any, exceptions been ready to employ the armed forces to protect American interests when necessary and when that could be done without precipitating war. Some of the instances cited above entailed the use of a considerable measure of force. American marines lost their lives and frequently the naval forces of the United States were employed with fatal consequences to their opponents. Yet none of the instances cited was considered as constituting war. When nations become engaged in war, in contemplation of law certain rights accrue to them as belligerents which did not accrue to the United States on these occasions. The legal consequences of a state of war are well defined in international law. The people of the belligerent countries become enemies, intercourse between them becomes unlawful, the right of visitation, search, and seizure accrues, and so forth. None of these rights was exercised or thought to exist in the frequent instances of the employment of force referred to in the foregoing. Neither do they exist at the present time in Nicaragua. None of these rights are exercised or are thought to exist in Nicaragua at the present time.

The reason why these consequences did not ensue is that war in the legal sense did not exist.

While the case In re Neagle (135 U. S. 1) did not require a decision of any question relating to the power of the President to use the armed forces of the United States to protect American interests, comments made in the course of the opinion of the court in that case rendered in 1889 are of interest in relation to the subject under discussion. Referring to section 3, Article II of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," Justice Miller stated:

Is this duty limited to the enforcement of acts of Congress or of treaties of the United States according to their express terms, or does it include the rights, duties, and obligations growing out of the Constitution itself, our international relations, and all the protection implied by the nature of the Government under the Constitution?

The Justice then goes on to say:

One of the most remarkable episodes in the history of our foreign relations, and which has become an attractive historical incident, is the case of Martin Koszta, a native of Hungary, who, though not fully a naturalized citizen of the United States, had in due form of law made his declaration of intention to become a citizen. While in Smyrna he was seized by command of the Austrian consul general at that place, and carried on board the Hassar, an Austrian vessel, where he was held in close confinement. Captain Ingraham, in command of the American sloop of war St. Louis, arriving in port at that critical period, and ascertaining that Koszta had with him his naturalization papers, demanded his surrender to him, and was compelled to train his guns upon the Austrian vessel before his demands were complied with. It was, however, to prevent bloodshed, agreed that Koszta should be placed in the hands of the French consul subject to the result of diplomatic negotiations between Austria and the United States. The celebrated correspondence between Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, and Chevalier Hülsemann, the Austrian minister at Washington, which arose out of this affair and resulted in the release and restoration to liberty of Koszta, attracted a great deal of public attention, and the position assumed by Mr. Marcy met the approval of the country and of Congress, who voted a gold medal to Captain Ingraham for his conduct in the affair. Upon what act of Congress then existing can anyone lay his finger in support of the action of our Government in this matter?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The remarkable feature in that case was that this Hungarian had made application and had secured his first papers——

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all.

Mr. FESS. And he had not yet been naturalized. He was awaiting the time, and in the meantime had gone over and was caught on this vessel; and our Government went to that extent to protect a man who was not yet a citizen, but had merely taken out his first papers.

Mr. BINGHAM. But in those days, Mr. President, we were a little more jealous than we are to-day of the honor attaching to the term "American citizen."

Mr. FESS. And that was W. L. Marcy, a distinguished Democrat from New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, if it will not lead to a long debate, because I desire to complete the argument. Then I shall be glad to yield. I am almost through.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I will not interrupt the Senator without his consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. Unless the Senator desires to add to the argument, which I am afraid the Senator does not desire to do.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not suppose I could add to any argument of the Senator, even if I tried to.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is far too modest.

Mr. NORRIS. But I was interested to know whether the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut were citing that case to show that there is not any war in Nicaragua, and I was interested in knowing what that had to do with the Nicaraguan situation. I may be dense, but personally I can not understand, if that is the point the Senators are trying to make, what it has to do with this matter. Nobody has contested anything of that kind.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not think the Senator was present when I began.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I was present.

Mr. BINGHAM. The effort of this argument, I will say to the Senator, is to show that acts of armed forces of the United States do not constitute war, and that when they have been indulged in or threatened, as in this case, it has not been held that the President exceeded his authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I think myself that the historical matters that the Senator is relating here are exceedingly interesting; but I have been listening very attentively to find one that is similar to the conditions down in Nicaragua, and I was wondering if it was the same Supreme Court decision where our Supreme Court passed on what constitutes war. They have passed on the question. I should like to have the Senator read that decision.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have read several decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not read any yet——

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not read any that suits the Senator; I realize that.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator has not read any that has any application to Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Boxer incident involved some force in China.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like also to read the following quotation from the dissenting opinion rendered in this particular case, which I believe is also of interest. The dissenting opinion reads:

> To illustrate the large sphere of powers self-executing and independent of statutes claimed to be vested in the Executive, reference is made to the continually recurring cases of the President's interference for the protection of our foreign-born and naturalized citizens on a visit to their native country; and we are cited, as a striking instance of the exercise of such power, to the case of Martin Kozsta, who, though not fully a naturalized citizen of the United States, had in due form of law made his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and who, whilst at Smyrna, was seized by order of an Austrian official and confined on board an Austrian vessel, and who, being afterwards delivered up to Captain Ingraham, commanding an American war vessel, in compliance with a demand, backed by a demonstration of force, on the part of that officer, was placed in the hands of a French consul subject to negotiations between the American and Austrian Governments, resulting in the famous correspondence between the American Secretary of State, Mr. Marcy, and the Chevalier Hülsemann, representing the Austrian Government, and the restoration of Kozsta to freedom. We are asked, "Upon what express statute of Congress then existing can this act of the Government be justified?"

I am sure the Senator from Nebraska will realize that that question has been repeatedly asked in this debate.

The Supreme Court said in this dissenting opinion:

> We answer that such action of the Government was justified because it pertained to the foreign relations of the United States, in respect to which the Federal Government is the exclusive representative and embodiment of the entire sovereignty of the Nation in its united character; for to foreign nations, and in our intercourse with them, States and State governments and even the internal adjustment of Federal power, with its complex system of checks and balances, are unknown, and the only authority those nations are permitted to deal with is the authority of the Nation as a unit.

It will be noted that reference is here made in 1889 to the continually recurring cases of the President's interference for the protection of American citizens. The transitory period, if there was one, has been somewhat misplaced by the author of the article under discussion. The truth is that there has been no transitory period. The armed forces of the United States have been employed necessarily from an early date to the extent that means were available and occasion arose to protect American interests. A possible reason for timidity on the part of the Executive at some stages of the country's history is suggested by Cooper, cited above, writing of the assault on the U. S. S. Chesapeake by the British warship the Leopard in June, 1807, as follows:

> With a foreign trade that employed 700,000 tons of American shipping alone, Congress passed a law on the 22d day of December, 1807, declaring an unlimited embargo, for all the purposes of foreign commerce, on every port in the Union, anticipating a large portion of the injuries that might be expected from an open enemy by inflicting them itself.
> This extraordinary measure was not avowedly taken in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, for the English Government early professed a readiness to atone for that outrage, but it originated in the feelings it engendered. The national pride had been wounded, and the injury rankled the deeper because all intelligent men felt that the Nation was not in a condition to resent the insult. The squadron that then lay in Lynnhaven was probably equal to blockading the entire naval force of the United States of America, and this, too, it ought never to be forgotten, in a country that met its current expenses and extinguished an ancient debt with the duties on its imports alone, which possessed the amount of shipping already mentioned and had nearly 100,000 registered seamen. (Cooper, History of the United States Navy, Vol. II, p. 23.)
> It is an axiom, as true as it is venerable, that a "divided power becomes an irresponsible power." Such, in fact, is the nature of the authority wielded by the National Legislature, the neglect of which, in the way of military and naval preparations, would long since have ruined most of the statesmen of the country, had they been guilty of the same omissions, as individuals, that they had sanctioned as bodies of men. We may lament the infatuation, condemn the selfishness, and denounce the abandonment of duty, which impel ambitious politicians to convert the legislative halls into arenas for political controversies that ought never to degrade their deliberations, or impair the sanctity of their oaths; but when we find the consequences of such unconstitutional innovations putting in jeopardy the lives and honors of those who are subject to martial law, a solemn and reproving sentiment must mingle with the views of every honest citizen, as he maturely considers the hardships of the case. (Cooper, Vol. II, p. 22.)

So much for Historian Cooper.

I find no difficulty in agreeing with the learned author of the article set forth in Senate Document No. 39 that, under the Constitution, the war-making power rests with the Congress. There is no question of that; but I submit that the gentleman has misconstrued the meaning and effect of the various acts and incidents which he has referred to as acts of war in his endeavor to show that the Executive has gradually encroached upon the prerogatives of the Congress. One of the most important duties resting upon the Executive of this country is the affording of protection to American interests in foreign countries. He would be grossly derelict in his duty if he failed to use the armed forces at his command in appropriate cases and within reasonable bounds without first petitioning the Congress for authorization. The exigencies of the situation would often render it impossible for the President to obtain advance authorization, and an effort to do so would, in many cases, result in a failure to afford timely protection.

Imagine, for example, what would have happened in connection with the Boxer uprising in China, to which reference has been made by the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], had the Executive awaited the authorization of Congress to use the military forces of the United States to afford protection to American citizens and the American Legations, who were at the mercy of fanatics. Failure of the Executive to act when the legation and a large number of American citizens in the legation were under siege would have been wholly inexcusable.

The Executive, as well as the other branches of the Government, has not only the powers conferred by the Constitution but has such implied powers as may be necessary to enable it to carry into execution power specifically conferred. The President by the Constitution is made the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He is also charged with the duty of conducting the foreign relations of the United States and of affording protection to American citizens and American interests. It would be an idle thing to say that the President, while charged with these grave responsibilities and while given the exalted position as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, can not use the forces at his command in the performance of the duty enjoined upon him of affording protection. It is not to be forgotten that, in carrying out this grave responsibility, the President must exercise sound judgment and discretion.

I believe, however, that President Coolidge, like his predecessors in the exercise of this power, has displayed that degree of sound judgment which persons who have held that exalted position have exercised and are presumed to exercise. He has maintained the best American traditions. Both he and Secretary Kellogg have shown remarkable and continued skill and ability in the handling of our relations with Mexico, as well as the other American Republics.

If we will think back just for a moment to the position which we took in regard to the Republic of Mexico and which they took in regard to us but a year ago, and the widespread clamor on the part of many people that intervention was necessary, and the widespread belief on the part of thousands of people that war was coming between us and Mexico, and that we were being driven into it by "the wolves of Wall Street" and the financial interests who were said to have their hands on this administration to such an extent as to direct its foreign policy, the present situation seems almost incredible. Within a very few months after the arrival of our new ambassador to Mexico, Hon. Dwight W. Morrow, the situation has changed. The country has become friendly. The most difficult possible matters at issue between the two countries have been ironed out. No one thinks of intervention. There is no talk of war; and for the first time in many years there is a feeling of cordial friendship and of international amity between this country and our neighbor to the south of us. To my mind, Mr. President, that is one of the greatest single achievements of the present administration.

At Habana recently, at the Pan American Conference, certain matters of great contention arose. Certain matters were given great prominence in the newspapers because of the possibility of friction between us and the Argentine Republic. There were at that conference certain individuals who endeavored to raise an issue with the United States; but, notwithstanding all that, the fact remains that more good was accomplished at that conference, more conventions were signed, more agreements were entered into between the republics of Pan America, looking toward peace in the future and prosperity in the Western Hemisphere, than at any preceding conference; and our relations with the governments of Latin America to-day are in good condition. They are friendly to us, notwithstanding the efforts of many on this floor to make people in foreign countries believe that we persecute the weak, that we are at war with Nicaragua because she is poor and needy, and that we are fighting for "the wolves" of financial Wall Street.

I believe if some of the Senators who have expressed those opinions were themselves more familiar personally with conditions in the republics to the south of us they would not indulge in flights of fancy of that character, or even permit their convictions to find expression unless they knew more about it. If they knew more about it, there would be no expression of that sort, which gives comfort to our enemies, which makes us ridiculous abroad, and which gives ammunition to those in the countries to the south of us who, for reasons best known to themselves, are constantly endeavoring to make trouble for the United States of America, which is their best and greatest friend.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I do not like legislation of this kind on an appropriation bill; but we have had a number of resolutions relating to this subject before the Committee on Foreign Relations, we have not had any report on any of them to the Senate, and have had no way to express our views in opposition to the President's policy in using the marines to supervise an election in Nicaragua.

Our forefathers provided, under our Constitution, that Congress alone can declare war, and can appropriate money to carry on war. Unless Congress prevents, some of this appropriation will be used for war. We are really at war with some of the people in Nicaragua. If Congress had declared war, even though I should have voted against it, I would stand by the President of the United States, no matter whether he were a Republican or a Democrat. There would not be a Senator in this Chamber who would support the President more steadfastly than I would. But the President has no right to send the marines to Nicaragua to supervise an election, which has really put this country into a war without the consent of Congress. Many of our marines have already been killed and they have killed many more Nicaraguans.

I believe that using our marines to hold an election is one of the most dangerous things we could do, and would lead us into serious troubles. I do no believe in sending our Army and Navy to all parts of the world to collect private debts of wealthy men, and to voice my protest I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] if no better substitute is offered. I believe the people of this country are more opposed to the Nicaraguan policy of the President than anything he has done since he has been in office.

I dislike very much to differ from him in any matter relating to foreign affairs and, although I differ with the President in sending our marines to Nicaragua, I would not vote to withdraw them at this time, because the President has made an agreement to carry on this work; but I do believe that when this work is over, we should withdraw our marines. I do not think we should ever attempt to supervise an election in a foreign country again. I have in the past and will continue in future to do everything within my power to prevent war. War is a relic of barbarism, and civilized nations should try every way to avoid war. For that reason I shall support an amendment which prevents our marines from remaining in Nicaragua longer than just after the election.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think that a very proper amendment to this bill would be a provision that none of the moneys carried in the bill should be expended for troops in Nicaragua, unless and until the President had secured the consent of Congress to keep the troops in Nicaragua?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; I favor that.

Mr. DILL. It seems to me that is a fair proposition, and one that gives every opportunity for Congress to pass on this question, and, at the same time, would not force the marines to be taken out.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not believe in a Senator embarrassing the President of the United States about foreign affairs, and I hope never to do so. I am sorry to differ from the President at this time, but I believe that it is important to the country that we should get out of Nicaragua. It has already led us into war with those people, and I am afraid it is going to lead us to even more serious war. I believe in avoiding war in every way we possibly can.

For these reasons, I shall support some amendment that will carry out my views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bingham	George	McLean	Shortridge
Blaine	Glass	McMaster	Simmons
Blease	Gooding	McNary	Smith
Borah	Hale	Mayfield	Steiwer
Bratton	Harris	Metcalf	Stephens
Brookhart	Harrison	Moses	Swanson
Broussard	Hawes	Neely	Thomas
Capper	Hayden	Norbeck	Tydings
Caraway	Heflin	Norris	Tyson
Copeland	Johnson	Nye	Vandenberg
Couzens	Jones	Oddie	Wagner
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Warren
Cutting	Keyes	Pittman	Waterman
Dill	King	Ransdell	Watson
Fess	La Follette	Schall	Wheeler
Fletcher	Locher	Sheppard
Frazier	McKellar	Shipstead

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], on page 53, line 17.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have a substitute which I wish to offer for the pending amendment. I would like to have a vote on it. It is to be offered at the same place, and reads as follows:

Provided, That none of the appropriations made in this act shall be used to pay any expenses incurred in connection with acts of hostility by United States marines in Nicaragua unless and until the President shall obtain from Congress consent to keep them there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama. [Putting the question.] The nays have it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand sufficiently seconded? [After a pause.] Apparently it is, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. I do not quite understand the situation. I had the floor, and had been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought it was agreeable with the Senator to have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not any objection myself.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then let the roll be called.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will state the point of order.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I question whether the requisite number indicated a desire for a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Chair had already announced that the roll would be called and the clerk directed to call it.

Mr. NORRIS. If we are going to be at all technical, I make the point that the Chair had no authority to recognize the Senator from Alabama with his proposition after he had recognized me and I was entitled to the floor. However, I make no point of it. I do not care.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection. The Senator can go ahead and make his speech now.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing to wait until Monday. I do not care whether we vote to-night or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was under the impression that the Senator from Nebraska had yielded the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I had not.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who understood that there would be no yea-and-nay vote on this subject this afternoon. I had understood the first amendment would be passed on by a viva voce vote. In view of that fact I do not think it would be fair to those Senators who are not here to have a yea-and-nay vote now.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is true, of course, we ought not to have a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Nebraska would like to speak on the pending question this afternoon, I would be glad to have him do so. Otherwise I shall ask for a recess until Monday.

Mr. HEFLIN. We are going to have a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment of mine. I do not agree to this performance of having an agreement with Senators on the side who want to attend ball games and other things, that we will not have a yea-and-nay vote. The American people have a right to a yea-and-nay vote when their representatives here demand it. If Senators want to leave their place of duty and go somewhere else, and somebody here enters into an agreement with them that there will not be a yea-and-nay vote, I insist it is a very high-handed piece of leadership in this body. I do not think any leader on either side of the Chamber has the authority to engage in such tactics.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator from Alabama that there was an understanding that there would be a number of speeches upon the general subject before the question of a vote upon the various amendments which will be offered would be brought up for consideration, and it was the consensus of opinion that the discussion on the general subject would consume the afternoon and that a vote would be taken on Monday upon the Senator's amendment and any others that might be offered.

Mr. HEFLIN. But the Senator from Kansas said that there was an understanding that there would be no yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask to have the Official Reporter's notes of the Senator's statement read.

Mr. CURTIS. Let me state what I intended to say and what I believe I said.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can state now what he intended to say, but I am talking about what he did say.

Mr. CURTIS. What I said was this——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I claim the floor for the purpose of debating the pending amendment. I will settle the question in that way.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not want my position to be misunderstood or misconstrued. There were a number of Senators who indicated their intention to debate the pending amendment. A number of other Senators came to me and said they understood there would be no yea-and-nay vote upon the Nicaraguan question this afternoon. I talked with one or two Senators interested in the amendment, and they said they did not care for a yea-and-nay vote upon the pending question, and that there would be other amendments offered upon which there would be a yea-and-nay vote; probably on Monday. In view of the fact that those Senators went away believing there would be no yea-and-nay vote this afternoon, it would be unfair to them to have one. So far as I am personally concerned I am ready to vote at any time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Hereafter I do not want anybody to make an agreement that we will not have a yea-and-nay vote, and then, when some Senator, exercising his right as a United States Senator, asks for a roll call, Senators sit with their hands down and refuse to call for a yea-and-nay vote because they quietly had an understanding with some Senator who wants to take his ease and go somewhere. We would all like to get out and get some fresh air, but let us not legislate in that way. No Senator here has a right to traffic away the rights of other Senators to the extent that we are not permitted to have a yea-and-nay vote because some Senator happens to be absent. I think each Senator ought to stand on his own rights under the Constitution and that other Senators ought to be here. I would like to change the rule so that when a Senator has to be away for any great length of time he must get permission from the Senate to absent himself.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course this tempest in a teapot does not require any serious discussion. The rule has been in effect as long as I have been acquainted with this body that where Senators threaten to make a speech others who do not want to suffer may enter into an agreement that they will go away and come back and vote the next day. I do not want to see that right of escaping punishment abrogated. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Until the Senator from Arkansas can get to the point where he can screw up his courage to tell the country how the Arkansas delegation stands on Al Smith, he ought not to make any such suggestion as that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Whenever the Senator from Alabama can find out what he is going to do himself, then he can lecture somebody else. Until he can convince us that he knows what he is going to do himself, he had best consult his own case and not lecture other people.

Mr. HEFLIN. The country knows that I am against him.

Mr. CARAWAY. The country knows the Senator has said so, but they do not know how the Senator will vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to vote against him.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he is nominated will the Senator vote against him or for him?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not cross that bridge until I come to it. [Laughter.] If he is going to obtain the nomination by such tactics as were employed in Arkansas and Iowa and Illinois he will have a good deal of explaining to do. I do not think the Democratic Party is ready to sanction the sale of the Democratic nomination. We are not ready to sell out to the Roman Catholic political machine and the whisky interests.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me to move a recess?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for that purpose.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, April 23, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, April 21, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The Lord God is a sun and shield; no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly. At the call of this day do Thou make goodness and gladness the aroma of our conduct; bless us with a realization of Thy presence and crown our labors with success. Qualify us in those virtues that make for personal rectitude and stability of government, and give us the blessing of a mind that sees and of a heart that feels. Persuade us that purity is never so divine as when it appeals to the impure; that strength is never so courageous as when it helps the weak, and wisdom is never so learned as when it instructs the ignorant. When the experiences of life come hard and the head is bowed and the heart is heavy, gracious Lord, bestow sweet peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 463. An act for the relief of David J. Williams; and

S. 3793. An act authorizing the St. Croix Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Croix River near Grantsburg, Wis.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9495) entitled "An act to provide for the further development of agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act entitled 'An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts,' approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. McNARY, Mr. CAPPER, and Mr. SMITH to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had concurred in the following concurrent resolution:

House Concurrent Resolution 31

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 244) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing a modification of the adopted project for Oakland Harbor, Calif."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 11404. An act authorizing the Port Huron, Sarnia, Point Edward International Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, beginning next week, I ask for an indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF COL. WADE H. COOPER

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short address of Colonel Cooper on the occasion of the dedication of the medical building at Howard University.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the following address by Col. Wade H. Cooper, president of the Continental Trust Co., Washington, D. C., was delivered Monday, April 9, 1928.

In addition to assistance given to Lincoln Memorial University at Cumberland Gap, Tenn., and other educational institutions, Colonel Cooper was one of the first contributors to the new medical building at Howard University.

His speech delivered on this occasion praised the colored people for the progress they had made since their emancipation and was full of helpful suggestions for maintaining harmony between the races. Colonel Cooper is a southern man, and his speech is therefore so unusual that I think it deserves to be inserted in the RECORD.

DEDICATION OF THE MEDICAL BUILDING AT HOWARD UNIVERSITY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, we have all had some unpleasant experiences during our lives, but these unpleasant experiences have been more or less counteracted by the more pleasant experiences of life.

On the 4th day of last July, at the flag raising of the Shelter Harbor Country Club, Shelter Harbor, R. I., between Newport and Watch Hill, known as the Land of the Last of the Mohicans, near the very spot where King Philip made his last stand for supremacy in this country, I delivered a regular Fourth of July oration to a large assembly gathered from all over New England. I had a wonderful reception and regarded the occasion as one of the most pleasant of my life.

From Rhode Island I journeyed westward to the State of Minnesota, where on Lake Minnetonka and Lake Minnehaha, the land of Longfellow's Hiawatha, I enjoyed a most pleasant outing. Thence I journeyed westward again to the Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, California, Oregon, Washington, and finally by boat over the beautiful Puget Sound to Victoria and Vancouver in British Columbia. All of this was fine. But let me tell you, nothing was finer or more pleasing to me than the moment when I stepped from the Baltimore & Ohio train in our own Union Station in our own beautiful National Capital.

When your distinguished president came to my office and requested me to give him a contribution of $1,000 toward the erection of this medical building, I did not hesitate a minute. With pleasure I handed him my check for the sum of $1,000.

And nothing pleases me more than to be able to appear here to-day and pay tribute to the heroic colored men and women whose names are inscribed upon this tablet to perpetuate their memories for having made possible the erection of this magnificent medical building by their different contributions.

In this connection and at this time, I also desire to make mention of the John R. Francis scholarship fund of $2,500 donated by Mrs. Bettie G. Francis in memory of her husband on May 26, 1926, the proceeds of which are to be used for the maintenance of the John R. Francis scholarship fund of the medical school. Doctor Francis was a member of the faculty of the school of medicine during the nineties.

I also wish to make mention of a bequest of $2,500 made May 31, 1922, under the will of Dr. George W. Cabaniss, member of the medical class of 1890, for the establishment of the George W. Cabaniss medical scholarship fund. This bequest was paid in full during 1925.

Both of the above funds show the desire of the respective donors to be helpful, and these funds, as well as the other funds contributed, mean much more for this medical school than can possibly be expressed, for the good they will do will go on, and on, and on, until time shall be no more.

This tablet is in itself a great monument not only to the people whose names are inscribed thereon, but to the people from whom they came, to the people whom they represented, all the colored people of this great country, and the entire Negro race.

This tablet represents all the noblest, best, and truest sentiments of the human heart. This tablet represents sacrifice, self-denial, devotion, courage, determination, industry, integrity, frugality, economy, love, and charity.

The poet hath truly said:

> "That man may last but never lives,
> Who much receives but nothing gives;
> Whom no one loves, whom no one thanks,
> Creation's blot, creation's blank."

There is nothing finer or better than the desire of one human being to be helpful to another; there is nothing finer or nobler than the desire to these people to be helpful to their fellows by contributing and making possible the erection of this great medical building, where young men from different parts of the country may come and, by faithful application, qualify for administering to sick and suffering humanity.

This tablet represents more than what I have said, for it represents the progress of the Negro race since the immortal emancipation proclamation by Abraham Lincoln in January, 1863. I know of no race of people in all history, from the very earliest dawn of authenticity down to this very hour, which has made the progress that the colored people have made in this country within the past 50 or 60 years.

No statement to which mortal man ever gave utterance is truer than the statement of Abraham Lincoln, when he said: "This Nation can not endure one half slave and the other half free." And let me say here and now that if this Nation is to endure, it will have to endure as the result of our desire to help and not hurt each other. It will have to endure as the result of helpful cooperation and not dissension and strife.

The oldest republic of which recorded history gives us any account is the Hebrew Commonwealth, under the administration of Moses, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, lawgiver of all time. Then follows the ancient republics, including the Cathaginian Republic, the Lombard League, the Athenian Republic, the Roman Republic, the Venetian Republic, the Florentine Republic, the Achaen League, the Beotian Confederacy, and the Aetolian League.

The Venetian Republic lived for about 1,300 years, having endured longer than any other of the ancient republics. The Florentine Republic lived for about 450 years, or the shortest lived of any of the ancient republics.

Therefore, if our own Republic should live for 300 years more, it will then only have lived as long as the life of the shortest of the ancient republics, the Florentine Republic.

I am proud of my relations with the colored people, for they have always been pleasant and peaceful. I have always found that if you will help the colored man he will help you. Be true to him and he will be true to you. Some of my most faithful and devoted friends from childhood have been my colored friends. God bless them.

I am proud of the fact that no colored man has ever fired upon the flag of our country and that no colored man has ever betrayed our country—a record of patriotic devotion and loyalty likely unequaled in the history of the world.

There is nothing truer than the statement of St. Paul: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

You have been sowing good seed; keep it up, and in due season you will be able to reap a wonderful harvest. Do not be drawn aside from the main thing—the supreme thing—the wonderful harvest ahead of you, by trifling matters, but continue to improve, continue to move forward in every line, continue to equip yourselves; and when you are fully equipped you need not worry, for the whole world and all its opportunities await you.

And let us ever remember that "eternal vigilence is the price of liberty."

As I emerged from Westminster Abbey in London some time ago I stood with uncovered head before the statue of Abraham Lincoln, whose name I regard as the very synonym of liberty, freedom, and justice. And while Mr. Lincoln laid down his life in freedom's cause, let us remember that freedom can not walk alone, that freedom can not stand unsupported, that freedom must be sustained in order to be maintained, that in order to have freedom we must play the part of real freemen, that we must prove ourselves worthy of freedom, that we must show ourselves worthy of the esteem, respect, and confidence of our fellowmen, that we must be real men, men of courage, character, and capacity, loyal and faithful to our friends, our families, our neighbors, our country, and our God, and I know of no better method of displaying these qualities than by sustaining and supporting Howard University, its medical school, and all its other departments, as the university with all its departments is striving to do those very things that are so necessary and essential to make real men, men worthy of that freedom with which you have been so abundantly blessed.

One of the greatest documents in all history, the document which meant more for human liberty, human rights, and human justice than any other, until the immortal Emancipation Proclamation by Mr. Lincoln in January, 1863, was Magna Charta, when the people wrested their rights from King John at Runnymede. One article of about one dozen words in Magna Charta guaranteed to man every right which he could hope to enjoy. It was this:

"We will not deny, delay, or sell justice to any man."

And, while Magna Charta is a very long document, all these other articles were merely methods prescribed for sustaining and maintaining the article to which I have just referred. For instance, from Magna Charta we derived our celebrated writ of habeas corpus, from Magna Charta we derived our right of trial by jury, and, while we talk about our own Declaration of Independence and our great Constitution and Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and John Adams, all our institutions are likely based upon the declarations contained in Magna Charta.

But these rights by these Englishmen were not attained in a night or by a hurried fight—not at all—but by centuries of preparation. These Englishmen wrought and taught and fought all over the British Isle before they ever succeeded in wresting their rights from the king, and from that day to this Englishmen have been ever jealous in safeguarding their liberties, which means that we must be equally as jealous in safeguarding our own.

Let us ever be clean and correct in our habits, physical as well as mental. Cicero said, "Mental stains can not be removed by time nor washed away by any waters." Let us be clean and clear in our thoughts as well as our actions. And, above all, let us not be narrow-minded bigots.

The Negro, the Jew, and the Catholic can all stand the Ku-Klux Klan, but America can not stand it and will not stand it, for there is no place on the soil of America for any such a hooded organization. You do not have to worry about the Klan, for it will fall of its own dead weight.

In conclusion, let me say that after all the only real democracy is a democracy of education, a democracy of intelligent information.

Goethe said, "One of the prime requisites of genius was a desire to know the truth, a passion for the truth." Holy Writ tells us, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Howard University is striving to educate and enlighten her children, striving to ascertain the truth, and with her and her people all of us ought to be able to join joyfully in the old Latin maxim: "Non nobis solum sed patria et amicus" (not for ourselves alone, but for our friends and our country).

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman withhold his request until I can submit a request, and then I shall make no objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My object was to try to secure some information from the Republican leader, if the gentleman has no objection to my asking him a question or two in my time.

Mr. TILSON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time for this reason: We have had a very important legislative program pending here under a special rule, the Mississippi flood control bill, in which not only the entire country is very largely interested, but also the entire membership of this House. We proceeded with the general debate on the bill until it expired and we reached the time for consideration of this very important measure under the five-minute rule. It then developed, for some reason with which most of us are not acquainted, that certain negotiations were being undertaken by somebody in some way for the purpose of effectuating some purpose. I would like to inquire of the leader of the majority if he would be willing to acquaint the House with just what is being done to delay the consideration of the flood-control measure; what conferences, subterranean or otherwise, are taking place with reference to it, in order that we may become acquainted with the real situation, if the majority leader cares to take the House into his confidence on the question.

Mr. TILSON. There have been no subterranean conferences whatsoever, so far as I know. There have been conferences with members of the Flood Control Committee and others looking to an agreement as to certain points concerning which there have been differences of opinion. These conferences are still going on. I was before the Committee on Flood Control half an hour ago, and that committee was then considering the question of flood control. The distinguished minority leader was also present, and by a unanimous vote of that committee the minority leader and myself were asked to request that the consideration of this bill might go over until Monday, in the belief that the House will then be better able to consider the bill and that better legislation will probably eventuate by further conferences. This is all I know about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the gentleman, my inquiry is not at all critical. I do not interpose the question in any obstructive sense, but there are a great many of us here upon the floor of the House who have not been taken into the conferences of the negotiators on this question who are really anxious to find out what is the real situation, and I assume that when the gentleman says that conferences have taken place he means between representatives of the legislative branch and the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. TILSON. To a certain extent, yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order to try to iron out, if possible, some of the objections of the Executive to this measure as reported?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman from Connecticut give us any reasonably definite assurance that the measure will be proceeded with on Tuesday or Monday of next week?

Mr. TILSON. It is expected that it will come up Monday. I am sure that it was the expectation of the committee when they asked me to request that the consideration of the bill might go over to-day that the bill would be considered on Monday.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, all of us who are interested in this measure hope some agreement can be reached to effectuate the purpose, and the only purpose of my inquiry was to get some information about the situation.

Mr. TILSON. I have given the gentleman substantially all I know about it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The situation as described by the gentleman from Connecticut to the extent that the request was made by the Flood Control Committee that the program go over until Monday is correct. As to the conferences outside, I know nothing. The situation of Tennessee has been so repeatedly explained here that it is not necessary to explain it again. It is the only case I have ever known of in which the court, the jury, and the spectators all were for a proposition, and yet unable to work it out in the way I want it worked out. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, while we are on this matter I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question. I do not know—for he has not gone into the question—as to what object is being arrived at. The bill passed the Senate, was reported by the committee of the House, and was being considered. In the meantime the Chief Executive of the Nation gave out a statement in which he requested the country to prevent the graft of the railroad and the lumber interests and others from overreaching Congress and passing some legislation detrimental to the country. I would like to know whether that influence has been sufficient to reach the organization in the House as to what shall be done, since the other body unanimously passed the bill.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Texas does not propound a fair question at all.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is a fact, the press gave out the statement and put it in the President's mouth, and nobody has denied it—that this bill that passed unanimously in the Senate, 70 Senators voting for it and not a single vote in the opposition, was tainted with graft—was obtained by collusion between the railroads and the lumber interests.

Mr. TILSON. No such question as the gentleman has discussed has been considered in any conference that I have attended. Every conference I have attended has had as its object to arrive at a conclusion that will serve the purpose for which we are attempting to legislate, and at the same time properly safeguard the interests of the Government and the taxpayer. This has been the only object of all the conferences.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Connecticut on coming over to this side of the House and getting wisdom, statesmanship, and honesty. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. Well, if a Democrat does happen to have a good idea occasionally, I am perfectly willing to profit by it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, after listening to the Democratic floor leader you would be led to believe that the entire Democratic membership of the House was in favor of the bill as reported out by the committee, but when you look into the RECORD of the debate you find much opposition from the Democratic side to certain provisions.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous vote of the Flood Control Committee it is requested that the consideration of that bill go over until Monday. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House consider as in Committee of the Whole unobjected bills upon the Private Calendar, beginning at the single star.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the House consider as in Committee of the Whole the Private Calendar, beginning at the single star. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object, I am going to ask the gentleman from Connecticut to modify his request by beginning at the single star and concluding at Calendar No. 444. That will give us an opportunity to consider 40 bills. I am endeavoring to go over each one of these bills as carefully as I can, and I will say that I have not had an opportunity to examine the bills beginning with Calendar No. 444.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It has occurred to me that we can take up the Private Calendar with the understanding that only unobjected bills will be considered, and that will require only one objection.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the gentleman that I dislike to object to a bill that I have not had the opportunity to read.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would retain its place on this calendar.

Mr. TILSON. The bills objected to on the Private Calendar retain their place. It is not like the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that; but I dislike to object to a bill that I have not had an opportunity to read or look at the report, and therefore I hope the gentleman will modify his request.

Mr. TILSON. I will say that I am trying to take advantage of every opportunity to consider the Private Calendar. I dislike to have the session of Congress come to an end without giving everyone an opportunity to have his bills on the Private Calendar considered. I am simply trying to take advantage of every hour when not engaged in something else more important to consider this calendar. If we must stop at Calendar No. 444, I fear that we shall only take a small part of the time and that the rest of the day will be practically wasted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] that I am sure no Member who has a bill on the calendar can object to any Member asking that it go over without prejudice when the calendar is called suddenly in this way. I do not think that prejudices a bill in any way.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Connecticut? If I understand it, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has examined only 40 of these bills, or at least up to Calendar No. 444. When we reach that point, why not take up the Consent Calendar? The Consent Calendar is very much congested, and it will take more than two days outside of suspensions to get anything like through the present Consent Calendar. I called it to the Speaker's attention this morning. If we are going to start suspending the rules at 3 o'clock on every other Monday, we will never get through with the Consent Calendar. Suppose we consider the Private Calendar up until Calendar No. 444 is reached, and then take up the Consent Calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the Consent Calendar contains bills of great importance. They are public bills.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentleman is not prepared to go on with that calendar, very well.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not prepared to go on with that to-day at all.

Mr. TILSON. Will my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] withhold his objection for the present?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the objection, reserving the right, when we reach Calendar No. 444, to object to further consideration.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It will be necessary on account of the Private Calendar to have some night sessions, and we might as well put in this time now.

Mr. TILSON. That is the reason I make this request. We shall probably have to have long sessions, and, perhaps, night sessions, in order to give everyone a chance to have his bills on the Private Calendar considered. I am hoping that we may use such time as comes to us unexpectedly, like to-day, in the consideration of that calendar.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the gentleman suggests that we begin at what point?

Mr. TILSON. From the star where we left off yesterday and go right on with bills that are unobjected to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And by that the gentleman means to consider bills that require three objections?

Mr. TILSON. No; just one objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Can the gentleman say whether it is the purpose, in any event, to proceed to the consideration of any other business to-day than the Private Calendar?

Mr. TILSON. There is nothing else ready. To do so would be taking Members by surprise. I do not think that would be fair. I shall move to adjourn and lose the time rather than to do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, that is the question that I was about to ask, so that we may be sure nothing will be taken up other than the Private Calendar.

Mr. TILSON. It is not my purpose to take up anything else of importance unexpectedly, as this would be.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman of course understands that I have been asked to attempt to do this work, and it is entirely impersonal with me.

Mr. TILSON. I quite understand, and I think the gentleman is doing excellent work.

Mr. WARREN. I can not agree to consider these bills when I have not had the opportunity to go into them. Therefore I shall object to any agreement that takes up any bill after Calendar No. 444.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman does not have to object to any bill that he has not studied. He can ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. WARREN. While I am attempting to do this, I think I ought to have the opportunity of reading the bills and the reports before undertaking to consider them in the House.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a moment. I desire the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have a bill on the Private Calendar in which I am interested merely from the standpoint of desiring to help a man who has rendered faithful and efficient service to his Government in time of war and who later reenlisted, as he states, under a distinct promise that he would be returned to the Philippines for the remainder of the period. He claims that the Government violated that agreement, and he left the service. I want recognition for the faithful service he rendered in time of war, regardless of his later record. Will the gentleman from North Carolina object to the consideration of bills of that character to-day?

Mr. WARREN. What is the calendar number?

Mr. SPEAKS. It is Calendar No. 411.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But that comes within the number that the gentleman from North Carolina agreed to consider.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, if the Members of the House do not wish to use the time in this way, of course there is but one thing we can do, and that is to adjourn. I dislike very much to do it, and I wish to have the responsibility placed where it belongs.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that statement does not correctly represent the attitude of the membership of this House.

Mr. TILSON. I had no reference whatever to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DYER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, is my request granted that we go on with the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] permit this request to be granted as made, and when we reach Calendar No. 444, if the gentleman feels as he does now, rise and say he will object to further bills being considered? That will end the proceeding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut that the House shall consider the Private Calendar?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF WATERSHEDS OF NAVIGABLE STREAMS

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 1181, authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1181), authorizing an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate bill authorized an aggregate appropriation of $40,000,000 to become available over the period from the passage of the act to July 1, 1936. The amendment of the House provided an aggregate of $4,000,000, one-half of which was to become available July 1, 1928, and one-half to become available July 1, 1929. The conferees agreed upon a substitute provision authorizing a total appropriation of $8,000,000; $2,000,000 to become available July 1, 1928, $3,000,000 July 1, 1929, and $3,000,000 July 1, 1930.

J. B. ASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be well to have a word of explanation concerning this bill. I could not catch it from the reading.

Mr. HAUGEN. Eight million dollars is authorized, of which $2,000,000 is to be available on July 1, 1928.

Mr. SNELL. What for?

Mr. HAUGEN. Under the Weeks Act. Two million dollars is to be available.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman tell us what the legislation is?

Mr. HAUGEN. To authorize an appropriation to be expended under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 1, 1911, to enable the States to cooperate for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams.

Mr. SNELL. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. The effect of the amendment is that the House authorized $4,000,000 and the Senate $40,000,000, and the conferees agreed upon $8,000,000, $2,000,000 of which is to be available on July 1, 1928.

Mr. SNELL. Is that similar to the McSweeney bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not exactly similar. This is for the purchase of land.

Mr. SNELL. It does not cover the same proposition as the McSweeney bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. The McSweeney bill provides for the administration of the law and additional funds beyond what has been appropriated before.

Mr. SNELL. The bill provides for an expenditure of $8,000,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. The House bill provides for $4,000,000 and the Senate recommended $40,000,000, and the House agrees upon $8,000,000. The Senate bill from the present time up to the year 1946 provides for a total of $40,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

VALIDATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11020, validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, with Senate amendments, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill H. R. 11020, with Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11020) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar, beginning with the star.

LAGRANGE GROCERY CO.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7898) to ratify the action of a local board of sales control in respect of contracts between the United States and the Lagrange Grocery Co., of Lagrange, Ga.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Georgia state whether this is simply to ratify a settlement made between the War Department and the purchasers of these surplus supplies?

Mr. WRIGHT. Absolutely. This was referred to what is known as a local board of sales control, an organization created by the War Department under authority of law. This local board of sales control made a thorough investigation and report, and my constituent, the Lagrange Grocery Co., accepted that, paid the money they said should be paid, and received the goods.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did the law provide that such a settlement would have to be ratified by an act of Congress?

Mr. WRIGHT. No; it did not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then why should we ratify it now?

Mr. WRIGHT. The whole trouble arose by reason of a ruling of the Comptroller General.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did he hold that the board was not authorized to make this settlement?

Mr. WRIGHT. I presume that is what he held.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the board was created by act of Congress?

Mr. WRIGHT. Absolutely; it was a Government organization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And this will close the deal as between the Government and the grocery company?

Mr. WRIGHT. Absolutely. It simply ratifies what this board did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That inasmuch as the Lagrange Grocery Co., of Lagrange, Ga., in disposing of 10,000 cotton undershirts, 10,000 cotton undershirts, 2,000 cotton undershirts, 5,000 shoe brushes, 5,000 shoe brushes, and 1,000 shoe brushes purchased from the United States Government under sales contracts Nos. SE-5428, SE-5427, SE-5251, SE-5625, SE-5624, and SE-5623, respectively, entered into between the United States and the said Lagrange Grocery Co. on February 6, 1922, has adjusted its sales prices in reliance upon the action of the local board of sales control of the War Department in reducing and fixing the price to be paid by the said Lagrange Grocery Co. under such contracts, such action of such board is hereby ratified on behalf of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CITY OF PARK PLACE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10218) authorizing the Court of Claims of the United States to hear and determine the claim of the city of Park Place, heretofore an independent municipality, but now a part of the city of Houston, Tex.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that I do not doubt in the least that there is a great deal of merit in the claim of this municipality, but let me submit to the gentleman, who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that if we establish the precedent that any municipality, city, or township which may have had its streets torn up by reason of the traffic of military trucks we are establishing a very dangerous precedent. My own city could come in and claim a million dollars.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Let me say to the gentleman that we have already established this precedent in a number of instances. There are several counties in the United States that have been paid for damage to their streets and highways, one or two in Texas, I think in Mr. CONNALLY's district.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Were they not cases where the road was used exclusively for military traffic?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Oh, no; they were regular highways built by the counties and erected by the counties.

Mr. KNUTSON. Was not Maryland reimbursed for damage to her pavements in connection with Camp Meade, through Representative ZIHLMAN?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. There have been quite a number of them. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that the board which was created immediately after the war passed on this claim and said that in their opinion the city should be reimbursed in this amount, and recommended it. It came up to the board in Washington and they turned it down on a question of law. They said they did not think a municipality had the right to make claims for damages done to its streets or highways.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Suppose New York City should come in with a claim for wear and tear on its pavements by trucks connected with Army posts around New York and connected with many military activities during the war. If that were done, it would run into millions of dollars, and every large city could follow that procedure.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that might be true, but this has already been done in a number of cases. Now, whether the Court of Claims is going to hold with the board that held that as a matter of law they were not entitled to any damages is an entirely different question. All I am asking is that this matter be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Minnesota has referred to the case of Maryland and the gentleman from Texas has referred to other cases in the State of Texas. Were they not disposed of by direct appropriations?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. They came out of our committee. I did not have this referred to my committee but to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And there were direct appropriations in those cases?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Direct appropriations were authorized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this the first case that will go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It is the only one I know of.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to take the chance that the Court of Claims will hold against you. That is our only hope, otherwise the doors are wide open.

Mr. HUDSON. This has been denied by the board of appraisers, has it not?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It has been allowed.

Mr. HUDSON. No; it has been denied.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. At Washington; yes; but the board of appraisers at Ellington Field, the officers who were convened there, allowed it.

Mr. HUDSON. I find this language in the report:

The case was reviewed under date of October 8, 1919, by the War Department board of appraisers, which recommended that the claim be denied, on the ground that it is not within the power of the municipality to collect damages from the owners of cargo vehicles of ordinary and well-recognized types when the street surface is damaged by the lawful passage of such vehicles, however frequent.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The board at Washington held that. They reversed the board at Ellington Field. The board there allowed the claim, but when the claim was sent up here this board reversed the board at Ellington Field.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the law laid down by the board is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If that be true, the case will go out on a demurrer in the Court of Claims.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can you demur in the Court of Claims?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. As I understand, you can plead anything there you can plead anywhere else.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Court of Claims be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to hear and determine the claim of the city of Park Place, Tex., heretofore an independent municipality but now included within the extended corporate limits of the city of Houston, Tex., for compensation for the destruction of the streets of the said city of Park Place by the Army trucks of the United States in the years of 1917 and 1918. Said claim shall not be barred by any statute of limitations nor because of the fact that the claimant was at the time of the injury a separate municipality and now a part of the city of Houston, Tex.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

P. L. ANDREWS CORPORATION

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2644) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the P. L. Andrews Corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

OLD DOMINION LAND CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2926) for the relief of the Old Dominion Land Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

ETHEL L. SAUNDERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11716) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents to Ethel L. Saunders, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue a patent to Ethel L. Saunders, of St. Cloud, Fla., for lot 3 of section 10, and lot 3 of section 11, township 26 south, range 31 east, Tallahassee meridian, a part of the lands embraced in homestead application (Gainesville 017626), filed June 18, 1924. The Secretary of the Interior is also authorized and directed, upon payment of $1.25 per acre, to issue a patent to said Ethel L. Saunders for lot 5 of section 11, township 26 south, range 31 east, also claimed by said Ethel L. Saunders under a settlement antedating the survey of the lands.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOE W. WILLIAMS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 484) for the relief of Joe W. Williams.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey by patent to Joe W. Williams, of Chipley, Fla., the west half of the west half of section 19, township 7 north, range 12 west, Houston County, Ala., upon payment by the said Joe W. Williams to the United States of the sum of $1.25 per acre at any time within 90 days after the enactment of this act: Provided, That upon default on the part of said Williams in making such payment within said period, all rights hereby conferred shall lapse.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN M. KING

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3222) for the relief of John M. King.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is interested in this bill?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. I am.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The department states that repeated effort has been made to locate the records to show that this man did not desert or that he was sick, as he states, with measles which affected his eyesight. It does not appear that this man really was engaged in active service at any time during the period of the war. I really do not see any merit in the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. But he was in the service when he was taken sick with measles and was sent home by authority of the military doctor and the disease was contracted in the service. The measles settled in his eyes and permanently injured his eyesight and rendered him unfit for further military service. He was given permission to return home by the battalion doctor and remained continuously at his home near Dadeville, Dade County, Mo.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is reading from the report?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. I am reading from the report, and that statement is taken from the testimony of men who knew him and who served with him and are familiar with the facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The records of the department state that nothing has been found of record to show that he was sick or under medical treatment at any time during the period of his actual service.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the records in the Civil War were not kept as well as they were in the later wars, and you have got to establish some of these things by those who are familiar with the facts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it is really surprising how well the records were kept.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. The testimony here is from parties who served with him in part, and these reputable people have sworn to the facts in the case, and I think the record of this old man, who is now deceased, ought to be permitted to be corrected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman pleases, he is supposed to have been mustered in the service on September 1, 1861. On the company roll covering the period from July 1 to September 1, 1861, he is reported absent on leave of absence to protect his property, and on the muster roll dated October 31, 1861, he is reported present. Now, we have one month there.

Then on December 31 he was absent without leave. On February 28 the muster roll shows that he refused to be mustered and had left the command. That shows that there were pretty good records kept at that time. Giving him the benefit of the doubt, he only served about 30 days in camp.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. That was in another service. He seems to have been in two services. There is most overwhelming testimony about his condition, and his being sent home by direction of the doctor because the measles had settled in his eyes and he was not able to serve. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How old is this man?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. He is dead, but his widow is living.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When did he marry?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Fifty or sixty years ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers John M. King, who was a private in Company D, Sixth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment: Provided, That no bounty, pay, or allowances shall be held as accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 9, after the word "regiment," insert "September 30, 1862"; same line, strike out all of the proviso and insert in lieu thereof "That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF COTTON EXCHANGES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. CONNALLY of Texas] be permitted to extend his own remarks in the RECORD on a bill introduced by him on the regulation of cotton exchanges.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to urge upon your attention a bill introduced by me (H. R. 10709) to regulate cotton exchanges and to stop gambling and manipulation of the cotton market by fictitious operations and by conspiracy to rob the farmer. It puts the cotton exchanges under regulations as the grain exchanges are now controlled. It provides criminal prosecution for those who violate the law. The present law does not provide penalties and does not afford proper regulation of the exchanges. The Connally bill does not destroy the exchanges, but it provides that their operations must be restricted to legitimate sale and purchases of cotton so that the market may in fact reflect supply and demand, and that the farmer may get a fair and honest price for his cotton.

Gentlemen of the House, it is notorious that during the fall of 1927 the cotton market was scandalously manipulated. In August the cotton estimate was 13,492,000 bales. December cotton on the New York Exchange went to 23.70 cents a pound. Immediately an organized drive was begun to break the market and December cotton was forced down to 18.92 cents. The September estimate was 12,692,000 bales, practically 1,000,000 bales less than the August estimates. By some character of conspiracy or manipulation between certain cotton factors and operators on the New York Cotton Exchange, December cotton was hammered down to 20.23 cents. With 1,000,000 bales less cotton, the price was forced downward to the loss of the farmer, merchant, and banker. The estimate for October was 12,678,000 bales, and in the face of that estimate cotton again declined to 19.4 cents. The November estimate made a slight increase and the December estimate fell 63,000 bales under November. December cotton was beaten down to 17.96 cents, or nearly $30 a bale below what cotton had sold for earlier in the fall and summer. And yet in August the estimate was 1,000,000 bales more than it was in November. The Connally bill is similar to the Vinson bill, by the gentleman from Georgia. I have no pride of authorship. I shall be satisfied if Congress will pass the Vinson bill or the Connally bill, or any other bill that will properly regulate the exchanges and stop gambling and manipulation. The Connally bill prohibits what is known as "straddling." It prohibits "washing" the market and "shaking out" spot cotton. It prohibits the dissemination of false information and it provides penalties for the violation of the regulations laid down in the act and laid down by the Secretary of Agriculture and the board to govern the exchanges. The Connally bill provides that if a cotton exchange violates the law or regulations it can be suspended or closed. Any operator on the exchange, who violates the law can be denied the privilege of the futures market.

The law of supply and demand in the cotton market during last fall was not permitted to operate by these artificial processes of tendering and retendering the same cotton repeatedly to fulfill future contracts. With no bona fide intention to sell or buy a real bale of cotton manipulators began a campaign to hammer down the market and shake out spot cotton held by producers all over the country. There is a large amount of spot cotton still in the farmers' hands and the object of the drive was to depress the market and to make the producers believe it is going even still lower and shake them out and buy their cotton at ruinous prices.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND

If supply and demand had operated normally, such fluctuation could not have taken place. It is self-evident that some sort of artificial juggling or manipulation operated to hurt the cotton producers, the bankers who held loans on spot cotton, and legitimate cotton merchants.

STABLE PRICE

Stability of price is desirable by the producers and legitimate cotton dealers. Violent fluctuations, up or down, are extremely harmful. It unsettles and disrupts business. Only those who gamble on the future market can be benefited by widely varying prices. A limit ought to be placed on the amount of fluctuation of the market for any single day of 50 points and no more.

FORMS OF MANIPULATION

Big operators on the exchanges, with large resources and much cotton at their command, can bring about manipulation. The same is true of big operators in any commodity. Through "pools" a few big operators can depress or raise the price almost at will. The same thing happens on the stock exchange. Pools ought to be prevented by law and operations on the exchanges ought to be made subject to the antitrust laws.

"Washing the market" takes place when the same firm or group, through its brokers, buys futures and at the same time through other brokers is selling futures. With large stocks of cotton such a scheme can send the market up or down almost at will. This is a form of "shadow boxing" harmful to the market. "Straddling" is another practice that is harmful. By selling May cotton and at the same time buying October cotton through other brokers, or vice versa, an artificial spreading of prices between the two months is brought about. One month goes up and the other down and the manipulator profits. It ought to be prevented.

CALL COTTON

Much has been said about the sale of cotton on call. A cotton buyer sells spot cotton based on some future month. He delivers his cotton to the big spot operator at a price to be fixed "on call." The seller puts up a margin. The big operator can not lose, because the margin protects him. When the cotton is called the price is fixed by the price of that month on the exchange. The seller takes all the risk.

LOW-GRADE COTTON TENDERED ON EXCHANGES

It is claimed that much of the cotton accumulated at New York for tendering purposes is "half-and-half cotton" of a weak staple, though technically of a tenderable grade. The staple may come within the law, but the cotton is unspinable, and sometimes rotten. Low-grade cotton when tendered is not accepted, because spinners will not buy it. On the other hand, the tendering of good cotton would assist the market by the absorption of cotton offered. Instead of a staple of seven-eighths inch, as is now permitted for tendering purposes, it should be fixed at fifteen-sixteenths-inch staple.

The Government ought to supervise the operation of the exchanges. They ought to be required to preserve an accurate record of all sales and purchases, and their books should be open to Government auditors. In this way illegal pools and conspiracies to put the market up or down could be detected. The Connally bill limits the tendering and retendering of the same spot cotton on contracts. Cotton when tendered should be merchantable.

Through the operations of the exchanges, the southern cotton farmers during 1927 suffered the loss of millions and millions of dollars. While we may not know without experimenting just what ought to be done, we know that something is radically wrong with the cotton market. If a 13,000,000-bale crop was worth 24 cents, a 12,000,000-bale crop ought not to have sold for $30 a bale less money. Stricter supervision and inspection of the books of the exchanges will result in much good. Illegal pools and conspiracies can be broken up and punished. To prevent a few big operators from controlling the market a limit ought to be placed on the amount any one firm could buy or sell on the future market in any one month, and, if possible, a proper parity ought to be preserved between each delivery month.

It is the intention of manipulators to make the spot-cotton holders shake out and sell their spot cotton, and once it is sold to the manipulators, once it is in their hands, it will go back to 23 or 24 cents per pound, as it was early in the fall, notwithstanding the fact that the actual production of cotton is practically 1,000,000 bales less than it was in August. The cotton farmers have lost 5 or 6 cents per pound through juggling and manipulation of the market.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Connally bill puts the cotton exchanges under strict regulation. It gives the Government the power to cancel or suspend their permits to do business if they permit manipulation of the market. It punishes any operator who violates the law or regulations. It prohibits "straddling" and "washing" the market. It restricts operations of the exchanges to legitimate purposes of buying and selling cotton and legitimate operations of that character. The Connally bill will save the cotton farmers millions upon millions of dollars. If you will pass the bill, you will be giving the farmers real relief and you will permit the normal laws of supply and demand to operate.

OLD DOMINION LAND CO.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 404, S. 2926, for the relief of the Old Dominion Land Co., the objection having been withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 404. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to certify for payment to the Old Dominion Land Co., from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,314.40, on account of destruction by the United States of two buildings formerly located on premises leased from the claimant in connection with Camp Hill and Camp Stuart, Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELBERT L. COX

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10702) for the relief of Elbert L. Cox.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia if all the facts in the case are stated on page 2 of the report?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes; and the letter of the War Department, and the War Department makes no objection to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was only a technical charge?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is all; he was exonerated from any intent to violate the Articles of War.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Elbert L. Cox, who was a member of Headquarters Troop, One hundred and thirty-fifth Machine Gun Battalion, Thirty-seventh Division, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a second lieutenant of that organization on the 19th day of August, 1918: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WESLEY JORDAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) concerning lands and property devised to the Government of the United States of America by Wesley Jordan, deceased, late of the township of Richland, County of Fairfield, and State of Ohio.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the acceptance of the devise and bequest made by Wesley Jordan in his last will and testament to the Government of the United States of America and recorded in volume 34, page 386, of the will records of Fairfield County, Ohio, be declined by the Government of the United States of America, and that the estate of the said Wesley Jordan be, and is, forever discharged from any obligation to the United States of America growing out of said last will and testament of said Wesley Jordan, deceased.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STEAMSHIP "CITY OF BEAUMONT"

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8001) conferring jurisdiction upon certain courts of the United States to hear and determine the claim by the owner of the steamship City of Beaumont against the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOPER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. I notice that the collision occurred on the 19th day of December, 1918. What is the reason for this long lapse of time?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The war principally. We passed a general admiralty bill to cover all such cases back in 1920. This collision antedates that bill.

Mr. HOOPER. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the City of Beaumont Ship Corporation, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, owner of the American auxiliary barkentine City of Beaumont, is hereby authorized to bring suit in personam against the United States within one year after this act becomes law to recover damages for any injury to the said steamer City of Beaumont which may have been caused by the U. S. S. Westland on December 19, 1918, and jurisdiction in admiralty is hereby conferred upon the District Court of the United States in the Southern District of New York, to hear, consider, and determine such suit upon the principles of liability, and in accordance with the practice obtaining in like suits in admiralty between private parties, and to enter a decree or judgment for or against the United States or said City of Beaumont Ship Corporation, including costs and interest at 4 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That either said City of Beaumont Ship Corporation or the United States as parties to any suit commenced as authorized above, may offer in evidence testimony heretofore taken on behalf of either of the said parties under any suits in admiralty heretofore pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, on behalf of said City of Beaumont Ship Corporation against either the steamship Westland or the United States of America as owner of the said steamship, the said libels having been excepted to by the United States of America only on jurisdictional grounds, and those exceptions being supported under recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

SEC. 3. That the suit herein authorized shall be brought and prosecuted in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, as amended in so far as such provisions are applicable thereto, unless otherwise provided herein. The right of appeal and review shall be afforded as now provided by law in like suits in admiralty between private parties.

SEC. 4. That in case a final judgment or final decree is rendered against the United States, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to pay such final decree, which shall be paid to City of Beaumont Ship Corporation by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the presentation of a duly authenticated copy of such final judgment or final decree.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That the claim of the City of Beaumont Ship Corporation, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, owner of the American auxiliary barkentine City of Beaumont, against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said vessel and the U. S. S. Westland on the 19th day of December, 1918, may be sued for by the said owners of the City of Beaumont in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the City of Beaumont Ship Corporation, or against the said corporation in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal, except that no interest shall be allowed on any claim: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by orders of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDWARD TOMLINSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10261) for the relief of Edward Tomlinson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the bill which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] spoke about a few moments ago. This soldier in whom he is interested did serve out one term in the Army. He then reenlisted on December 4, 1901, and deserted on March 12, 1902, after a three months' service. He has never been heard of since that time. For that reason I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. This soldier rendered faithful and honorable service during the Spanish-American War. He left the service without leave after the war period. I do not think this bill will confer any additional pension rights. It is my understanding under the regulations of the Pension Bureau that he now is entitled to a pension under the act of May 1, 1926, by reason of his Spanish-American War service.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, I have no special interest in this case, and whatever I may have said in the colloquy which occurred a short time ago referred to the principle involved. After a bill has gone to a committee, has received thorough consideration, and a unanimously favorable report and is sent to the floor of the House, I question the propriety of a Member after a hasty and merely a superficial investigation of the matter taking the responsibility of objecting to its consideration when in regular order it is reached on the calendar. Take the case of this soldier, and it is typical of thousands of them. He served faithfully and received an honorable discharge and returned to the United States from the Philippines. He was urged to reenlist, and consented with the understanding, as he claims, that he should be returned to the Philippines for service. He waited three months for that arrangement to be carried out. He regarded it as a contract between himself and the Government in which he had rights equal to those of the Government. After repeated requests to be returned to the Philippines, which were denied, he left.

I agree that that was not the proper course for him to follow, even though it was a contract, even though right and justice were on his side, what chance had he battling with this great Government without congressional action? Absolutely none. That is the only reason I am interested in his case. He is helpless, even though the equities are on his side. I doubt very much the propriety of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]—and I agree that he is acting with proper motives—in objecting to a bill under these circumstances.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a fair statement. I do not think it is fair to doubt the propriety of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SPEAKS. I do doubt the propriety of this course, although admitting he is within his rights.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think that is fair. Some of us feel that we have a duty to perform in respect to this calendar and that we must exercise the judgment that we have, whether it is as perfect as the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] or not, and whether it be or not, I do not think it is a question of propriety.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, in order that the RECORD may be clear, may I proceed for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, has my time expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no rule of time running.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPEAKS. I do not want five minutes. But since the question is up, I desire to say that on a previous occasion I undertook to obtain favorable action by the House on a bill which had been before Congress for many years. Senator Lodge, Senator Foraker, and other men of high standing in the Congress had made efforts to have the bill considered, but could not get final action because of the same program being followed as at this time.

I went into the case thoroughly, because I was convinced that justice demanded that the case was entitled to favorable consideration. One night when private bills were being considered it was objected to, and I pressed the gentleman who made the objection for some reason. The only reply he could give was that a certain gentleman had asked him to object to all these bills on that particular occasion. I insist that such procedure is not a proper method of conducting legislation. That is all.

E. H. JENNINGS, F. L. JOHANNS, AND HENRY BLANK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9620) for the relief of E. H. Jennings, F. L. Johanns, and Henry Blank, officers and employees of the post office at Charleston, S. C.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, clearly here is a case where the postmaster was under bond. What happened to the bond and what happened to the bondsman?

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman, I wish to say first that I do not happen to be the author of this bill. It is the bill of my colleague from Charleston, S. C. [Mr. MCMILLAN], who happens to be away at this time on account of a death in his family. The circumstances in the case are these, if I understand them correctly: The money-order clerk took the money involved some time during the day, the shortage being detected about the close of work hours in the afternoon. As soon as he was detected and he knew that others were aware that he had embezzled this money, he committed suicide. The money has never been located. The Postmaster General feels that the postmaster and the parties named in the bill here may be technically liable, but not legally so, because the post-office officials say that in the course of his duty this young man had access to these funds while performing his regular work, and that they should not be held liable for his misconduct. Now, as I understand it, the Post Office Department raises the question whether or not the bondsman of the postmaster himself could be forced to pay this money.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why not, under the provisions of the bond?

Mr. HARE. Because the Post Office Department, through its inspectors, does not claim that the postmaster himself was negligent in any way or responsible for this shortage. This young man had access to these funds in the regular performance of his duties, and there was no negligence on the part of the postmaster or these other employees who were under bond.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What efforts have the Post Office officials made to assert their rights under the bond?

Mr. HARE. I am not prepared to answer that further than to say that they have investigated the matter and recommend that this bill should pass.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This matter of releasing bonds is a sort of obsession to me. I think we ought to look into it.

Mr. HARE. We have looked into this case, and other bills of a similar character have heretofore been passed.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid taking up the time on similar bills, I make the inquiry how this bill happened to get before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? Perhaps it was because of the policy adopted by the Committee on Claims.

An employee of the post office, whether he be a postmaster or in some subordinate position, gives bond. The bond covers his honesty and integrity rather than that of anyone who is under him. The Government or the individual in private business could not hold the postmaster liable under that bond or the surety liable under that bond if some subordinate employee should default or rob or steal or get away with funds.

Now, we must realize that in public employment, particularly in the Post Office Department, the postmaster has no jurisdiction over whom he shall hire or whom he shall fire. That is done through the Civil Service Commission. They allot certain men, and then they have inspectors to keep guard and watch over the other employees. Now, if one of these subordinates gets away with a lot of money or a lot of securities, under the bond of the postmaster you can not hold him liable, because he performs his duty. He is not liable. If the system is wrong in the Post Office Department, it ought to be corrected. Every subordinate ought to be bonded to the Government or to the postmaster.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely wrong on the law and the facts, and the proof here is that in this case the bond was held liable and they paid the bond. For that reason I withdraw my objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That may be true, so far as that is concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to relieve E. H. Jennings, F. L. Johanns, and Henry Blank of the payment of the sum of $2,011.03 each, to cover shortage of funds embezzled by H. H. Carter, a money-order clerk, while on duty in the Charleston post office, occurring on March 26, 1927.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10957) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that said act shall include W. H. Stillwell, of Savannah, Ga., the contractor for the United States post-office building erected at Burlington, N. C., and, as to said W. H. Stillwell, contractor, claims for reimbursement as provided by said act of August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920, may be filed within three months after the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAVID J. WILLIAMS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6780) for the relief of David J. Williams.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, here is another case where an employee was short in his account.

Mr. SCHAFER. No. This is a robbery case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a case of burglary by bandits.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute bill S. 463, which is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 463 be substituted for the House bill, which is identical with the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of David J. Williams, of Tacoma, Wash., formerly collector of internal revenue for the district of Washington, in the sum of $22,160.78, due the United States on account of loss of public funds stolen from the internal revenue office at Seattle, Wash., March 16, 1920.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANK HANLEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 802) for the relief of Frank Hanley.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if my understanding is correct, when this man went to join his ship he found the ship had sailed?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes. That is the case.

Mr. SCHAFER. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers or sailors, Frank Hanley shall be held to have been honorably discharged from the naval service as a landsman on board the U. S. S. Yantic on November 20, 1865: Provided, That no back pay, compensation, or other benefit shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES R. SIES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4012) for the relief of Charles R. Sies.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask my colleague from California how he overcomes the objections raised by the Navy Department, first:

It will be noted that Chief Pay Clerk Sies is not eligible for consideration under the terms of the above-quoted provision of law for the reason that he was retired prior to December 31, 1921.

And, secondly, that other bills of a like nature have been unfavorably reported by the department.

Mr. EVANS of California. He comes within the period of some few days in the change of the law. He is the only officer who was retired while serving under a temporary appointment and not retired under that rank. He was serving under a temporary appointment as lieutenant in the Navy, and while thus serving he was permanently and totally disabled. He is paralyzed from his waist down and incurred that disability in line of service. He is the only officer who was not retired under the act which is quoted in the report, as follows:

Any officer of the regular Navy who has been retired since December 31, 1921, by reason of physical disability which originated in the line of duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and March 3, 1921, inclusive, while holding higher temporary rank, shall be advanced on the retired list to, or shall be placed on the retired list in, such higher grade or rank.

He was retired on December 5 while this was made effective as of December 31. He is the only officer who has not the rank which he held at the time he was retired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It makes a difference of $390 a year?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes. This man is totally paralyzed from his waist down.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Instead of providing that the bill shall take effect on March 4, 1925, why not provide that it shall take effect immediately after the passage of the act?

Mr. EVANS of California. Because he is really entitled to it, and this $390 a year means a great deal to this man.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was he incapacitated in line of duty?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes. He is paralyzed, and is as dead as a stick from his waist down.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Navy generally fails to favorably report on bills such as this as a matter of policy, and that the Naval Affairs Committee considered this bill on its merits?

Mr. EVANS of California. There was not a bill before our committee, when I have been present, that has had the unanimous support that this bill had when it came up. An officer from the Navy Department came before the committee and recommended its passage.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long was this man in the service?

Mr. EVANS of California. I believe for several years. He is now 48 years of age.

Mr. SCHAFER. He was in the service during the war?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes. He was in the service for a great many years.

Mr. HALE. The Navy Department has not made an unfavorable recommendation as to this bill. They simply do not take a position on it one way or the other. The reason why they did that, as appears in the hearings, is because the Budget reported that it would be in conflict with the President's financial program.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, $390 a year might unbalance our Government.

Mr. HALE. So far as the Navy Department is concerned, it is in favor of this bill, as I think the record of the hearings will show.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How much is this officer drawing in retired pay now?

Mr. EVANS of California. His rank is now chief pay clerk and this will advance him to the rank of lieutenant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, although this bill apparently is in conflict with the President's financial program, according to the Director of the Budget, I will rely on the recommendation of the Naval Affairs Committee, because their report shows that this is a very meritorious measure, and I certainly will not object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Chief Pay Clerk Charles R. Sies, United States Navy, retired, shall be advanced on the retired list to passed assistant paymaster with the rank and retired pay and allowances of a lieutenant on the retired list of the Navy. Such rank shall take effect on March 4, 1925, and such pay and allowances shall be paid from and after such date.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FREDERICK O. GOLDSMITH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4440) for the relief of Frederick O. Goldsmith.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $1,150.95 to Lieut. Frederick O. Goldsmith, of Belmont, Mass., on account of expenses incurred by him for civilian medical treatment while sick with typhoid fever in 1923, at which time he was attached to the U. S. S. Ramapo.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEORGE R. ARMSTRONG

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4664) for the relief of Capt. George R. Armstrong, United States Army, retired.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE] is not here at this time, and in view of some matters contained in the memorandum I have attached to this bill, I would ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice. Is the gentleman from Kentucky in charge of the bill?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I made the report on the bill.

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to ask a question about the bill. I do not intend to object to it. I notice the memorandum I have shows that the War Department states that in view of the fact the aggregate amount of this gentleman's active duty as a retired officer was only 8 years 2 months and 22 days, it appears there is no authority of law for his promotion to a grade above captain.

A similar bill was reported in the Sixty-ninth Congress, and the War Department then stated it was consistently opposed to special legislation of the type carried in the bill, and recommended that it should not be enacted into law. I would simply like to know what the gentleman has to say in reply to that, because I have had but little time to give the matter consideration.

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is the general policy of the War Department. It is a fact, however, that there are precedents for such legislation in past Congresses. There was one such bill passed in 1924. In this case this man has been on the roll of the Army for 30 years. He has had active service of 19 years 8 months and 25 days, including service in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the World War. At the time of the passage of the act of June 10, 1922, he lacked one year and one month of having enough service to entitle him in due course of promotion to the promotion sought in this bill. However, since that time he has been called back into active service, and has now had a total of 10 years 3 months and 26 days of active service since his retirement in 1907, that being approximately one year longer service than would have been required in due course of promotion to entitle him to this relief. His retirement was following an operation performed as a result of injuy sustained by him in line of duty at the time of the San Francisco earthquake.

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman feels the equities of the matter are such as to entitle him——

Mr. CHAPMAN (continuing). At that time he led a detachment that saved the United States mint with more than $200,000,000 in money and bullion.

Mr. HOOPER. In view of the explanation made by the gentleman from Kentucky, I will not object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What was the highest rank he ever held in active service?

Mr. CHAPMAN. He was retired as a captain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What rank did he hold?

Mr. CHAPMAN. I think he was a first lieutenant at that time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What precedent is there to jump him now to lieutenant colonel?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He was a captain.

Mr. CHAPMAN. He was retired as a captain.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And now you are going to retire him with the rank of lieutenant colonel?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes; because in regular course of promotion he would have been entitled to that grade.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be authorized to appoint George R. Armstrong, captain, United States Army, retired, a lieutenant colonel on the retired list of the United States Army, effective from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment, on page 1, line 6, strike out the word "passage" and insert in lieu thereof the word "approval," so that it will read "effective from the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. CHAPMAN. That is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "passage" and insert in lieu thereof the word "approval."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. MOORE L. HENRY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7976) for the relief of Mrs. Moore L. Henry.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Moore L. Henry, of New York City, the sum of $958.98. Such sum represents the pecuniary loss sustained by the late Moore L. Henry, husband of the said Mrs. Moore L. Henry and formerly proprietor of a restaurant at Indianhead, Md., on account of the failure of the disbursing office of the naval proving ground at Indianhead, Md., to collect from certain employees of the Government the cost of meal tickets issued by the said Moore L. Henry to such employees in accordance with an arrangement with the naval authorities at such naval proving ground.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JACOB E. DE GARMO

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9148) for the relief of Ensign Jacob E. De Garmo, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Ensign Jacob E. De Garmo, United States Navy, a lieutenant, junior grade, on the retired list of the Navy: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall entitle Ensign Jacob E. De Garmo to any back pay or allowance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THOMAS A. HEARD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5931) for the relief of Thomas A. Heard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WARREN. I will.

Mr. MANLOVE. I have known this man for 20 years. The evidence before the committee showed that the only infractions were that he went down town at night a couple of times with the boys and got back too late to report for duty. In one case he was fined $4, and in the other case $1.50. He never was in the guardhouse, and never was reported for fatigue duty. There are affidavits from the lieutenants and many other officers who were in charge of him tending to show that he was a man of great honor and that he always responded to duty, and instead of having been discharged without honor his reputation was that of a man of such high standing as to entitle him to an honorable discharge.

Mr. WARREN. This is the case of a soldier discharged without honor after having served six months in the Army.

Mr. MANLOVE. He served nine months.

Mr. WARREN. The statement of the War Department says that he was given a discharge without honor, and stated that his record showed two convictions by summary court-martial; that his character was bad enough to make him very undesirable as a soldier; that there was no prospect of being able to get any satisfactory service out of him; that he not only exercised a demoralizing influence upon the other men but was a constant source of trouble, and that his discharge would greatly improve the moral tone of the company and would be a relief both to the officers and to the enlisted men. For that reason I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. MANLOVE. Has the gentleman read the further affidavits in support of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I have read some of them. I ask that the bill go over without objection from me.

Mr. MANLOVE. I am sorry the gentleman feels that way, for it is a meritorious case. If the gentleman will let it go over for a few minutes and let my distinguished colleague read the testimony in behalf of the man I shall be obliged. I agree that the report from the War Department does not present an especially meritorious case, but the erroneous action of the War Department is exactly what we are attempting to correct here to-day. After the gentleman from North Carolina has carefully read the very conclusive testimony of the men who served with Thomas A. Heard, and he is not then convinced that this man should be vindicated in the eyes of the world, I shall not insist further at this time. However, my colleague will find that Thomas A. Heard was a soldier who never shirked a duty; who was often singled out for service by reason of the fact that he was looked upon as especially honest and dependable. It is clearly shown by the evidence presented that the soldier was afflicted with a sickness which was sometimes mistaken for intoxication. Remember this man was a volunteer in time of war; a man of honor and valor. When my friend has fully read and digested the evidence as set forth in the report of the committee, he will, I am sure, withdraw any objections he has been disposed to make by reason of having read the report of the War Department.

Mr. WARREN. Let it go over for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over temporarily.

EDWARD DELANEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10352) to correct the military record of Edward Delaney.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that bill go over.

KIRBY HOON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11508) for the relief of Kirby Hoon.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over.

OLIVER C. MACEY AND MARGUARITE MACEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2481) for the relief of Oliver C. Macey and Marguarite Macey.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, what is the determination of the committee as to the amount that shall be allowed as compensation in such cases? I had the impression that it would be $5,000, but I see in this case that it is $3,000. Is that the policy of the committee?

Mr. GAMBRILL. I was disappointed by the action of the Committee on Claims in reporting the bill out in the amount of $3,000. This was a young child 11 years of age that was killed. The mother, who was driving the automobile, suffered severe and painful injuries. Their expenses alone were $750. There was a complete destruction of the automobile, valued at $400. If we allocate the mother $600 for her pain and suffering, $750 for expenses, and $400 for the loss of the automobile, then the mother and father will only receive $1,200 as compensation for the death of the little child. It is my purpose when the bill is read for amendment to offer an amendment increasing the amount to $6,250.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to consideration of the bill under such circumstances. The Claims Committee, of which I am a member, has carefully considered this bill. The claim for the loss of the automobile is exorbitant.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The policy stated by the gentleman from Michigan, as I understood it, was that in cases where death occurred the committee allowed $5,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, that is entirely wrong. Heretofore, in the case of the death of a breadwinner, a man who has left dependents, or a man in the prime of life, the committee has suggested $5,000; but when a man reaches the age of, say, 70 years, or in the case of a youth or a child, the committee has as fair a scale of rates as they can possibly get under the advice of the compensation board. In this case this claim has evidently been very much padded. They wanted us to pay for a tombstone; they wanted us to pay for a lot in the cemetery; they wanted us to pay for flowers at the funeral; and we cut the proposition down to an equitable, a just, and a fair basis.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then the award is for the compensation of the death of a child, which is fixed at $3,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill calls for $3,000 in settlement in full.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman is mistaken when he says that the bill was padded. The bill as it came to the committee had actual expenses amounting to about $880. There was included in that, as I recall, about $150 or $200 for a cemetery lot, but there were expenses of the doctors of $175, and of the undertaker amounting to $200, and other expenses, which ran it up to the legitimate sum of $750. The mother at the same time was painfully and seriously injured. Nothing has been allowed for her pain and suffering. There was the death of the daughter. There was the destruction of the automobile, and I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] that I think he is entirely unfair when he says that the automobile was not worth $400. As a matter of fact, it was a Chevrolet car, which had been in use but a short time, and the fair value of it was $400. I hope the gentleman will not object to the consideration of the bill, but will let it come up for consideration.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to it unless the gentleman agrees to accept the report of the Committee on Claims. That is the policy that we have established. Unless the gentleman wants to accept our report we will have to protect ourselves and object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GAMBRILL. May I make this statement? A bill for $6,250 has passed the Senate for the relief of Marguarite Macey and Oliver C. Macey, the parents of this child. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] will not place me in the very embarrassing position of having to acquiesce in his demands, because it is quite an embarrassing position, when the Senate has already passed a bill for the full amount of $6,250.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, year after year and session after session, has tried to relieve his colleagues of that situation; and up to the present time he has not been able to get legislation which will relieve them of a situation of this character. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL] is in no different position than hundreds of our colleagues have been in the past, where the Senate has passed a bill on courtesy without investigating the facts, and unfortunately some gentleman in the House has had to hold the bag.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Committee on Claims which considered this bill. In view of the fact that we are considering the Private Calendar on a day which is usually not devoted to the consideration of that calendar, when many Members of the House are away, and some of them would not be here on a roll call, I do not want to let this bill come up for consideration if the gentleman is going to offer amendments. If the gentleman at some future time on a Friday, when we consider these Private Calendar bills, desires to consider the bill and offer amendments, I shall not object. I believe in the final analysis that the House should determine the matter, but not to-day when we are considering the Private Calendar, on a day not generally devoted to it.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman from Maryland will notice by going back over the records of previous Congresses that we have allowed compensation in cases of minor children at $1,500. It seems to me that the gentleman would better let his bill go through at $3,000, which is double the amount heretofore granted.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I shall not offer an amendment if the bill is considered at this time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in view of that statement, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Oliver C. Macey, of Anne Arundel County, Md., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the death of his infant daughter, Eleanor Macey, who was killed December 14, 1925, by reason of the negligence of the operator of a United States Navy commissary truck.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is also authorized and directed to pay to Marguarite Macey, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,250, in full compensation for personal injuries, medical and funeral expenses, and loss of automobile, which resulted by reason of the negligence of the operator of a United States Navy commissary truck.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $3,000, to Oliver C. Macey and Marguerite Macey, of Anne Arundel County, Md., on account of the death of their infant daughter, Eleanor Macey, who was killed December 14, 1925, by reason of the negligence of the operator of the United States Navy commissary truck, and for injuries sustained in said accident by Marguerite Macey."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition on the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this case shows the necessity of a law to provide means for claims of this character to be properly adjudicated. It is simply impossible for this House to pass upon the merits of a claim of this kind, as is disclosed by the facts in this bill. There is the matter of the value of the loss of services and the matter of the actual loss sustained by reason of the negligence of an agent of the Government. All these factors enter into the claim, and the Committee on Claims, with its hundreds and hundreds of bills before it, is at a very great disadvantage, considering all of the other legislative duties that the members of that committee must fulfill.

Now, we passed a bill here. No action has been taken at the other end of the Capitol. If we adopt the principle laid down in the Underhill bill, which passed the House some time ago, then we will have established machinery whereby citizens who sustain loss by reason of acts of agents of the Government can present their claims in a proper way. I fear even then that we will have to go through a period of conflict of attitude in these cases between the various departments; but even that we can reconcile by acts of Congress later on. As it is now, it is exceedingly difficult for anyone working on this Private Calendar to know just what to do in cases of this kind. It is extremely difficult. We can not do other than accept the report of the Committee on Claims as to the facts. As to questions of policy or the law involved, I think every Member has the right to assert himself, but not as to the facts. I am entirely in sympathy with what the gentleman from Maryland says, but we have no means of reviewing the facts under the present policy. I hope we can get some action during this session of Congress that will relieve us of the necessity of going into details and ascertaining the facts. It should be put under a proper tribunal, so that citizens may get redress for losses incurred by reason of the action of agents of the Government.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent to strike out all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill and substitute the House committee amendment. The Senate bill is No. 1648.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Oliver C. Macey, of Anne Arundel County, Md., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for the death of his infant daughter, Eleanor Macey, who was killed December 14, 1925, by reason of the negligence of the operator of a United States Navy commissary truck.

Macey and Marguerite Macey, of Anne Arundel County, Md., on account of the death of their infant daughter, Eleanor Macey, who was killed December 14, 1925, by reason of the negligence of the operator of the United States Navy commissary truck, and for injuries sustained in said accident by Marguerite Macey."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar bill passed by the Senate be considered in lieu of the House bill and that the House bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill 2008. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Paymaster General of the Navy is authorized and directed to pay, out of funds appropriated for the pay of the Navy, to the parents of Wyman Henry Beckstead, late radio man, second class, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by said Wyman Henry Beckstead at the time of his death: Provided, That said parents establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that they were actually dependent upon the said Wyman Henry Beckstead at the time of his death.

Gingras was receiving at the date of his death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MARY M. TILGHMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 47) for the relief of Mary M. Tilghman, former widow of Sergt. Frederick Coleman, deceased, United States Marine Corps.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why is this in the form of a joint resolution instead of in the form of a bill?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know of any special reason except to explain in the preamble the reasons for the enactment of the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, that will be stricken out?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So much for the procedure. Now, as to the merits. The Secretary says:

Since this proposed legislation would make an exception in the case of a particular individual while many others under the same circumstances would derive no benefit therefrom, and since the enactment of this proposed law would furnish an undesirable precedent, the Navy Department recommends against the enactment of House Joint Resolution 47.

Can the gentleman tell us how many similar cases there are?

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL], a member of the Naval Committee, can give the gentleman the information.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I did not understand the question asked by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was pointing out to the gentleman from Idaho the suggestion made by the Acting Secretary of the Navy that this would be a dangerous precedent because there are so many other similar cases which would not derive any benefit by the enactment of this particular resolution.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I will say that the Committee on Naval Affairs came to the conclusion that there would be no case similar to this in the enlisted force of the United States. This man enlisted in 1870; he had six distinct enlistments and died in the service of the Marine Corps in 1900, after 30 years of service. There was a hiatus of one month and three weeks between the fourth and fifth enlistments, and the only purpose of this bill is to provide for a continuity of the service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the Secretary was simply assuming that there are many other cases?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Precisely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I assume the committee did look into that?

Mr. GAMBRILL. It did.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it would not establish a precedent because there could not be another case that would have all of the facts so similar as to be entitled to recognition under this precedent?

Mr. GAMBRILL. That is a correct statement of the committee's attitude.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it is not correct to say that there is any favoritism shown in this case?

Mr. GAMBRILL. That is true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution, omitting the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the service rendered by Sergt. Frederick Coleman, deceased, United States Marine Corps, from September 5, 1870, to the date of his death, April 29, 1900, shall be considered under the law providing for longevity pay as continuous service in the United States Marine Corps, and that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construe the records of the said Sergt. Frederick Coleman in the United States Marine Corps as conforming with this authorization, to the end that Mary M. Tilghman, former widow of the said Frederick Coleman, deceased, shall be entitled to receive the pay, benefits, and emoluments conferred by law or regulations for continuous service in the United States Marine Corps of her late husband.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

REREFERENCE OF BILLS

Mr. ZIHLMAN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request for a change of reference of two bills. It will take but a moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will propound his request.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 13116 and H. R. 9762, which have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the nature of the bills?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. H. R. 13116 provides for an additional justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and H. R. 9762 relates to commitments to St. Elizabeths Hospital.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, I could not hear the statement of the gentleman. What is there in these bills?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. One bill provides for an additional judge for the District of Columbia and the other relates to commitments to St. Elizabeths.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. From such examination of the bills as the Chair has been able to make, it is clear that both of these bills are erroneously referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and should have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will take them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, they will be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection.

FRANK TOPPING AND OTHERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 19) for the relief of Frank Topping and others.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know anything about the merits of this bill, but it does seem to me that there should be an amendment providing that the amounts authorized shall constitute full settlement of said claims against the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves something that is entirely new, and in view of contemplated legislation, I suggest we go rather slow on this matter and let the bill go over. This establishes, I fear, the liability of the Government for losses sustained through defective construction of dams.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. I want to call attention to this paragraph in the report accompanying the bill:

> Under date of April 26, 1926, Mr. Topping, who appears to be acting as spokesman for the other claimants, wrote me—that is, the Secretary of the Interior—that they had decided to withdraw their claims for damages alleged to have been sustained during the high water in 1920, there being no proof that any damages suffered during that year was caused by the Haskell floodgates being open.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is legislation providing payment for alleged flood damages; and I would expect that we would have gentlemen in here from Vermont and from California and from other States.

Mr. GREEN. From Florida?

Mr. HUDSON. Florida has floods? I never saw any water down there to amount to much except in the ocean. It seems to me this is a very dangerous piece of legislation.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the claims for damages for 1920 have been withdrawn because it is probable that even if the floodgates, which were open, had been shut, the damage would have been the same; but in the case of the other two years the Haskell Institute and its superintendent were notified to close the floodgates, but the floodgates were not closed and they damaged these nine farmers. In view of the fact that these Kansas farmers are not going to get any other relief this year, I want them to have the benefit of this legislation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me say to the gentleman that our objection at this time is not to the merits of the gentleman's bill and is not to the individuals mentioned in the bill, but please do not precipitate this matter so that we establish a policy on the very eve that we are about to adopt a bill appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars and when we are going into the wholesale flood-relief business. Let this go over. Let us look into it calmly and study it more carefully.

Mr. GUYER. I want to call attention to the fact that this is not a matter of flood relief, but is a matter of negligence on the part of agents of the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me say to the gentleman from Kansas that the bill should so state.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill may go over for to-day without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ICHABOD J. WOODARD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3224) for the relief of Ichabod J. Woodard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did this man render any active service?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Yes; three and a half years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no objection on my part.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Ichabod J. Woodard, who was a member of Company K, Second Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "organization," insert the words "October 1, 1862."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HENRY MANSKE, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8484) for the relief of Henry Manske, jr.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how was this good sailor injured? Was it at a 5 o'clock tea—it was not in line of duty.

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; it was in line of duty. I will state to the gentleman that this sailor enlisted on November 5, 1912, and was discharged on October 29, 1913. At the time of his enlistment he was examined by competent medical officers of the Navy and they found no disability. After rendering nine months' service as a shipwright a hernia was found, and he was hospitalized and discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability, with a notation made by the board of medical survey that the disability existed prior to enlistment. This board's allegation that the hernia existed prior to enlistment is only the opinion of the doctors nine months after the date this man enlisted. If Manske had a hernia prior to enlistment, it would have been detected upon medical examination at the time of enlistment, and it would have certainly manifested itself before nine months had passed, in view of his laborious work as shipwright, coaling, and the like.

Mr. GREEN. Reserving the right to object, I want to state to the gentleman that I have a similar case, and I believe the bill ought to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, directed to indicate on the medical records of the Navy Department of Henry Manske, jr., late of the United States Navy, that the left inguinal hernia which resulted in his discharge was incurred in line of duty instead of not incurred in line of duty as is now noted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FRANCIS L. SEXTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3893) for the relief of Francis L. Sexton.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Francis L. Sexton, late of Company F, Fourth Regiment Volunteer Infantry, Troop M, Seventh Regiment Volunteer Cavalry, and Company C, Third Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of Company C, Third Regiment United States Infantry: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The following committee amendments were read:

Line 5, strike out the word "Regiment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "United States."

Line 6, strike out the word "Volunteer"; also strike out the word "Regiment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "United States."

Line 7, strike out the word "Volunteer."

Line 11, after the word "Infantry," add a comma and insert the words "July 27, 1902."

Line 11, after the word "no," strike out the word "pay" and insert in lieu thereof the words "bounty, back pay."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARIE ROSE JEAN BAPTISTE, MARIUS FRANCOIS, AND REGINA LEXIMA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12189) for the relief of Marie Rose Jean Baptiste, Marius Francois, and Regina Lexima, all natives of Haiti.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another bill that is the result of keeping law and order in southern republics. Why is the payment of $10,070 to be made to the Republic of Haiti?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, that amount should be $1,070. That is a mistake in the committee amendment, and it is my purpose to offer an amendment to correct that. Fifty dollars of that goes to Marius Francois and $20 to Regina Lexima. I have prepared an amendment, as I say, to correct the figures.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But this money will be paid to the Government of the Republic of Haiti?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For the purpose of paying these citizens of the Republic?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How many were killed?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. One of them was killed and the other wounded by a drunken marine, who is now serving 10 years in prison.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And perhaps if we had not sent the marines down there, we would not have had to pass any such bill as this. The gentleman says that $10,070 is an error?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Yes. It is also my purpose to offer an amendment to insert the word "thereof" after the figures "$50" and after the figures "$20," so that it will be clear that the payments of the $50 and $20 are to come out of the $1,070.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment to insert, after "the Republic of Haiti," the words "for the purpose herein provided"?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. That is satisfactory.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other words, we want to make sure that a proper voucher is obtained by the Government and submitted to us that this money was turned over.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000 to pay Marie Rose Jean Baptiste, the mother of Andre Nelson; the sum of $50 to pay Marius Francois; and the sum of $20 to pay Regina Lexima; the above sums to be in full compensation for the killing of Andre Nelson and wounding of Marius Francois and Regina Lexima by shooting by an enlisted man of the United States Marine Corps on July 19, 1927, at Port au Prince, Republic of Haiti.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "of," strike out "$1,000 to pay Marie Rose Jean Baptiste, the mother of Andre Nelson; the sum of $50 to pay Marius Francois; and the sum of $20 to pay Regina Lexima" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$10,070 to pay the Republic of Haiti as an act of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor; the sum of $1,000 thereof to pay Marie Rose Jean Baptiste, the mother of Andre Nelson; the sum of $50 to pay Marius Francois; and the sum of $20 to pay Regina Lexima."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORTON D. HULL: Amend the committee amendment by striking out the figures "$10,070" and substituting therefor the figures "$1,070"; also by inserting the word "thereof" after the figures "$50," and also by inserting the word "thereof" after the figures "$20."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA to the committee amendment: Page 1, line 7, after the word "pay," insert the words "for the purposes herein provided."

LIEUT. HENRY C. WEBER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2442) for the relief of Lieut. Henry C. Weber, Medical Corps, United States Navy.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know why this particular officer is singled out for special consideration.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will inform the gentleman that this is a Senate bill, identical with H. R. 16197 which I introduced on January 11, 1927, Sixty-ninth Congress, and H. R. 3676, which I introduced on December 5, 1927, at this session. It is not singling out and giving to this officer any special consideration. Lieutenant Weber took the examination for appointment as assistant surgeon in the United States Navy on October 30, 1918. The Surgeon General of the Navy informed him on January 2, 1919, that he had passed this examination, and on March 1, 1919, his appointment was confirmed by the United States Senate. However, on March 1, 1919, he was 24 days over the age limit of 32 years, and his commission was withheld. Later the age limit was raised to 42 years and Lieutenant Weber was placed on the rolls and is now serving with the Asiatic fleet.

The long delay between the taking of the examination and the confirmation by the Senate was due to the fact that the President of the United States was then in Europe and the list of successful candidates prepared by the Navy Department could not be transmitted to the Senate until his return.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to place Lieut. Henry C. Weber, Medical Corps, United States Navy, in the position on the list of lieutenant commanders in the Medical Corps of the United States Navy which he would have held had he been commissioned in the said Medical Corps of the United States Navy as of December 10, 1918: Provided, That the said Lieutenant Weber, Medical Corps, shall first establish, in accordance with existing provisions of law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional qualifications to perform the duties of a lieutenant commander in the Medical Corps of the United States Navy: Provided further, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is simply a question of the value of this building that was destroyed by fire. The fact that there was a fire is very clear. Can the gentleman furnish any additional information?

Mr. LETTS. I will say to the gentleman from New York that only $400 of this sum is for the building. It was a frame building. There is a large list of airplane fires. The gentleman will understand. He knows all that, and their value.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

Th SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to F. C. Wallace, of Bettendorf, Iowa, the sum of $2,910.87. Such sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States on account of the loss by fire at Wallace Field, Bettendorf, Iowa, on December 27, 1924, of a frame building and personal property therein owned by the said F. C. Wallace, said loss being the direct result of aid gratuitously rendered by the said Wallace to a stranded Air Service officer, who was then on an authorized flight, by placing the facilities of the air field owned by the said Wallace, which had been closed for the winter, at the disposal of said officer for the purpose of enabling him to return to his proper station.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $2,910.87 to F. Roy Knabenshue against the United States for the use or manufacture of an invention of A. Roy Knabenshue, covered by letters patent No. 858875, issued by the Patent Office of the United States under date of July 2, 1907.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it not a departure from established custom to permit a claim of this kind to be filed in the Court of Claims?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I think not; but the author of the bill, Mr. EVANS of California, will explain it to the gentleman.

Mr. EVANS of California. I think not, I will say to the gentleman from New York. This man, Mr. Knabenshue, had a patented tent. He consented for the War Department to use it on one occasion for the purpose of housing an airplane, but without his knowledge and without any disposition on the part of the War Department to do it, and without his consent, they went ahead, during the strenuous times of the war, and constructed various others. Some time after that was all over he learned of it and filed a claim against the War Department. Negotiations were entered into for the settlement of the claim, but no settlement was reached, and on the last page of the report the gentleman will find this from the War Department:

In view of all the circumstances, I am inclined to believe that Mr. Knabenshue is entitled to his day in court and therefore interpose no objection to the bill.

It is a very small thing.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The law is established that the United States Government has the right to use any patents in time of emergency.

Mr. EVANS of California. That question is not involved here. This is only a question of whether or not they did in certain cases use his patents which they themselves say they had no right to use. It is only a very small matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, they would have to pay a reasonable amount. If the War Department feels the facts must be settled——

Mr. HUDSON. Probably if it had not been for the stress of war at that time there would have been adequate contract entered into.

Mr. EVANS of California. I will say to the gentleman that at the time of the hearing before the committee a representative of the War Department recommended that the committee report this claim favorably and stated that Mr. Knabenshue was entitled to have his claim passed upon.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On that statement, it seems fair and I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claim and/or the district court of the United States, notwithstanding the lapse of time or the statute of limitations, to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment of the claim of A. Roy Knabenshue for the use and manufacture by or for the United States without license of the owner thereof or lawful right, and infringement thereof of patent described in or covered by Letters Patent No. 858875, issued by the Patent Office of the United States on the 2d day of July, 1907. From any decision in any suit prosecuted under the authority of this act an appeal may be taken by either party as is provided for by law in other cases.

WIDOW OF SURG. MERVIN W. GLOVER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12063) for the relief of the widow of Surg. Mervin W. Glover, United States Public Health Service, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] if this class of men in the service of the United States are taken care of by general legislation, just as Army officers are taken care of?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; but they ought to be. The officers of the Public Health Service are not taken care of under any of our various provisions for care of the employees or for members of our various branches of service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They ought to have equal treatment.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The procedure heretofore has been very indefinite. Some of them have received two years' salary and allowances, others have received one year's salary. In this instance we struck out "allowances," as the man was dead and could not use such allowances, and provided for one year's salary, which is the policy of our committee.

Mr. HUDSON. Is this equal to what the dependents of a commissioned officer of the Army would have received?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think it is about equal. In this case there is a year's salary, and in the case of the commissioned officer, I understand, under the law they get six months' salary and certain allowances.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have had to-day several bills providing six months' pay. We have had five or six bills on this calendar where we authorize the payment of six months' pay and allowances to the widow or dependents, but here we provide for one year's salary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; and you do not take care of this man all the time he is ill and confined to the house and hospital under the care of a surgeon. This man was ill for a long time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am simply pleading for uniformity of treatment in these cases.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We could not separate all these things and say that so much was for medical attention, so much for surgical attention, so much for hospitalization, but following our usual practice we lumped it all into one year's salary, which makes it about commensurate with what would have been received had he been provided for under the provisions of the retirement law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that, but we allow six months' pay to dependents of officers of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And in this instance you allow one year's salary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But in this allowance of one year we included all of these expenses.

Mr. HUDSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is the gentleman from Massachusetts and his committee who will have to grapple with this problem.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am sorry we have to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the widow of Mervin W. Glover, deceased, the sum of $6,496.67, being the amount of salary and allowances for one year.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$6,496.67" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,725"; and on page 1, line 7, strike out the words "and allowances."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARY CLERKIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 205) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the claim of Mary Clerkin.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mary Clerkin, of Newtownbutler, county of Fermanagh, Ireland, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $140 for the loss of certain laces which were destroyed in the fire in the appraiser's warehouse at New York City in May, 1909.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARTHA A. HAUCH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 1368, an act to extend the benefits of the employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Martha A. Hauch.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to bring to the attention of the House and ask for its indorsement the action of the Committee on Claims in reporting this case. The patient or claimant was a student nurse. She was learning her profession at the Walter Reed Hospital. She contracted tuberculosis. There is no provision of law whereby she can be taken care of, and the only thing was to kick her out into the streets and let society in general take care of her if it had the heart to do so. We provide in the bill that she shall receive something to live on while she is being taken care of in some hospital. She was not even allowed hospitalization. It is a case where we have established the policy of taking care of these nurses.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. I concur in what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said. I have in mind a nurse that lost her health during the Spanish War while nursing the sick American soldiers in a hospital at Jacksonville, Fla. Because she was not regularly in the service no recognition has been given her claim. Her health has been destroyed and she was without means.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We would have to take care of such cases as that later on. In this case there was no remedy whatever. I will say to the House that there are at least three other cases of the same character that I know of, and there may be others.

Mr. HUDSON. Would there not be some relief under the civil service?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; she was not a civil-service employee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am sure the House will sustain the committee in establishing this policy. Where a young man or woman in the Government service contracts tuberculosis or is otherwise incapacitated and is not covered by any existing law the committee ought to establish a generous policy.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not responsible for this, but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has handled the case, fully investigated the facts, and makes the report. It is largely through his effort that we have brought about a definite policy on the part of the committee which we desire to have indorsed by the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I congratulate both the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the committee amendment.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $2,000 to Martha A. Hauch, formerly a nurse in the service of the United States Army, who contracted tuberculosis while on duty at Walter Reed General Hospital from September 16, 1922, to August 22, 1924; and that said Martha A. Hauch shall be admitted to such Army hospital as may be directed by the Surgeon General of the United States Army for necessary care and treatment."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

R. BLUESTEIN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1428) for the relief of R. Bluestein.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a case where a bond was forfeited and paid. This was a criminal bond, was it not?

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long after the default in the appearance of the defendant was he apprehended and produced?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, we have had several of these cases, but, if I recollect correctly, it was some several weeks. The expense would have been considerably more, unless I confuse this case with another case, if the United States marshal had not been in Cleveland and brought this man back to Georgia. The committee took this question up with the Attorney General and the Department of Justice. We wanted to establish some definite policy and asked the Department of Justice to declare what they wanted in such cases. The department, in a letter to the chairman, states that they want the offender, they want the criminal, they do not want the sureties, and where a man has given a bond or has gone surety, and the defendant has not appeared, and the man goes out and apprehends the defendant through his own efforts and brings the man to justice, the department thinks the bondsman ought to be reimbursed the amount of the bond less the amount which it has cost the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the gentleman so far, but I am sure the department wants the defendant when they want him and not when the defendant deems it wise to appear.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Very true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Very often it happens that the defendant will not present himself for some time because he is waiting for witnesses to disappear or something of that kind.

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I add there that in all cases we have reported thus far the defendant has been convicted?

Mr. EDWARDS. I think that is the case here.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I say to the gentleman from New York that I am not in favor of granting this relief to a bonding company or one of these private bondsmen who is doing the bonding business as a living and collecting premiums.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think the committee is in accord with the gentleman from North Carolina. I am sure the chairman is. Where it is a commercial transaction we have no interest in it, but where it is a matter of accommodation or a matter of faith upon the part of the bondsmen, and his faith is misplaced, and he goes and gets his man, then we feel that he should be reimbursed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the committee should have it certified to by the Department of Justice that the defendant has been produced and that his nonappearance has in no way defeated the ends of justice.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the idea.

Mr. SCHAFER. These people are not professional bondsmen, are they?

Mr. EDWARDS. No; they are not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object upon the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] and the assurance given by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS], but I state that all of these bills returning forfeited bonds, or other bail bonds or surety bonds or fidelity bonds, are going to be very carefully scrutinized, and this is not a matter of criticism of the committee at all.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would not have introduced the bill if it had not been a clean transaction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $978.60 to Abe Tenenbaum, attorney for R. Bluestein, Savannah, Ga., which sum represents the loss sustained by the said R. Bluestein on the bail bond of Frank Holmes, who was afterwards captured and returned to the United States officers by the said R. Bluestein; record of said estreatment of bond is shown in report of clerk of the United States Court, L. M. Erwin, at Macon, Ga., January 20, 1925.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN STEAM TUG "W. S. HOLBROOK"

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2516) for the relief of the owners and/or receiver of the American steam tug W. S. Holbrook.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over for the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests that we are considering bills where only objections are in order, and that it does not change the condition of the program by objecting.

Mr. HUDSON. I object.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, this is simply another one of those bills which do not come within the provisions of the admiralty law. No exception should be made in this case when no exception has been made in other cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. I object.

COAST TRANSIT DIVISION BARGE "NO. 4"

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2586) for the relief of the owner of the Coast Transit Division barge No. 4.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ANITA W. DYER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10536) granting six months' pay to Anita W. Dyer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, here is a bill where for an ensign we allow six months' pay to the mother.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Under the law they are entitled to six months' gratuity pay. This is simply designating the beneficiary.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall finally object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit me one moment, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. HUDSON. I shall be glad to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I trust the gentleman from Michigan will not interpose an objection to this bill, for the simple reason that under the act which has been in existence for some time every enlisted man or officer of the Navy and Marine Corps is permitted to designate his beneficiary, and when they die their beneficiaries who are dependent upon them are given six months' pay. In this case this ensign died in line of duty. He failed to designate his beneficiary.

Mr. HUDSON. Here is a policy of one committee as to members of the Navy, and their private bills affecting the Navy are brought in here. Another committee, representing another branch of the military service, refuses to bring out bills of that kind. I decline to be a party to such a policy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The law is this:

Any officer, enlisted man, or nurse on the active list of the regular Navy or regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child, to any other dependent relative of such officer, enlisted man, or nurse previously designated by him or her, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer, enlisted man, or nurse at the date of his or her death.

That is the law. In this case the ensign had a perfect right to designate whom he cared to be his beneficiary, if they were dependent on him. But in this case he failed to designate his mother as his beneficiary and therefore we are simply seeking to comply with the general statute. She must prove that she was dependent.

Mr. HUDSON. The Navy Department is opposed to this.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes. The trouble is this man did not designate anybody. If his mother was dependent, she would under the law be entitled, provided she were designated. The only trouble in this case is that he did not designate his mother. We have passed many cases of this kind.

Mr. HUDSON. That does not meet the objection, because when we attempt to be complimentary to the Committee on Naval Affairs we are not doing justice.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We are following the law.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs has recognized the situation which exists, and only recently reported out favorably general legislation to take care of these cases, of which there are a great many, and to meet which we have passed half a dozen bills this afternoon. This legislation is not retroactive.

Mr. SPEAKS. This is not a question for the Secretary of the Navy to decide. It is the duty of Congress to determine what shall be done. That is why this bill in on the calendar.

Mr. COLLIER. That is the reason why the Navy Department objected to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1928," to Anita W. Dyer, dependent mother of the late Ensign William Lansdale Dyer, United States Navy, who died on board the U. S. S. Relief February 20, 1927, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Ensign William Lansdale Dyer was entitled to receive at the date of his death.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "death," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the said Anita W. Dyer establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy the fact that she was dependent upon her son, the late William Lansdale Dyer, at the time of his death."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RADIO DEVELOPMENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short address I delivered over the radio last night upon radio development.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to do so, I extend my remarks by inserting herewith an address delivered by me over radio station WTFF, Washington, D. C., on the evening of April 20, 1928, as follows:

There is no art or industry in which there has been such a rapid and startling development as in radio, and yet we are now only on the threshold of radio discovery and use. We can but contemplate its future potentialities. Radio may be said to have had its beginning 25 or 30 years ago. Even then anyone prophesying the present development of the art would have been deemed to be a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. However, in the light of the varied and marvelous radio development, people have practically ceased to question any possibility. An interesting fact is that amateurs have played a large part in this development.

BROADCASTING

While broadcasting is now regarded as a relatively unimportant feature of radio science and industry, yet it is the feature with which the public generally come in most direct contact and in which they therefore take the most interest.

The first broadcasting station was established in 1921. On January 1, 1922, there were only seven broadcasting stations. However, the number of stations thereafter grew rapidly until now there are approximately 700 radiobroadcasting stations in the United States. Since that time the American people have expended nearly $2,000,000,000 for radio receiving sets and parts. For the past three years the American people have been purchasing receiving sets and parts to the extent of nearly $500,000,000 per annum. Of course, many of the older sets have become obsolete and been discarded; but it is estimated that there are now in American homes about 7,500,000 radio receiving sets representing a cost of more than a billion dollars, and that the radio audience—that is, the number of people listening to sets now in use—number about 35,000,000.

The National Association of Broadcasters places the value of the existing broadcasting stations at approximately $19,500,000. This valuation includes transmitting apparatus, radio towers, studios, radio furnishings, and all the equipment which goes with transmitting stations. The value of the transmitting apparatus alone is probably near $7,000,000. It will be noted that the investment in receiving sets is more than a hundred times as much as the investment in broadcasting stations.

While it is considered that some form of radio transmission may be employed on a range from 1 meter to 15,000 meters, yet the range assigned for broadcasting is 200 to 550 meters. The range of 150 to 200 meters is reserved for the amateurs. The other channels are assigned to the Government service, ship and ship to shore service, national and international commercial service, and experimental work.

Within the range assigned for broadcasting there are 95 available wave lengths or channels. By agreement between the United States and Canada 6 of these wave lengths have been exclusively assigned to Canada, 9 wave lengths are shared between the United States and Canada, and 80 exclusive wave lengths are assigned for use in the United States. The broadcasting assignment is differently described by a range of from 550 to 1,500 kilocycles. There is a 10-kilocycle separation between each two adjoining wave lengths, any closer separation being impracticable under the present state of the art. Channels are being described more and more in terms of kilocycles rather than meters, and it is likely that in such description the term kilocycle will in time wholly supersede that of meters. Scientific definitions of wave lengths, kilocycles, and meters are but little more intelligible to the layman than the terms themselves.

Radiobroadcasting has been in a very unsatisfactory condition, particularly during the past two or three years. This has largely been due to the unscientific broadcast structure. This situation was largely due to the fact that it had just grown up with the result that many channels were overcrowded, high-powered stations frequently being placed on the same wave length with low-powered stations, stations in close proximity to each other being placed on the same channel, far too many stations being congregated in certain areas, and other unfavorable situations existing. However, this confused and unsatisfactory condition was undoubtedly produced in large measure by discrimination against many stations and sections and in favor of other stations and sections. Monopoly stations have been favored beyond measure. The high power which some of them have been granted has largely contributed to the blanketing and heterodyning which has played such havoc with radiobroadcasting and reception. One of the radio commissioners stated at the recent hearings that 90 per cent of the stations in this country were heterodyned. Heterodyning may be described as the interference created by the ether waves set in motion by broadcasting apparatus, resulting in howls, whistles, screeches, and other outlandish noises in a receiving set. In this connection it should be borne in mind that such ether waves extend ten times as far as the audible program broadcast by the station in question.

RADIO LEGISLATION

The first measure dealing with the subject of radio was enacted by the Congress in 1912. Radio was then in its infancy and naturally the lawmakers did not contemplate the present-day problems. The need of new legislation on the subject was apparent, and various efforts to enact such legislation were made; but such attempts were thwarted by the opposition and activities of the Radio Trust. During the last Congress the House and the Senate passed different radio bills.

The radio monopoly was very much opposed to the Senate bill and opposed to features of the House bill. Both bills were sent to conference. There finally emerged from conference a bill different in many important respects from both the House and Senate bills, and the conference report bill after much opposition was finally adopted and approved. It was the only radio bill of a general nature which had had the approval of the radio monopoly. Subsequent events have vindicated my criticism of features of that bill and my predictions as to what would result.

The Radio Commission created by said act, instead of improving the unsatisfactory situation, made it worse. Their favoritism to the Radio Trust and their unfair discrimination against whole sections of the country were such that there arose a demand for fair play. This resulted in the recent enactment of amendments to the radio law, including the "equalization amendment" directing the commission to make an equal allocation of broadcasting stations, wave lengths, periods of time for operation, and station power among the different radio zones, and directing a fair and equitable distribution among the different States within each zone. It is to be hoped that the Federal Radio Commission will carry out this plain legislative mandate, the spirit and purpose of which were clearly and forcibly expressed by the Representatives of the people in the Halls of Congress.

The purpose of this equalization amendment is constructive. It is devoutly hoped that the Radio Commission, under the authority and direction thus given them, will make such a fair and scientific reallocation of broadcasting facilities that the citizens throughout this country can satisfactorily hear the programs which they desire to hear and tune out those which they do not desire to hear. No broadcasting station should be aided by the Government in projecting its program into a home where it is not wanted; on the other hand the desired radio guest should be permitted to enter.

OTHER BRANCHES OF RADIO INDUSTRY

I have chiefly discussed radiobroadcasting. However, there are other very important developments and uses of radio.

It embraces one of the most useful and one of the most rapidly developing means of international communication service. Long-distance radiotelephony is an important development. Citizens in this country are now successfully carrying on conversations by radio with citizens on the other side of the Atlantic.

Through radio Arctic explorers keep in daily communication with this country.

Photos of men and events are being daily transmitted by radio across the continent and across the seas. Commercial pictoradiogram services are firmly established. Facsimiles of written documents are thus being transmitted. A citizen of the United States temporarily in Paris recently transmitted by radio to the proper officials of a State in this country his petition and signature for qualification as a candidate.

Television is already with us. Perhaps the time is not far distant when we can sit in our homes and see and hear a play transmitted by radio.

It has been fully demonstrated that ships, airplanes, and other mobile carriers may be successfully directed by radio.

The radio compass is being successfully and usefully employed on ships.

Successful experiments have been made with beam or directional radio transmission. Secret messages by radio are possible.

Another feature of radio which is even now important but destined to become very much more important and valuable is wired radio. This is not only being widely used in commercial communication transmission but also in connection with broadcasting. Chain programs are now transmitted to the various broadcasting stations over telephone wires, and in turn broadcast by the respective broadcasting stations.

Some enterprising hotels have receiving sets in every room.

Broadcast programs can be transmitted direct from the station into the homes over telephone or electric-light wires. In at least two cities such service over the electric-light wires is now in successful operation. A simple receiving apparatus is screwed into the electric-light socket. It is said that under such a system there is an entire absence of static, interference, fading, day and night effects, and seasonal changes. In my opinion such system is destined to come into general use, particularly in cities.

RADIO IN WAR

Radio is important, and will soon be regarded as essential in times of peace, but in future it will be imperative in times of war.

Radio played a considerable part in the last war, but it will play an infinitely greater part in any future wars.

The Navy Department says that the effective direction of the United States fleets is dependent upon radio communication. The War Department states that "radio communication is the very lifeblood of aviation."

A WARNING

I have undertaken to give some indication of the vast possibilities for good in radio. Its potentialities for evil are quite as great.

There must be careful governmental control and supervision over an instrumentality of such vast and varied possibilities for good or evil. The responsibility rests upon the Government to see that the interests of all the people are protected.

Monopoly constitutes the greatest menace to freedom of the air and a fair and proper use of the radio art. There already exists a powerful Radio Trust, with billions of dollars in assets, which is practically dominating every branch of the radio industry. It is imperative that effective steps be taken to break up this monopoly. All the people are entitled to the use of the air, and they should see to it that their rights therein are fully preserved and protected, and that individual citizens or corporations shall be permitted to use the air only in the interest of the people and not against their best interests. Full freedom of the air and the use thereof in the public interest can only be maintained by eternal vigilance on the part of the people and patriotic service by their Representatives in Congress, and by a fearless administration and enforcement of the laws enacted for the public protection.

J. A. PERRY

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 4489, No. 482 on the Private Calendar, be returned to the Committee on Claims, it having inadverently been placed on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to rerefer H. R. 4489 to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ROBERT STANLEY ROBERTSON, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4598) for the relief of Robert Stanley Robertson, jr.

The Clerk read the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1377 be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1377 be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Lieut. Robert Stanley Robertson, jr., United States Navy, a lieutenant commander on the retired list of the Navy, with pay and allowances of the fourth pay period, as now prescribed under existing laws, and with credit for all service which he is now entitled to count in the computation of his pay: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall entitle Lieut. Robert Stanley Robertson, jr., United States Navy, to any back pay or allowances.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Ralph Ole Wright and Varina Belle Wright, the parents of Ralph Atkinson Wright, deceased, who, while serving as a seaman, second class, at the United States naval training station at Great Lakes, Ill., while in the performance of his duty at the radio station at Great Lakes, Ill., without any fault of his own, on June 15, 1922, met his death from electric shock by coming in contact with the high-tension switches on the switchboard in basement of building No. 63, at the United States naval training station, Great Lakes, Ill., in use as a transmitting and receiving radio station, the sum of $10,000, said sum to be in full settlement of the claim.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, in line 8, strike out the sign and figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$2,500."

In line 8, after the word "in," strike out the words "full settlement of the claim" and insert in lieu thereof the words "lieu of pension."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BYRON BROWN RALSTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5968) for the relief of Byron Brown Ralston.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Byron Brown Ralston, formerly lieutenant commander in the United States Navy, a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy and place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and allowance of that grade with credit for any purposes for all service to which he was entitled on April 15, 1927: Provided, That a duly constituted naval retiring board finds that the said Byron Brown Ralston incurred physical disability incident to the service while on the active list of the Navy: Provided further, That no back pay, allowance, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A. ROY KNABENSHUE

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings whereby House bill 11764 was passed may be vacated, so that we may correct the title to conform with the text.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the proceedings whereby House bill 11764 was passed be vacated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that in the committee amendment the name is "A. Roy Knabenshue," while in the title it is "Roy A. Knabenshue." I ask unanimous consent that the title may be corrected to conform with the text and that the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

U. R. WEBB

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4101) for the relief of U. R. Webb.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentlewoman from California as to the amount of relief here granted. I know we have compensated various officials of the Government who lost their property in Yokohama at the time of the earthquake, but here the amount is $6,534.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HALE. In the hearings the amount was checked up and a list of articles lost was submitted by the Navy Department and the representative of the Navy Department in response to my inquiry about the very same point which the gentleman raises stated that the Navy Department was satisfied that the amount is correct and accurate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He must have been a very prosperous naval officer.

Mrs. KAHN. All of his household effects were lost and everything belonging to himself and wife, including many things which they had collected for a number of years, and, of course, his uniforms were lost.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the committee has gone into it thoroughly, that satisfies me.

Mr. HALE. Not only the committee but the department has gone into the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to U. R. Webb, commander, Medical Corps, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,534, in reimbursement for the loss by earthquake and fire of personal property in Yokohama, Japan, while he was serving as commanding officer of the United States Naval Hospital at Yokohama, Japan.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WENDELL M. SAUNDERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1957) for the relief of Wendell M. Saunders.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to summon Wendell M. Saunders, late ensign of the United States Naval Reserve, before a retiring board for the purpose of a hearing of his case, and inquire into and determine all the facts touching on the nature of his disabilities, and to find and report the disability which, in its judgment, has produced his incapacity, and whether his disabilities are an incident of service; that upon the findings of such a board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, either to confirm the order by which the said Wendell M. Saunders, an ensign in the United States Naval Reserve, and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Navy, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for the officers of the regular Navy: Provided, That the said Wendell M. Saunders shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by the passage of this act.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, there are two committee amendments which the committee voted to report to correct clerical errors in the bill, which somehow or other were inadvertently omitted in the report, and I now offer them. The first is in line 12, page 1, strike out the word "either"; and the second is, in line 13, page 1, strike out the comma after the word "Saunders" and insert the words "was appointed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HALE: On page 1, line 12, strike out the word "either"; and in line 13, after the word "Saunders," strike out the comma and insert "was appointed."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FRANK DIXON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1848) for the relief of Frank Dixon.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Dixon, of Dunkirk, Ind., dependent father of Floyd Dixon, late electrician's mate, third class, United States Navy, the sum of $360, as six months' gratuity pay, which amount would have been paid by act of Congress approved June 4, 1920, but for the omission, through ignorance or error, of his son to designate a proper beneficiary before he was killed in the performance of service duty: Provided, That the said Frank Dixon establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that he was actually dependent upon his son, the said Floyd Dixon, at the time of the latter's death.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SALE OF LAND IN LOUISIANA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9568) to authorize the purchase at private sale of a tract of land in Louisiana, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow the Investors Mortgage Co., of New Orleans, La., to purchase at private sale, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, section 58 in township 12 south of range 14 east, Louisiana meridian, Louisiana.

ST. JOSEPH'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, BATON ROGUE, LA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12041) granting certain land to the Roman Catholic congregation of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church of the city of Baton Rouge, La.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TARVER. I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. TARVER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We had a bill the other day on the Consent Calendar covering contiguous land, giving it back to the university, this being a public institution. This is a part of the same land.

Mr. TARVER. I have read the bill and the report of the committee and am familiar with it. It appears that the United States has a reversionary interest in and to this land. It appears that the adjoining tract has been donated to public usage in connection with an agricultural and mechanical school. I have no objection to the donation of lands for public educational institutions which may be used by any member of the public. But this bill proposes to donate certain property rights of the Government to the Roman Catholic Church for sectarian purposes for the maintenance of a sectarian institution. The amount, I believe, is small, but the principle, however, is large, and in my judgment no donation should be made of Government property to any church for any sectarian purpose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not the policy that the House has followed. There are hundreds of precedents to the contrary.

Mr. TARVER. For one I object to the passage of a measure that I consider to be antagonistic to the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and I shall feel constrained to exercise my privilege.

Mr. KEMP. May I ask the gentleman to reserve his objection?

Mr. TARVER. I will reserve it.

Mr. KEMP. I am familiar with the whole situation. If the gentleman will permit an explanation of the facts, I think he will withdraw his objection. This institution has a corporate title of the Congregation of the Roman Catholic Church of East Baton Rouge, La. It involves only 2½ acres. Congress granted to this Roman Catholic congregation this 2½ acres of land in 1890. I will say in that connection that this was the burial ground for over 100 years prior to that time. By another act of Congress in 1892 the use of this land was made to include charitable and educational purposes, and the only claim that the Government reserved in this land was that in the event it should be needed for military purposes it should be used by the Government for that purpose.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to this language: Here is a grant from the Congress of the United States of this 2½ acres of land which is to be used as a burial ground and for educational purposes. It has been so used for over a hundred years. Here is the grant of Congress——

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman is going to withdraw his objection, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter. It is the last bill to be called to-day, as I understand it.

Mr. TARVER. I am familiar with the facts in the case.

Mr. KEMP. I think possibly I could give the gentleman some additional facts. The Government has no title to this land at the present time. The Government has only a reversionary interest in the event that the Secretary of War deems it necessary——

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to insist upon his point of order, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MICHAEL J. BAUMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2817) for the relief of Michael J. Bauman.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous-consent agreement, I gave notice some time ago that I would object to all bills after No. 469 on the calendar. The bill just called is 470 on the calendar.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve that? It is only 25 minutes after 3 o'clock. I know that the gentleman stated his position clearly at the beginning of the consideration of this calendar, but, after all, this is the Private Calendar. The reports accompany the bills. There are many bills where justice could be done to men who have been denied justice for a long time, and they are clamoring for it to-day. I have one bill on this calendar of the case of a poor fellow who had been under a stigma since 1898 for an insignificant bagatelle. He wants to go to a hospital, but because of that stigma he can not go. There are other meritorious bills. I think we should go on until 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the intention of the gentleman from North Carolina to object to bills from this point on?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has that right. Under the agreement entered into any Member has the right to object to bills. It is worse than futile, however, to go on under the circumstances. It would be really unfair to bills that are on the calendar to call them and have them objected to indiscriminately. Therefore, I shall move to adjourn.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the latter part of the gentleman's statement with reference to its being unfair to proceed with the consideration of this calendar.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from North Carolina says that he is going to object to every bill that is called from now on to-day, and I deem it unfair to have bills called in this way and have them objected to.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. WARREN. I do that because I have not had an opportunity to read the bills and the reports.

Mr. TILSON. We understand the gentleman's position.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. When will we take up the Private Calendar again?

Mr. TILSON. I shall avail myself of every reasonable opportunity to get consideration for the Private Calendar and utilize such time as comes to us for that purpose. I can not make a promise now as to any certain time.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Probably at an early date?

Mr. TILSON. Just as early as we can conveniently.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And the gentleman's statement is in the nature of a notice to all of us to be prepared for such an emergency.

Mr. TILSON. I wish that Members would be prepared to go on with these bills at any time.

MR. OLDFIELD

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD], the whip on the Democratic side, has just had to submit to an operation. He will be absent from the House, and I ask unanimous consent that he may have indefinite leave of absence on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the condition of Mr. OLDFIELD? All of the Members of the House are very deeply concerned over his condition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. He was operated upon at 11.30 o'clock this morning. We do not know yet how serious it is.

Mr. TILSON. I know that I speak the sentiments of all Members when I wish for him a complete and speedy recovery.

SHOSHONE AND ARAPAHOE INDIANS OF WYOMING

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3366) to authorize a per capita payment to the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians of Wyoming from the funds held in trust for them by the United States, which is identical with the House bill that has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States so much of the money credited to the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians of Wyoming under the act of August 21, 1916 (39 Stat. 519), as may be necessary to make a $25 per capita payment to said Indians, and to pay or distribute the same to all recognized members of the tribes under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 11365) was laid on the table.

ST. JOSEPH ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, OF BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 469, H. R. 12041, granting certain lands to the Roman Catholic Congregation of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church, of the city of Baton Rouge, La.

Mr. TILSON. Is this a bill that was passed without prejudice?

Mr. KEMP. No; it was the last bill under consideration.

Mr. TILSON. Has the objection been withdrawn to it?

Mr. KEMP. The objection has not been actually withdrawn, but the gentleman who made the objection has withdrawn from the Chamber.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would not feel warranted in recognizing the gentleman from Louisiana to ask unanimous consent to take this bill up at this time under those circumstances.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman who objected to it has left the Chamber, then it should not be called up.

Mr. KEMP. But the gentleman who objected to it has withdrawn from the Chamber with the idea of letting the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think he should recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this time.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 23, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.
